Verse 21. "Answered them." This applies to the previous part of the chapter, viz: the song of Moses. To this Miriam and the women replied antiphonally, repeating the first strophe of the song, slightly varied in the person and number of the verb. "Sing."—"He hath triumphed gloriously." Literally "highly exalted is He." The sense is the same, but expressed a little differently. To triumph is to be "made high," exalted, lifted up. The one refers to the manifestation, the other to the result of the manifestation. "The horse and his rider." For many ages the Hebrews seem to have had the same feeling of terror at the horse as an aid to war as the Aztes of Mexico had at the first coming of the Spaniards. The infantry of Israel found it hard to stand against the chariot and cavalry-using races. Therefore these are put as representatives of the whole army of Egypt. No doubt they were its principal part.

Verse 22. "The wilderness of Shur." The upper portion of the desert now called Deschifer, which stretches from Egypt to the south-western part of Palestine. It is also called the desert of Etham, from the town of Etham which stood upon the border. The spot where the Israelites probably encamped is supposed to have been the present Ayun Musa (the springs of Moses.) There are at present several springs there which yield a drinkable water, though dark and brackish, and a few stunted palms. Unquestionably the water supply of the desert was greater than now, before the wholesale destruction by the Bedaween of all the trees for the purpose of making charcoal to use in preparing gunpowder. It was always desert no doubt, but this character has been heightened within the limits of the modern era of history.

Verse 23. "Marah." They went three days in the wilderness and found no water. This identifies Marah, in all probability, with the well of Hawara. This is the first place where water can be found, and is thirty-three English miles from Ayun Musa. Its water is disagreeably bitter and salt, and the Bedaween consider it the worst water in the whole neighborhood. It is objected that the size of the well of Hawara is too small to answer the requirements of the story—but it is very evident that the spring is partially choked up from neglect. The people had taken, no doubt, a supply for the three days' journey. The name Marah signifies bitter, and that was given to the spring from the character still preserved by its waters. The three days is always understood as meaning either parts or whole days as the case may be. As soon as the third day is reached, the three days are reckoned, and the beginning may be any where in the first day. Still thirty-three miles would be a fair three-days' march for a people so burdened.

Verse 24. "The people murmured." This expression probably covers a wide range, from sullen discontent, to active complaint and rebellion. The Hebrew people had been accustomed to drink the sweet and pleasant waters of the Nile, which is considered particularly potable, and is even exported to Constantinople. They were hence unfitted for any such harsh experience as this. They show too, their truly childish character by breaking out into complaints at the first touch of hardship, as they had done before at the first threatening of danger. It does not say "appealed to Moses," which would have been natural and right, for the trouble was a very real one, but murmured against Moses.

Verse 25. "The Lord shewed him a tree." The Hebrew word is one which leaves it indifferent whether it be considered a living tree or a dead. The word used by the Septuagint is σφοδρ, the same that St. Peter uses in speaking of the cross, and hence many expositors have considered this a type of the cross. It is clear that this was miraculously done, since there is no tree or plant in the neighborhood which has any such quality.

It was probably a prophetic parable in action, intended to show how out of the bitterness of the Law the "wood of the cross" was to bring sweetness. "Prove them." Put a trial upon them, a proof or test.

Verse 26. The covenant of obedience is here set forth. "None of these diseases." This is taken in its larger sense of plagues, viz., the visitations which had been shown upon Egypt. It does not mean here or elsewhere, the bodily infirmities to which Egypt is peculiarly subject, but the afflictions which were the ten plagues of Egypt. Hence these may be symbolically connected with the ten commandments. Not necessarily in the order of each, but as a whole to a whole.

Verse 27. Elim is found in the Wady Gharandel, about six miles south of Hawara. The number of the wells and palm trees shows the fertility of the spot. There was a well for each tribe and a palm tree for the tent of each of the seventy elders. Their numbers have always been understood as symbolical. This was their next halting place, probably for several days at the least.

VIA DOLOROSA.

BY MRS. IONE L. JONES.

Not o'er beds of roses rare,
Not o'er pathways void of care,
Where sunlight falleth everywhere,
The way of the cross lies hidden;
For the journey is long, and thorns abound
In the narrow path; and rough the ground,
Where, as a ladder, round by round
We reach and climb, God-bidden.

What though cloud-rifts dark and gray,
Hide the face of the sun to-day!
To-morrow the veil will be torn away,
And we grieve no more our loss;
Thus cares and troubles lighter grow
As we bend toward Heaven and wish it so,
And sorrows prove steps as we upward go
On the journey—the way of the cross.

AN ELOQUENT TRIBUTE.*

By the courtesy of those to whom the arrangement of this service has been committed, I am here to-day in ready compliance with their request, to speak a word for the South, the land of my birth, and as one who by an actual service in arms, may fitly represent the Confederate soldiers in their hopeless and hapless struggle of the civil war. I am here to stand side by side with you about the open grave, claiming a substantial share in the tribute you seek to pay to the genius, the transcendent moral greatness, the brilliant achievements in war and in peace of that man whose death excites a sorrow that knows no sectional limitation, but enwraps the hearts of this whole people as the heart of a single man. I am here to weave into the garland this city would lovingly place upon his bier twigs of cypress and myrtle gathered from the forests of the South. Nor is it in language of merely conventional propriety that the South asks leave to add her tribute of respect and honor, but from a genuine and natural impulse. True it is that by the consummate generalship of Grant, their gallant, if mistaken efforts were baffled and broken, but now when the echoes of that war have died away and the passions which led up to it have subsided, they have gained by their very sufferings and sacrifices and the awful discipline of military defeat, the power to acknowledge and do honor to those qualities which constitute his greatness. They know him as a prince in the mighty brotherhood of valor. But again the South seeks recognition in the obsequies of to-day because of his national character. Whatever may be the name of the State that claims to hold his birthplace, whatever the name of that which will receive this day his mortal remains, whatever may have been the associations, political and social, that gave particular direction to his destiny; yet underneath them all, and more powerful than any local influence in shaping his character, were the forces that were generated when the foundations of this republic were laid in the common sacrifices of North and South alike. His greatness is national. His character is American, the product of ideas and principles that began the princely line of American heroes in the person of Washington, and which will never fail, so long as we be true to them, to produce a man for America in the hour of America's need. But once more the Southern soldiers demand an assignment in the funeral cortege because they have a debt of gratitude to pay; because within their memory there is framed the living portrait of the great general who, in the dark hour of their need and humiliation which was at once the moment of his brilliant victory, could turn his back upon resentment and hardness "as the greatest only are, in his simplicity sublime" extend to them the hand of a restored brotherly kindness. You know the tender story of Appomattox—how, when all was done the heart of the great conqueror went out in sympathy to the hearts of his brothers, who had shown themselves fomen worthy of his steel. I remember in those last days, at my post of duty, remote from that scene of action, when the soldiers of Lee's army came stragging home bearing the tidings of the great surrender, how their message was distrusted, because they came, not as prisoners, but bearing an honorable discharge and riding on their horses. You have heard the story in these later days how, in the capitulation, the mighty general said: "They must keep these, for they will need them for their spring planting." And so they went away from wasting and carnage, from riot and bloodshed, riding over mountains and valleys seeking their homes, their wives and their children. They went away in that month of April back to their "spring planting." And now, twenty years gone by, in the midsummer of this year of grace, now in their harvest season, they have been sending to him in this hour of mortal agony, the fair fruits of that spring planting, garnered sheaves of affection, admiration and gratitude. To-day bearers of his pall, Johnston and Buckner walk with Sherman and Sheridan in sorrow and pride beside his bier, and the Southern soldier in honest sympathy, resumes his place beneath the old flag, and as we listen we catch the strains of a common eulogium borne from east and west, and north and south, unmarred by a single discordant note. The salvos of artillery are thundering forth the homage of a mourning people, a splendid pageantry is telling out their pride, yet who can doubt, if from their resting place departed souls are permitted to hear the praises and cries of earth, that his noble spirit will exult as it hears beneath all our noisy demonstrations the sweet and tender undertone of Peace.

DESIRING NOT THE DEATH OF A SINNER.

BY THE REV. R. W. LOWRIE.

I am glad that you have again written me. Do not fear to do so at will, and I will try, in turn, to do my part, as you request. I am glad that my other words, you assure me, have been of help to you. The greatest compliment I ever had was from a parishioner, who, in leaving my parish, said, with tears, "Your sermons have helped me so!" Not fine, not learned, not "eloquent," and all that—"helped me so!" Now, let me go on trying to help you (and through you others, perhaps), for, as I wrote you, I shall print some of my letters to you. You are troubled about the "forgiveness of sin." All are sinners. Whether original sin has been acquired in just the supposed and interpreted way, while I care less for mere opinions than most men, and think the truth far more important than the human definitions in which men have attempted to explain it, or the arguments by which they have tried to enforce it, and whether—as you suggest—sin be an evil principle, or an inherent taint of our whole nature—whatever it be, and however it may have befallen us, that we sin, no one can doubt or deny. . . . Now, any act of sin puts the soul at once out of harmony with the rest of God's universe. His purposes in the moral world are like a perfect piece of music. Sin jars and breaks the harmony. The man who sins feels this, too, not always at once, but in time—if he be not blinded and his conscience seared and "past feeling."

The moment he has this consciousness of having, by his sin, become out of concord with the vast and glorious oratorio of God's moral plans and purposes, he is smitten with shame. His better nature is shocked. Tho' he may shed no tear and utter no cry, he is, in a degree, a penitent man. His penitence may deepen, and of course should always be in proportion to the degree of his fault, but penitence he is from the moment that he realizes that he is a discordant note or bar in the symphony. Now, this act and state of repentance has a restorative effect. It is like the hand of the master correcting the blunder of the pupil in music. It repairs the broken harmony, and restores the missing quality to the chord. . . . In other words, if his contrition be really such, if it is true and sincere, such an one as, in the sight of Him who alone can forgive, since He is the only one against whom we can sin, and who alone can judge us or of us, since He alone is perfect, then, the man is pardoned, his sin is forgiven, and his iniquity is hid. He has been replaced in the sight of his Father in heaven. For he has despised his act, repudiated it, condoned it so far as he can, spat upon it, and trampled it under foot. He has put himself again in harmony with God's moral universe, to which he belongs.

Of course the act and the fact of the sin remain, and he is that much less of a man than he might have been, he has built up a that much more defective personal character, but, so far as human power can ameliorate his condition, his penitence does change for the better his frame of mind, and the relation of his soul to his Maker, and God his Father will not disown him as His son, and will not remember against Him the sin for which he is now contrite. He is forgiven from the moment he is acceptably penitent.

If now your friend has been brought up to regard confession to God, before some officer of the Church, as helpful, let him, by all means, enjoy the benefit of that help. Compulsory confession is one thing, voluntary, another. The former has been a source of great harm, the latter may be of great comfort. Our Church allows the latter as the occasional and exceptional mode of relief, and has never forbidden it. Yet this fact does not stand in way of a complete forgiveness of sin without any such resort. For, if the sinner be not penitent, there is no remission. If he is, and his God knows it, while a formal official, authoritative declaration may help the sinner to realize it, may touch his feelings, impress his religious nature, comfort him, and as an occasional exceptional and purely voluntary act and mode of relief be, to a certain class of minds, vastly helpful (tho' ever liable to misuse), if I say, the sinner is sincerely penitent, and his Maker knows it as fully as he, and even infinitely more fully, why, as there can be nothing greater than the whole, and nothing higher than that which is perfect, then there is remission, and while the soul that sinneth, if it repent not, shall die, yet the soul that sins and repents shall live, and does live in the sunshine of restored favor and Divine pardon.

Your thought—"am I truly forgiven?"—is a common one. I hope I have "helped" answer it. Read this to the others of the household, and believe me, as ever, your friend.

THE STORY OF PETER.

After the German.

BY K. C.

The little Peter belonged to an aspiring family.

His grandfather, and afterward his father, had been chamois hunters, and when all the chamois were gone from the mountains, Seppel, who could not be contented upon level ground, became a guide and showed strangers the mountain paths.

So little Peter was much alone, for he had no mother.

The father, when he went out, always left him something to eat, and when this was gone he trotted away to the next house. This was indeed more than half a mile distant, but the widow woman who lived there was kind-hearted and motherly, and did all she could for the lonely little boy.

She was herself often away, at work in the fields or at the village across the valley, but Mareili, her little lame daughter, was always there, sitting by the stove with her knitting, or on the bench before the door if the day was fine, and she always had a handful of dried beef, or a piece of bread for the hungry Peterli, and the two lonely children were a great comfort to each other.

The little girl's pale face would brighten when she saw her friend's ragged jacket coming along the stony way, and as they sat there in the sunshine she would tell him wonderful stories, which she had spelled out from the few books she possessed, or teach him the little prayers which she knew, and, for his part, Peter tried in every way to please her.

He brought her brilliant stones, and sweet scented herbs, and the rare Alpine flowers his father gathered for him upon the highest peaks, which they valued highly and pressed between the leaves of the mother's Prayer Book.

One treasure they had which Peter was envied for far and wide, a little book bound in red, with gilt edges, and colored pictures of elegant fraus, and knights on horseback, and stately houses.

It had, perhaps, been lost by some traveller, and, picked up by Seppel upon the mountains, was received with great exultation by the little Peter, and taken to Mareili for safe-keeping, and they often thought as they turned over its creamy pages how beautiful it must be to exist in this great world, where such fine men and women lived.

"When I am a man, Mareili," said the little boy one day, "I will climb upon the mountains, like the father, until I am so high that I can see the whole world, and wherever it looks best I will go down, then when I have made a great deal of money, I will bring thee a fine golden hood."

"Before that," said Mareili woefully "I shall be in Heaven; that is still higher above, and one can see the whole earth, but it is so beautiful there that one would not care to look often."

So the children comforted each other, and were at peace with their ragged frocks and miserable food; and Peterli's only care was that he might soon grow large and strong enough to climb upon the mountains with his father.

It was a sad day for him when the good-natured, rosy-faced Seppel, did not come home as usual, at twilight, and some sober looking men came slowly down the path, and told him that his father had fallen upon the rocks and was dead. True, he did not understand much about it at first, and only knew that it was lonely and cold in the little hut, and his father did not come home to bring him any more bread and cheese, or fire-wood.

It was not long now that he stayed here, for the authorities of the district decided that he must be placed where he could be taught to earn his living, so poor little Peter must take care of Mareili and all his friends, and go, bewildered and sorrowful, across the mountains with the old peasant who had consented to take charge of him.

Here it was more lonely than ever, for the peasant was old and his wife was deaf; but he was a bright boy, and soon learned to make himself useful to the old woman, who would nod and smile at him, and find time for him to study the spelling-book Mareili had given him at parting. The prayers she had taught him he soon nearly forgot, and he did not yet understand that he could pray without learning words by heart.

As he grew older he was sent to school and made good progress; but he liked better to work in the frau's garden and take care of her corn-flowers and larkspurs, or to roam about in his spare time and seek for stones and plants.

He still looked longingly up at the mountains, and wondered what was on the other side of their snowy peaks; and the time for this came at last.

There was a dry summer, and the goats, Peter's especial charge, did not thrive upon the lower ground. It was thought best to send them upon the mountain in search of food.

Now the boy was indeed happy. Upon the eventful day he arose long before light to prepare for this Alpine journey, and proudly arrayed himself as a senuerherd, with an old horn bound round his waist and a staff in his hand.

How beautiful the mountains seemed to him as he looked upward toward their green slopes and snow-capped peaks in the fresh, dewy morning, and followed his goats as they bounded and scrambled before, feeling much concern lest they should stray away.

Higher and higher they went, and after a long time, when they had nearly reached the top, the goats, having eaten their fill, grew tired and lay down to rest.

Peter was tired too, but he could not linger yet. He kept eagerly on, to the top of a projection, from which he hoped at last to see the world.

Yes, there it was; and how wonderful it looked to the mountain boy. He seemed to be gazing, not into the world but an open heaven.

Far below lay the deep blue sea, whereon distant sails shone like white doves; the mighty mountains mirrored themselves in its clear waters, friendly villages stood upon its shore, and here and there a solitary church. Around rose the mountain chain, and far above gleamed the great glaciers and peaks, white against the deep blue heavens.

It was too much. A strange feeling came over the boy. He folded his hands and prayed.

"Oh, dear Lord, Thy world is so beautiful and so great! Give me only a little place therein."

Al! it was glorious. The sunshine warmed him, fresh mountain air streamed over him, and it seemed to Peterli the finest thing in the world to be a herd-boy and roam over the mountain all day long.

When he was a little calmer he sat down and ate his provisions, but again and again he sprang up to look and shout aloud for joy.

In the solitude and stillness he recalled the little prayers Mareili had taught him long ago, and wondered whether, when there were so many rich and great people upon earth, God would listen to a poor herd-boy.

It gave him much to think of in the long, quiet days, and the summer passed quickly away.

After a year or two more his master, who did not like his thoughtful ways, let him engage himself as senuer-boy to a rich peasant who had many cows, and now his life was quite upon the mountain.

He still spent much time in seeking plants and herbs and collecting strange stones, which he kept in excellent order in a hidden grotto, often wishing he could show them to Mareili and tell her all he had thought and learned in these years of separation; but this was not to be just yet.

One day, however, as he lay on the green slope before his little senuer-but, looking wistfully toward the distant world, he saw two men coming toward him, and though strangers are no rare sight among the Alps, they seldom came upon Peter's mountain, which was neither high nor remarkable; so he rose somewhat shyly in answer to their call, and looked at them curiously.

The first carried a hammer, with which he struck the rocks as he passed, and his pockets were so full of stones that he kept dropping them. The other often stopped to pull up the plants and herbs and examine them through a microscope.

Peter was astonished. It had never occurred to him that any but ignorant boys like himself cared for stones and grasses; but they were hastening toward him, and the one with the hammer called out as they drew near,

"Good friend, have you anything rare upon your mountain?"

Peter immediately resolved to show them his grotto, and led them by what they seemed to find a neck-breaking way to its entrance. Here he stood back, and looked on while they examined his treasures in evident delight.

"Look! look! friend Braun," cried he with the hammer. "The lucky boy!

Where has he found this quartz, this crystal, this erab's claw in a slate?"

"Ah," thoughtfully returned the other, who had made his own discoveries on the opposite side of the cave. "This wonder of an Alpine peasant is, it appears, a botanical genius also. Here are samples of the Alpine plants I have sought for years, only sadly pressed and arranged; sadly."

"And this petrification," cried the first, and he smiled radiantly upon Peter and patted him on the shoulder.

Peter smiled in return, but did not attempt to answer, for his Swiss dialect seemed not altogether familiar to the gentleman of the hammer.

He sat upon a stone and waited contentedly, while they looked at everything in the place, and held a long consultation in their native German, of which he had learned enough from the guides about, to make out that they were old friends, and professors in some university, spending their vacation in wandering about in search of specimens, but he was thoroughly astonished when the plant collector, whom he had heard the other call "Braun," suddenly turned towards him, asking if he would like to go with them and help to collect the plants and stones, of which he seemed so fond.

Peter could hardly believe that he heard aright, but his face lighted up at these unexpected words.

What a glorious opportunity for going out into the world; this world that he had so longed to see.

"But, but, my master. I cannot leave the cows," he stammered.

"Oh, the cows," cried Dr. Braun, impatiently, "there are cowherds enough to be had upon these mountains. We will see thy master, boy;" and making him point out the path, they trudged away together, talking as they went.

That was a day of excitement to Peter, but at night when he went home with his cows it was all settled, his master had agreed to release him from his engagement, and he was to go the next morning to the inn in the valley, to meet his new friends.

He rose, therefore, before sunrise on the following day, and went gleefully down the mountain road to find his patrons; and the new life began.

A pleasant life it seemed to the boy in these first days. Nothing to do but to wander over the mountains in the fresh air, finding here a stone and there a plant, to eat his luncheon on the soft grass, and rest in the comfortable little inn at night.

At last the summer ended, the stones were packed, and sent by post; the places were taken in the diligence, and now Peter's heart grew heavy at the thought of leaving his native mountains.

He remembered his first glimpse of the world, and his prayer that the good God would give him only a little place therein. Now the prayer had been answered, yet he began to fear that in this world it would not be so easy to find God. And he feared, not without reason, poor Peter.

At the first large town in which they stopped he went out to buy a present for Mareili, whom he had longed to see once more.

What should it be? A fine cloak and hood? He knew that she never went out, and did not care for finery, and, after pondering a while, he remembered her love for books.

Stopping at a book-store, he bought a little black volume, knowing not, indeed, what was within; but he had made no bad choice, for it was Thomas à Kempis.

This was wrapped up and sent to Mareili, with a note in which he told her of his good fortune, and of his sorrow in not being able to bid his friends farewell.

So the holidays were ended, the journey was completed, and the professors and Peter, the plants and the stones, all safely arrived in the great Northern city, where the boy went about for a day or two like one in a dream.

He was overwhelmed with amazement at the handsome houses, the broad streets, and fine gate-ways; but he could catch no glimpse of his beloved mountains, and this made him sad. Yet there was little time for homesickness, for the new specimens must be unpacked, and places found for them in the cabinets, and he must learn the names of the many, many stones and minerals, that he might know how to arrange them properly, and he proved very quick and capable.

In his hours of leisure he often slipped into the room where Professor Braun's classes were reciting, and, seating himself in a corner, would listen intently to whatever was going forward, thus learning much about the plant-world, and many other things.

After a while, too, he began in his spare time to ramble out of the big noisy city into the surrounding country, and often brought home specimens of stones and plants, which gained him more than one silver piece. These thoughtful Dr. Braun laid aside for his benefit, and, after watching him quietly for a while, made a new suggestion to Dr. Glimmes.

It seemed a pity so bright a lad should not have an opportunity for improvement. What if they let him join the classes?

The two professors consulted together, and the matter was soon decided. He was to live in Dr. Glimmes's house, while Dr. Braun undertook to provide his wardrobe, and he could still make himself useful about the cabinet in his hours of freedom.

And now was Peter happy indeed. Though much embarrassed the first time he appeared in a short coat and student's cap, he soon learned to feel at home in them, and resolved to do his best to deserve these great kindnesses.

It was hard of course, to begin with the little boys, and see their wondering looks as the great lad came among them, while others of his own age stood so far above him, but this could be borne for awhile.

He resolved soon to take his proper place in the classes, and studied so diligently that he made surprising progress.

Dr. Braun looked at him in amazement when he found it necessary to promote him higher and still higher, and unhappily he was flattered and praised, until he grew a little vain and self-sufficient, and the thoughts of the good God who had seemed so near in the mountains, were fading away in this life of excitement.

His mind felt empty, and weary, and discontented, "but this," he thought, "is because I have not distinguished myself; when I shall have become a man, and gained riches and honor, all these feelings will leave me," and the foolish boy forgot that God gives honor to men as they deserve, and began to indulge in the wildest dreams of fame and fortune.

What astonishment and enthusiasm would be excited, he thought, when he, the untaught mountain boy, should pass a brilliant examination, and what would they do with him after? make him a professor? they could surely do no less, and he spent too much time in dreaming when he should have been working.

With increased standing too, came harder tasks. He began to find it more difficult to keep up, and to relax his efforts a little, until at length the long-expected examination time drew near, and in the general excitement he aroused to the fact of his wasted time, and applied himself harder than ever.

The important day drew on. Peter found matters quite other than he had anticipated. He knew so much, why would that stupid examiner keep asking questions which he did not know?

The sorrowful lack of thorough foundation, which indeed was not the boy's fault, told against him, and, oh, poor Peter! He passed it is true, but among the lowest, and only in consideration of his early disadvantages, and the zeal and capacity which he showed.

He might, they told him, by continued application and industry become a good physician, but could expect no more.

It was a hard blow, and Peter took it without much resolution. His patrons, too, were disappointed, for they had hoped more from his apparent abilities; and his future was a puzzle.

Peter had by this time saved from his wages and specimen collections quite a little sum, but not enough to provide for future studies; and he utterly refused to be apprenticed to a physician, where he might learn to do some good in the world.

"Be a doctor," he said impatiently to himself, "and enter a hospital or some miserable village to die of starvation." A brilliant prospect truly for one who had confidently expected to fill a professor's chair.

It seemed a great injustice to the foolish, angry boy, and just then happening to meet Bruno, a great friend of his, who had been away from the university for a while, he opened all his sore heart to his fellow-student.

It did not afford him much comfort, however, for Bruno, who was a heedless fellow, only laughed at his grief, called him a simpleton for minding what the professors said, and urged him to come with him and two companions on a tour through the Tyrol. They had hired a wagon and two horses, he said, and should be a gay party, and Peter's future could be settled after; and in the bitterness of his spirit the boy promised to go, not once reflecting that Bruno's father was in comfortable circumstances, and could afford to indulge his son occasionally, or thinking of his own folly in wasting his little savings, or of his ingratitude to his kind patrons.

He at once went with Bruno to inspect the wagon and meet the two lively lads, who were very glad to see him and find their party made up so readily, and they agreed to start the next morning at dawn; so in the half darkness Peter slipped from the house which had been home to him for so many months, and climbed into the big wagon which was waiting in a stable yard not far away.

They were soon outside the city and rattling along past cornfields and river and little villages, and the three friends were full of life. They talked and laughed and made the air ring with student songs, but Peter did not join them. His heart felt heavy, and he wondered how they could be so gay, and so several days glided by.

It was evening when they came among the mountains, and Peter's heart beat as he saw them dimly looming up before him. He could not sleep that night, though the little inn where they stopped was quiet and comfortable, but rose long before light and went out to look about him.

Yes, the mountains were there, looking down upon him like old friends, and not far distant, while in the bright moonlight, the pathway towards them was plainly to be seen.

Forgetting his companions the boy started eagerly towards them, and was soon climbing upwards in the stillness which seemed to him like home.

The way was easy, and the distant sea shimmered in the waning moonlight, the birds awoke and began to twitter among the trees, and the air grew fresh and cool.

As the sun rose Peter stood upon a high rock, and gazed into the dewy distance, and the words came into his mind, "And the spirit of God moved upon the waters."

As he stood and looked about, his soul trembled. The fresh morning air swept far from him the troubles and disappointments of the last days, and he seemed once more a child.

The bells in the valley rang out, and he knelt and stretched his arms towards heaven and prayed once more his old prayer. "Oh, Father in heaven, give me only a little peace in Thy beautiful world."

Below, in the inn, the students wondered and waited. Towards night someone brought them a note in which their friend took a kind leave of them, but Peter himself was far away, trudging energetically towards his old home, and when at last he came in sight of the familiar peaks, he was, though weary and foot-sore enough, happier than he had been for years.

His father's hut he found occupied by strangers, and though he looked longingly at the windows and the low roof, he did not stop, but turned into the path which led to the widow's cottage, and here he knew every turning, almost every blade of grass. Here was the spring from which he drank, the stone upon which he sat down to rest, and here the point from which he could first see the house. It had seemed to him once a long journey, now it was scarcely two hundred steps.

Soon he turned the corner of the garden. The sun shone full upon the house and the gilly flowers and balsams which grew before the windows, and there upon the bench sat Marelli, looking as if she had never moved from the old spot, but so much changed that for a moment he did not know her.

Her face was paler than of old, but there were the same soft, gentle eyes, which gazed curiously at the tall lad for an instant, then lighted up with joy.

"Peterli!" she cried, "have you come once more to see us?" and held out her hands in welcome, and soon they were sitting side by side upon the bench chatting as in old times.

Marelli had not become strong in all these years, but she had now a crutch with which she could help herself about, and she brought her old friend coffee and omelet and bread and cheese, and showed him the embroideries and artificial flowers with which she earned a comfortable sum, admired over and over again the presents he had brought them, and told him how well her brothers were doing at the fisheries on the seashore, and how glad her mother would be to see him again when she came home from her work at the neighboring farm.

And for his part, Peter told her all about his life in the peasant's family and in the great university, and all his hopes and fears and disappointments, while Marelli listened wonderingly. It seemed to her so strange that one who had received so many benefits should be angry because he could not be favored still more, and she gravely reminded him of the days when they were little and weak, and had hardly enough to eat, and of the great changes since then for both of them.

"Yes, Marelli," said Peter, humbly, in reply, "I have, indeed, reason to be grateful to the good God and to my professors, and I am going back to them to learn to be a doctor, as they wished. I can perhaps do a little good among the poor and needy, if I cannot become great."

"Yes," smiled Marelli, "and that is surely best, for the good God puts us into the world to help one another."

And then the sun went down, and the mother came over the hill and waved her hand to them in great delight.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1885.

It is quite impossible to read Bishop Ferguson's report, written "at sea," on the steamship "Adriatic," and not feel that there is a man who understands his business, and is earnestly intent on doing it. He sets forth with equal intelligence and clearness what has been done and what ought to be done. His knowledge of the country and of the people entitles him to speak, and he speaks in a way which, we think, will commend itself to the Church's attention. His recommendations in the matter of opening new stations on the Cavalla river, and building at each one a house to accommodate the school and teachers; to strengthen the old stations and increase the present number of boarding-scholars; his suggestions in regard to theological and medical education, manual labor schools, female education, etc., are those of a wise and wide-minded man who has carefully thought out everything as the result of long experience and observation. No wonder that the bishop asks, with evident concern, "What will the Church do?" He sees clearly what he proposes to do, if the Church will but give him the means of doing it. We trust that the leaflet embracing this report, which may be had of the Secretary for Foreign Missions, may have a wide reading, that the Church at large may judge for itself whether it can afford to do less than is here proposed by its newly-consecrated bishop.

THE PAPAL OBEDIENCE.

It is a surprising thing that Churchmen, and clergymen even, should persist in using phrases which insinuate, even if they do not directly inculcate, false doctrine. As, for example, why habitually speak of the Roman Patriarchate as the Holy See? That a papalist should be so expected, but we may well wonder why a Churchman should, save as a mere matter of convenience, when speaking of distinctively Latin Christianity. Popular usage justifies it.

Yes, and it justifies also the common but misleading use of the word Catholic. But popular use does not justify a wrong and partisan use of that grand old word. Shall men who, from their youth up, have in every service of the Lord's house said: "I believe in the holy Catholic Church," the moment they leave the church door, empty this word of its rightful meaning? It is an indirect, but all the more effectual way of acceding to papal claims. It is indeed well to "speak gently of our erring sister," well to speak generously of the Church of Rome, however ungenerously and often contemptuously its adherents speak of us; but ordinarily to speak of Rome as the Holy See is practically to admit that it has a supremacy which no true Anglican will for one moment allow. As certainly no well-informed person will speak of Rome as the Holy See, meaning to imply that any exceptional sanctity has characterized the long line of prelates who have been bishops of that city.

That the See of Rome has been administered by saints, scholars, soldiers, and statesmen goes without saying. That there have been bishops of Rome who were heretics and a great many more who were worldly and even wicked men is equally well-known. Whatever the habit of Romanists, or even of such masters of rhetoric as Macaulay and Froude, certainly no Churchman has occasion to assign to the Roman Patriarchate any such pre-eminence as is involved in calling it the Holy See.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR.

Though Archdeacon Farrar is well down the list of distinguished English ecclesiastics who have visited the United States within the last twenty years, he is perhaps better known than any who have preceded him. Bishop Selwyn came as the great missionary. Charles Kingsley came with the éclat of literary fame. Dean Howson's fame as a biblical writer had preceded his personal appearance. Canon Fremantle made his visit under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance. Dean Stanley came on a sort of historical pilgrimage to the shrine of Younger England. Like many others, Bishop Thorold came to lend a hand during vacation in the cause of temperance. Dean Plumtre came to enjoy the hospitality which Dean Stanley had not time to exhaust.

Archdeacon Farrar is the last in this goodly list, but by no means the least. His fame has rapidly increased, and he is principally known as the writer of popular critical works on the life of our Lord and on the early apostolic and post-apostolic history, and as a leading social reformer within Church lines; but it is not a cheap or ephemeral reputation that has preceded him. It is justified by the scholarly, if not profound, character of his writings, and by the large spirit in which he has understood, as an English clergyman, his duty to society.

He has been one of the foremost in the English Church to advocate the cause of temperance, and to promote those social reforms by which the Church influences for good the masses of the people. Americans owe much to him for his warm recognition of the claims of their great chieftain to universal honor in England's mausoleum of her departed heroes, and there is in him much of that international spirit which should exist and increase between both the two Churches and the two nations. It is this double relation to an American public, the interest in his writings, and his interest in things American, which awakens sympathies toward him on his first visit to the United States which are peculiarly warm and hearty. It is not necessary to endorse all his opinions in order to extend the hand of cordial welcome to him. It is his manly Christian spirit, his large interpretation of the duty which the Church of Christ owes to modern society, which has awakened their sympathies, and it is these cordial visits of appreciative Englishmen to this country which is doing much to make the peoples of the two countries one in the political, social and religious life. In this light, Archdeacon Farrar's visit is an important visit, and in the extension of these international appreciations much is to be gained by both our guests and ourselves.

SINGULARITIES IN THE WESTMINSTER REVISION OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

Error travels in cycles, and would seem to be intermittent like a malarial fever, disappearing in one century, and breaking out again with new virulence in another. It is not only many-headed like the hydra, but no sooner is one head stricken off than a similar head appears in another place, and the work is all to do again. Error has so long counterfeited the truth and masqueraded in its lineaments that it seems to have acquired something of its immortality, and we can no longer say:

"But error, wounded, writes with pain,
And dies among his worshippers."

Dr. Schaff, in his work upon the Didache, tells us that "the local churches or individual congregations are ruled by bishops and deacons, elected or appointed by the people." He must, we think, have had before him Field's folio edition of the Bible, printed by the Puritans in 1660, in which, to gain a point, the text, Acts vi: 4, "whom WE may appoint over this business," the we referring to 'the apostles, is slyly changed into 'whom YE may appoint," thus giving the appointment to the people. It was a very small change of only a single letter, like the iota of the Creed in the Arian period, but was a change full of significance, and it would have been wide reaching in its influence but for the fact that there were other students of the Bible besides the Puritans, and the corruption of the text was soon discovered and exposed.

The Westminster revisers would seem to have been engaged in the same sort of work, and one is almost compelled to say with a similar motive. In Acts xxiii. 14, they render "when they had ordained them elders in every church," by "when they had appointed for them elders in every church," a change without any good reason or necessity. The word is not the same word which is rendered appoint in the sixth chapter, and Dr. Schaff himself admits that ordain was its ecclesiastical sense, but holds that in that sense its use was later as his theory requires him to do.

In the same spirit in Acts xv. 23, the revisers have undertaken to change the constituents of the first council of the Church held at Jerusalem. It has always been supposed to consist of the apostles, elders or presbyters, and the brethren or the laity. By the omission of two little words from the text, the revisers would entirely eliminate from the council the presbyters and have it composed of "apostles and the elder brethren," a translation which the American revisers declined to accept, as justified neither by the text nor the grammar. The revisers elsewhere had no difficulty in reading apostles, elders and brethren, but in this model council they would fain make some place for an order of lay elders, and so adapt their translation to a theory. But happily for the truth there are more Greek scholars than the revisers, and every day shows new reasons for thankfulness that the Westminster revision as a substitute for the version of King James has miserably failed.

In a recent article the Rev. C. C. Grafton makes the remarkable assertion that "the Religious Life was instituted by the Lord Himself." The assertion needs no refutation. Almost simultaneously with this article by Mr. Grafton appear a few wise words from the Rev. J. Carpenter Smith, D.D., on Monasticism and Monastic Vows. As every scholar knows, Dr. Smith keeps within the bounds of the facts of history in saying: "It is important to keep in mind the significant fact, alluded to by Clement of Alexandria, that, strictly speaking, monasticism was not the offspring of Christianity. It was an adaptation. The monastic life, i. e., a life of solitude spent in religious exercises and contemplation and discipline, has its history in ages long anterior to Christianity, and prevailed in religions other than Jewish or Christian. . . . Monachism then is not peculiar to the Church. It came from Oriental influences and was adopted by the Church with but little authority from the precepts and still less from the life of our Lord and His apostles. It must be viewed, then, not as the offspring but as the adopted child of the Church." No cause can be helped by claiming too much for it. Historic accuracy well becomes believers in the historic Church.

THE MERCERSBURG MOVEMENT AND CHURCH UNITY.

II.

The most interesting results of the Mercersburg movement are to be sought in connection with worship. It not only strengthened the liturgical tendency which appeared in the German Reformed Church, as elsewhere, about the middle of this century, but gave it a new direction. The continental Præsteyterians, unlike the British, had never wholly abandoned the devotional forms of the Reformation period, and the German Presbyterians had in the Palatinate Liturgy a prayer book as old as their catechism. It might have been expected that this would, like the catechism, have been restored to its old honors, and at first little more was thought of. But most of the committee to which the matter was entrusted in 1848, discovered that the Reformation divines were not as skillful in liturgics as in theology. They discovered, too, as Dr. Nevin tells us, that they were themselves "brought more and more under the power of an idea, which carried them with inexorable force its own way." This was the idea of worship as having its root "in the mystical presence of Christ in the Holy Supper." Thus they were led by degrees toward an "altar service," as distinguished from a "pulpit service," and far beyond the Calvinistic formularies of the sixteenth century. As in theology they had found their true point of departure in the Apostle's Creed, so in worship they went back to the earliest known liturgies. The defects of the Palatinate service-book made the development more striking in worship than in theology, but as in each case there was an effort to enter into the catholic life of all ages, so in neither was there any conscious repudiation of their own denominational life. That sufficiently declared itself, indeed, in the perfect freedom of congregations, which none thought of abridging, to use or reject whatever might be offered them. The thing aimed at seems to have been to make Catholic worship possible under the conditions which history had imposed on them. It was nine years before even a "provisional liturgy" was set forth, in 1857. This was far from satisfying its compilers, but they generally believed it to be a true altar service. On the other hand, its fidelity to the principles of the Reformation was attested when the most Protestant of them all declared that it was "what the original framers of the Palatinate Liturgy would have made it had they lived and labored in such a period as ours."

But men to whom the Reformation had always appeared to be a reproduction of primitive Christianity, and a finality, and who especially valued the inorganic pulpit form-books of the continental Calvinists for their repudiation of "the pope and his idolatrous mass and demon worship," must sooner or later resist such tendencies as were perceptible in the provisional liturgy. When, therefore, the work of revising and perfecting this book was undertaken by the Eastern Synod in 1861, a hopeless diversity of views was soon manifest, though the advocates of an altar service were largely in the majority. The union between the Eastern and Western portions of the Church, effected in 1863, made the strength of the two parties nearly equal, and while the newly formed General Synod recommended the completion of the revision, it authorized the Western Synod to prepare a liturgy of its own. The former task was accomplished by the old committee in a manner agreeable to Dr. Nevin and his friends, resulting in the production of a book called "The Order of Worship," in 1866. Having been provisionally authorized by the local judicatory, this liturgy was laid before the General Synod, where it encountered a strong opposition from the Low Churchmen of the West and their Eastern allies. By a very small majority, however, it was declared a book "proper to be used," and appeared as a liturgy "for" the Reformed Church in 1867. This action did not put an end to the struggle. In 1869 the General Synod even took a vote on the question of final dissolution, a step for which many were prepared, and for several years longer a disruption seemed imminent. It will be observed that the opponents of "The Order of Worship" were not resisting the imposition of obnoxious phraseology upon themselves, for that had never been attempted. What they sought evidently was to free themselves and the Church from responsibility for formulas which embodied, as they thought, unscriptural and dangerous doctrine. They were trying, like certain other conscientious and zealous men, to extirpate "Romanizing germs." Their position, even though mistaken, was both intelligible and respectable. As long as Christians suppose that toleration implies approval, and that any opinions which a believer in Christ can hold are "soul-destroying" or heretical, they must be intolerant sometimes. The fact that the position in question was maintained so resolutely no doubt proves that alternative forms in worship are not a sure preventive of dissensions. But, on the other hand, there can be no doubt that they did in this case prevent schism, and a schism which would have been an almost unmixable calamity. The old territorial division would not have been reproduced, but numerous congregations, East and West, would have been divided and weakened, while the Mercersburg movement would have been obstructed by a new sectarian barrier. Nor could the Protestant Episcopal Church have seemed to the Mercersburg Catholics a safe refuge from sectarianism, for it was torn by the same dissensions, with an actual schism impending. And the vigor of denominational life, which held the Reformed Church together through these violent convulsions, suggests the thought that Christian societies of such strong vitality may have a contribution to make to the Catholic Church by means of their corporate character, and enforces the wisdom of not acting as if unity depended on their disintegration.

The conflict was practically ended not far from the time when the crisis in our own communion was passed. The Synod of 1875, as we are told by Dr. E. V. Gerhart, Theological Professor at Lancaster, (now the seat of the old Mercersburg Seminary,) was "comparatively calm and harmonious." In 1878 the Synod, frankly recognizing the existence of parties, constituted a "Peace Commission" representing both sides. The commission reached a unanimous result, which was "unanimously adopted by a rising vote" at the Synod of 1881. Undoubtedly the old opponents still differ, but we have their joint testimony that their controversies have brought them, as a body, "to a deeper apprehension of the truth." And in the explicit repudiation at once of the Roman and the Pietistic conceptions of the Church, in the clear statement of the doctrine that "in the use of the holy sacraments the grace signified" is imparted to believers, though to them only, and in the assertion that the Christian life exists beyond and beneath consciousness, we find evidence that the Mercersburg movement has influenced the whole Church, without prejudice to its essentially Protestant character. But, after all, the real triumph of Catholicity lies in the "amicable adjustment" made for the sake of Christ and the Church, by men who continue to hold in many respects the relative position of High Anglicans and Evangelicals.

The value of this adjustment was promptly tested. The Peace Commission recommended the preparation of a new liturgy, and the task was put into their hands. At the triennial session of the General Synod, in 1884, a "Directory of Worship" was submitted and approved. It must now be acted on by the classes (corresponding to presbyteries, and fifty-two in number), and the result will be declared in 1887. Favorable action by the necessary two-thirds of the classes is hoped for, with the gradual adoption of the book by the several congregations. The new liturgy is confessedly a compromise. Two or three examples may serve to show how much has been yielded on one side, and how much has been accepted on the other. In the Communion Office, the Invocation, as it now stands in the "Order of Worship," had to be defended by Dr. Nevin, in 1867, against the charge of teaching transubstantiation. It appears in the "Directory of Worship" without essential change. The next prayer was said by an opponent to imply the sacrifice of the mass, and here we have a change. The prayer begins in the Order as follows: "And be pleased now, O most merciful Father, graciously to receive at our hands this memorial of the blessed sacrifice of Thy Son; in union with which we here offer and present unto Thee, O Lord, the reasonable sacrifice of our own persons; consecrating ourselves," etc. In the Directory we find, "And be pleased now, O most merciful Father, to accept our sacrifice of thanksgiving and praise, which we here offer unto Thee, in union with this memorial of the blessed sacrifice of Thy Son; consecrating ourselves," etc. The implication that the "memorial" is itself an offering to God is obscured, if not removed. In the Baptismal Office substantially the same blessings are asked for in both liturgies, but the later one expresses less distinctly the assurance that they will now be bestowed. The prayer of thanksgiving is in both books to a large extent identical with ours, though both avoid the use of the word, "regenerate," which Dr. Nevin, not unreasonably, thought ambiguous. He, however, wished the Office clearly to set forth the grace of baptism as being always, to infants, "a real Divine gift and power of sonship." Accordingly, the prayer in question begins thus, in the Order: "We yield Thee hearty thanks, most merciful Father, that it hath pleased Thee, through the mystery of Thy holy Baptism, to deliver this child from the power of darkness, and to translate him into the kingdom of Thy dear Son, in whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins." The Directory has simply "to vouchsafe unto this child Thy holy Baptism." The High Churchmen of the Reformed Church have here made a concession which those of the Protestant Episcopal Church found impossible. They have not, however, renounced their theology; they merely admit that, for the purposes of worship, the expression of the essential Christian dogma is enough. And their sacrifice is made in the interest of (voluntary) uniformity as an aid to unity, and is, so far, their testimony to the value of uniformity. Nor do they regard the concession as wholly on one side. In the unanimous opinion of the classis of Lancaster, of which Dr. Gerhart is an influential member, and within the limits of which Dr. Nevin himself is resident, the new book is characterized "by both the distinctive life and the devotional language of the older production," and "is far in advance of any liturgy on which the whole [Reformed] Church, East and West, has ever united." If so, the lofty conception of worship for which Dr. Nevin contended is, in his lifetime, virtually approved by his communion as a whole. To have accomplished so much without a schism, is a large compensation for sacrifices in matters of detail.

It is, however, noteworthy that in spite of a liturgical tendency, powerful, persistent and nearly universal for almost forty years, free prayer, except in the sacramental office, appears still to be the rule in the (German) Reformed Church. So hard a thing is it to lift a whole denomination to the liturgical standard in practice, and so idle is it to await for the general adoption of any prayer book before grappling seriously with the problem of unity. And on the other hand, as has more than once been proved, notably by the American Methodists, the descent to extemporaneous worship is easy and rapid. Arbitrary legislation in either case would only make matters worse. But legislation in behalf of a prayer book already in use, legislation supported by the general sentiment enforced with due regard for scruples of conscience, and, while requiring the use of the forms provided, not absolutely excluding free prayer, may be of real service in checking individual aberrations. Such a check we Episcopalians are practically unanimous in desiring; we do not desire to begin that downward course from which return is so difficult. Now this has a most important bearing on the question of unity. Could that be achieved by the simple comprehension of other Christians within our communion, the result would be to revolutionize our legislature, the General Convention, and might lead to canonical and constitutional changes which would be followed by a new schism. If unity is to come soon it must come by some method which will reserve to us, and therefore reserve to others, what we may call the right of municipal legislation. Such a method was proposed in the Muhlenberg Memorial.

WM. G. ANDREWS.

LETTER FROM ROME.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.]

ROME, August 8th, 1885.

The holding of a consistory at the end of July for the creation of new cardinals, which involves a series of fatiguing ceremonies lasting well on to a fortnight, and this when the sun is in the Lion, when the heat is even in mild summers excessive, when every one flies from Rome, and when repose is absolutely necessary to avoid the effects of the most unhealthy season of the Roman year, is a thing altogether unparalleled. I have searched the records of previous consistories during many years past, and can find none held later than the month of June, or earlier than the middle of September.

But the circumstances in this case were altogether exceptional. While the contention regarding the nomination to the vacant Archbishopric of Dublin was at its height, and while the Irish bishops were still assembled here, the pope summoned Archbishop Moran from Sydney to Rome. It was asserted that Leo XIII. intended to solve the difficulties connected with the Dublin archbishopric by passing over the three names sent in and translating the Archbishopric of Sydney to that see. This aroused a storm of Irish opposition. Dr. Walsh was the favorite nominee of the Irish clergy and of the National party. They would have Dr. Walsh, and no one but Dr. Walsh. But at the same time it was denied that the pope intended making Dr. Moran Archbishop of Dublin, and as to his having been summoned to Rome, the Vatican, it was declared, knew nothing whatever of any such summons. That he was summoned is now proved beyond the possibility of dispute by the facts that he left Sydney at once for Rome, and that he arrived here on the 16th of July; but what he was summoned for will continue to be a matter of dispute. He was certainly not sent for only to be made a cardinal in Rome at the end of July, at more or less the risk of his life. Consistories, as I have said, are not held at this season of the year. Moreover, he would have been informed on the subject before starting, instead of learning it by telegram from the Irish College on arriving at Suez. We should have known of it in Rome, for no secret is made as to the pope's intentions regarding new cardinals from the moment he has formed them. And again, there was no necessity whatever for summoning Dr. Moran to Rome to make him a cardinal. At almost every consistory the pope creates new cardinals in the persons of ecclesiastics, archbishops, or bishops, who at the time are distant from Rome, in their respective dioceses, and who do not come to Rome until months, and even years, afterward.

On the 29d of June the Osservatore Romano officially announced the pope's intention of conferring a red hat and the dignity of cardinal upon Monsignor Moran, Archbishop of Sydney. This was a surprise, but it was at once looked upon by those qualified to judge, such as diplomats accredited to the Holy See and ecclesiastics of high standing, as affording proof of the assertion that the pope intended to make him Archbishop of Dublin, and that His Holiness in order to give, in face of the outcry for Dr. Walsh, greater dignity to Dr. Moran, had determined to send him to Dublin cardinal archbishop at once, rather than wait to confer that higher dignity upon him until some time after he had occupied the see, as in the cases of Archbishops Cullen and McCabe. But only two days later another and greater surprise was given—though not publicly announced through the press—namely, that the pope had appointed Dr. Walsh to the archbishopric of Dublin. The morning after this appointment was made I met one of the best-informed among the ministers plenipotentiary accredited to the Holy See. "Well," I said, "and what do you think of the pope's nomination of Dr. Walsh to the See of Dublin?" "This," he replied, "is the first I have heard of it, and, to speak frankly, I fear you have been misinformed." So much surprised was he that I could not induce him to believe that my information was authentic. The pope's decision was a very sudden one. He had taken this matter of the archbishopric of Dublin entirely into his own hands. During the long time the appointment remained in suspense he had never once given the slightest indication to any one as to what his decision was likely to be, and, when he had finally decided, the authorities of the Propaganda, in which department the naming of foreign archbishops and bishops lies, were by no means the first informed on the subject, and were as much surprised as others. But great pressure had been brought to bear on the pope. He had been unwilling to displease the British Government by appointing Dr. Walsh against their wishes, but when the Gladstone Cabinet fell he was informed that the objection among the members of that cabinet to Dr. Walsh had been by no means unanimous. Messrs. Dilke and Chamberlain being "amuzzed," took means, it is stated, for letting the pope know that they had been in favor of Dr. Walsh. This, of course, was a bid for the Irish vote at the approaching elections. Moreover, the pope was informed that a monster meeting was to be held at Dublin, at which a resolution was to be passed calling upon him to appoint Dr. Walsh, and expressing their determination to have no one else. This would have placed the pope in a false position, whichever way he decided, and such a meeting had to be prevented. Finally and simultaneously Cardinal Manning who, with other members of the Roman Catholic Episcopate in England, has strenuously supported the candidature of Dr. Walsh and the views of the Irish National Party, wrote a letter to Leo XIII. on the subject, couched in the strongest terms—they were described by the diplomat who gave me the information as violent—and they set forth that if Dr. Walsh was not appointed a schism would follow. This turned the scale, and the pope there and then decided to give the Archbishopric of Dublin to Dr. Walsh, and to confer the purple on Dr. Moran and a cardinal on Australia, for there is every reason to expect that in the same way and by long usage the appointment to the Archbishopric of Paris, or Vienna, or Madrid on the Continent of Europe, or by more recent usage that to the Archbishopric of Dublin includes a red hat and a seat in the Sacred College to the new possessor; so will the Archbishopric of Sydney, as it is perfectly understood is to be the case with regard to that of New York. The burning question, then, of the appointment to the vacant See of Dublin is finally settled for, it may be hoped, a long time to come. A good deal more importance has been attached to this matter than it merits. The Archbishop of Dublin, whoever he may be, is no doubt a personage who can by his position exercise considerable influence, but with all that, by no means so much as can afford a justification of the choice of him being made, as in this last instance, a question of such high and vital political importance.

It is reassuring to note, however, that the appointment of Dr. Walsh is already considered, by many who opposed it strenuously, as likely to turn out much more satisfactory than was anticipated. Undoubtedly he has strong views regarding Ireland's wrongs and Irish rights, but he is by no means the firebrand he has been represented during the fever heat of the contention over the see he has been called to fill, and no sooner had he arrived in Rome for his consecration than again a surprise awaited us in learning that before leaving Dublin he had called upon Lord Carnarvon, the new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that perfectly good relations existed between them.

THE CHURCH IN CANADA.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.

That old standing ecclesiastical suit Wright vs. Synod of Huron, which has now been before the courts for over two years, is to be carried to the Privy Council of England. Of the five Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, whence the case was carried, four were evenly divided, while the fifth was undecided, but finally cast his vote against the plaintiff. Rev. Mr. Wright is endeavoring to raise funds among the clergy and laity of Huron to enable him to carry the case to England. The bone of contention is whether our synods have a legal right to vote away an annuity once granted to a certain class of clergymen. Another contention of the plaintiff's sets forth that the canon was informally passed in synod, and is therefore intrinsically invalid.

A correspondence has commenced in the Toronto Mail, started by the Rev. G. B. Morley, of West Mono, Diocese of Toronto, on the decadence of the Church of England in Canada. Several letters have appeared, written from varying standpoints, some attributing the present state of affairs to "sacerdotalism," others to the lack of training, etc., etc. Mr. Morley had given notice of a motion on the subject at the last Toronto Synod.

While I by no means admit the fidelity of the very gloomy picture drawn by Mr. Morley, there is no use denying that the Church of England has not been as prosperous in Canada as the circumstances of the case have warranted, or rather demanded. With all the prestige of the old land to back her up, in possession of at least three-fourths of the "upper" or wealthy classes, and generously aided by all the great English missionary societies, she should have been, by all odds, the strongest non-Roman body in the dominion to-day, whereas she stands fourth (Roman Catholic, 1,750,000; Methodists, 750,000; Presbyterians, 600,000; Church of England, 300,000). And it is safe to say that she has lost, within the last fifty years, at least half a million of her members to various forms of dissent.

Now the cause of this in bygone days is plain enough. The superior elegance of the Methodist system enabled them to cover the ground and to follow the settlers into the backwoods, while the Church, bound hand and foot with red tape, and perfectly helpless to accommodate herself to the peculiar circumstances of the case, was left hopelessly behind. So much for the past. The present trouble consists in the almost total inability of our people for self help. Accustomed for so many years to the generous assistance of the mother Church, and never as yet having had forcibly brought home to them the fact that the Church in Canada, to use a homely phrase, must henceforth stand upon its own bottom, our people, in the matter of self-organization, are as helpless as children, and in that of giving are at least ten degrees behind every other denomination in the country. And till they learn this, till they realize that the Church's welfare, nay, her very existence, is dependent upon them and upon them alone, till they learn that their own shoulders must bear their own burden, the present unhappy state of affairs will remain, and the Church in Canada will lag in the race.

The next Canadian Church Congress will be held in Montreal, October 20th, 21st, and 22d. The opening services will be held on Tuesday, 20th, when Bishop Harris will preach. The programme is unusually long and interesting. Papers upon "Sisterhoods," "The Unity of Christendom," "Personal Religion," "Foreign and Domestic Missions," will be read. The proceedings will be participated in by Bishops Harris, Littlejohn, Hugh Miller Thompson, Baldwin, McLean, Sullivan, and Lewis, the Rev. Dr. Courtney, Canon Dumoulin, Messrs. S. H. Blake, q. c., Professor Johnstone, and others. Judging from its agenda paper, this congress promises to be by far the most important and representative of the three yet held in Canada. We may congratulate ourselves, moreover, that the congress has evidently become a permanent institution.

At a recent meeting of the Fredericton Diocesan Church Society it was announced that the S. P. G. had decided to withdraw $1,700 of their annual grant. It was also decided to endeavor to raise a "Bishop Medley Scholarship Fund" in commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of the consecration of the metropolitan, who with the coadjutor are at present engaged on a confirmation tour.

The Rev. Dr. Lobley, late principal of Lennoxville College has returned to England. The enormous parish of the Rev. Mr. Bliss, one of the best missionaries in the Canadian Church, situate on the Upper Ottawa River, is to be divided at once and a clergyman of the diocese of Algoma will take charge of the western half. The result of this arrangement will be that three new stations will be opened for Sunday service.

ENGLAND.

THE LIVERPOOL RITUAL PROSECUTION.—In the ritual prosecution case against the Rev. J. Bell Cox, perpetual curate of St. Margaret's, Liverpool, Lord Penzance, on Friday, July 31st, after a pro forma hearing of evidence, held the articles all proved, and ordered a motion to issue, returnable on September 24th. Lord Penzance stated that "should the defendant fail to obey the admonition, and neglect the suspension which must follow, there would be nothing for it but that the defendant must go to prison." The whole affair is regarded with increasing contempt in England. It is very doubtful if the judge's threat will ever be carried out.

AN OLD HISTORIC CHURCH.—The old historic church of Bellingham, North Tyne, with its unique stone roof, so well known to the antiquaries of the North, was recently reopened. The building has been the witness of many a border fray, and according to the old chronicler it was one of the spots where the monks rested awhile with the body of St. Cuthbert when they fled from Holy Island. It has now been thoroughly renovated, but not altered. The stone roof and pillars are seen to perfection. Open seats of the best pitch pine have been placed in the church, and the floor laid with tiles.

MEMORIAL OF GRACE DARLING.—The vicar of Bamfborough, the Rev. A. O. Mead, pleaded about two years ago for aid to enable him to restore the monument in Bamfborough churchyard, erected by public subscription to the memory of Grace Darling, by the substitution of a new effigy of the heroine for that which the sea and wind storms have so considerably fretted away. He has now accomplished his aim, under the guidance of Mr. F. R. Wilson, Diocesan Surveyor, Alnwick. Fortunately the sculptor of the first effigy, Mr. Raymond Smith, is still living, and from the same model has carved a second figure, identically the same as to the attitude of repose on a plaited mattress, with her ear by her side, and maidenly simplicity of raiment, but differing in the kind of stone. A stained glass window by Messrs. Clayton & Bell, glass painters to the Queen, has also been placed in her memory. This is the three-light window at the north end of the north transept of the venerable parish church. The subscriptions, which come from all parts, including nearly £30 in pence at the Fisheries Exhibition and a contribution from Mrs. Wilson, the Grace Darling of America, covered the amount of the architect's estimate for the restoration of the monument—namely, £100.—John Bull GRIEVANCE OF THE ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.—The English Churchman and St. James's Chronicle, the organ of the extreme Low Church wing of the Evangelicals, still continues to be grieved at the actions of some of its once favorite bishops. In its issue of July 30th, it descants "more in sorrow than in anger" on certain appointments made by the Bishops of Rochester and Exeter, with whom the English Churchman is grievously disappointed. Bishop Thorold "passing by trustworthy and excellent clergy-men with claims on him for promotion, has again and again bestowed livings and dignities on men whose chief delight is to upset the Protestant faith in the Church of England." The special offence of the Bishop of Rochester is the appointment of a member of the English Church Union as Rural Dean of Clapham. "And yet," The English Churchman plaintively says: "Dr. Thorold promised to be a decidedly protestant bishop." Bishop Bickersteth of Exeter has grieved the soul of The English Churchman by appointing an advocate of toleration to a prebendal stall in Exeter Cathedral. A few weeks ago the bishop gave an archdeaconry to a High Churchman, and this second offence causes The English Churchman to remonstrate in touching terms: "When an Evangelical bishop promotes to posts of honor clergymen such as Mr. Tudor, he must expect, by such acts, to give pain and grief to his Evangelical friends, and cause High Churchmen to rejoice that Mr. Gladstone appointed him Bishop of Exeter."

THE REV. DR. C. R. HALE'S ADDRESS TO THE CENTRAL COUNCIL.—At the meeting of the Central Council of Diocesan Conferences, held on Wednesday, July 23d, the Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale of Baltimore was present. The council was discussing the question of the Church and Emigration, and Dr. Hale was invited to address the council.

Dr. Hale said he was secretary of the commission of the General Convention on Ecclesiastical Relations with Foreign Churches, but he did not regard his office as placing upon him any special duties with regard to the Church of England, for he could not treat the English Church as a foreign one. His belief was that if the policy of the government in the last century had allowed the American Church to be properly constituted with an episcopate of her own, instead of having to send her candidates for orders to England—a voyage at that time so perilous that out of every hundred who crossed the Atlantic only eighty returned—the two countries might in the providence of God have parted; but the separation would have come about in a friendly manner, and not as the result of a long and bloody war. Happily any bitterness of feeling which that war had engendered had long since been forgotten, and now American Churchmen felt almost as if we were all of one country and of one Church. Indeed the kindness which as an American clergyman he had received in this country made him feel not less an American but almost an Englishman. That he knew was a very common feeling. He deeply regretted that, partly from ignorance and partly from carelessness, American Churchmen had been led to acquiesce in a title which the Church of Ireland was now protesting against—that of the "Protestant Episcopal Church," but whatever their legal name might for a little while longer remain (and he did not think it would be for long) they really were the Church in America. A title of that kind was not merely a great honor, but it involved a great responsibility. If they really were the Church of America, it would be shameful to them if they did not strive to the very utmost in their power to gain the position which such a title laid on them. And that they were trying to do. They were doing their very best to help emigrants, and they were meeting with some success. Thus in New York the service was said nine times every Sunday in some other language except English, whereas he was told that in London the only foreign languages in which it was said were French and Italian. In Philadelphia it was also said in several foreign languages, including Chinese. Thus they were trying to do something for the foreigners who came amongst them, and he prayed God that he would help them to do more. They felt bound to it by a sense of the gratitude which they owed to the Church of England, and especially to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, to whose nursing care they owed so much when they were themselves strangers in a strange land. They were also actuated by a conviction that their immigrants, if a source of strength, were also a source of danger to their country. People came to America and were invested with a political power which they did not know how to use, and which they often used badly. Persons sometimes asked America why she did not manage her Irish better, but when England learned how to manage her five millions and a half of Irish population, America might learn how to deal with her six millions. At present those six millions were Roman Catholics; but what would they be in the next century! God alone knew. The danger was that the Union might have to deal not with six millions of Roman Catholics, but with ten or twelve millions of infidels. Therefore it was that Americans had a distinct interest in the spiritual care of her immigrants; and the general adoption of the system of commendatory letters would be the greatest possible help. His old friend, the Bishop of Iowa, had expressed a wish in his diocesan paper that persons coming to live in that State should write to him, and he promised to do his best to find some one to minister to them. In a few days he (Dr. Hale) would be going to Sweden to request the clergy there, on behalf of Bishop Perry, that when their people came to his diocese they would give the commendatory letters to the clergy.

SCOTLAND.
THE COADJUTOR-ELECT OF MORAY AND ROSS.—The election of Bishop Kelly as Coadjutor-Bishop of Moray, Ross and Caithness, seems to have excited some opposition, both within and outside that diocese. There does not seem to be any objection to Bishop Kelly personally, but the feeling is growing against the election of any more persons in purely English orders to fill Scottish Sees. While it is probable that the election will be confirmed by the College of Bishops, appeals have been made to the bishops to disapprove the choice, chiefly on that ground.

AUSTRALIA.
CHURCH PROGRESS IN MELBOURNE.—Of the Diocese of Melbourne, in the colony of Victoria, the Church of English Messenger remarks, that "from 1870 to 1883 there has been continuous and steady growth, and last year a decided 'spring forward' was taken in every direction." The number of clergy in 1870 was 103; in 1883, 121; in 1884, 131. Churches in 1870, 185; in 1883, 231; in 1884, 257. Persons confirmed in 1870, 1,286; in 1883, 1,797; in 1884, 2,339. Communicants in 1870, 7,305; in 1883, 11,136; in 1884, 13,342.

NEW ZEALAND.

THE MAORI MISSIONS.—There are at the present time fourteen Maori churches in the diocese of Wellington, with two English clergymen and four native deacons, whose time is devoted to ministering to the natives, while there are about thirty-five lay readers assisting these. There are many places in which, though there is no church, divine service is regularly held.

VERMONT.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—We gather the following statistics from the journal of the ninety-fifth convention, there being no table of diocesan statistics besides the abstracts of the reports: Clergy, including the bishop, 35; parishes and missions, 51; baptisms, 337; confirmations, 185; communicants, 8,650; Sunday-school scholars, 1,699. The address of the bishop is confined to matters of diocesan interest.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON—Clerical Retreat.—The annual retreat of the clergy, which for some years past has been held in Haverhill, will this year be held in or near Boston about the middle of September, and will be conducted by the Rev. A. C. A. Hall. Full particulars in regard to the retreat will be given as soon as possible.

RHODE ISLAND.

APPOINTEE—St. Barnabas's Church.—This church for the past few months has been in charge of the Rev. Percy Barnes, previously connected with Zion chapel, New York. Notwithstanding the depressed condition of business, the parish is in a prosperous condition, and the congregation has much increased. The wood-work of the church has been oiled and re-stained, adding much to its appearance. In a recent visit to New York Mr. Barnes purchased a large bell, which will soon be hung in the belfry and doing its appointed work. Mr. Barnes has also made himself active and successful in starting a library.

CONNECTICUT.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—We find statistics as follows in the journal of the last convention, 1885: Clergy, including the bishop, 193; parishes, churches, chapels and missions, 169; ordinations, 18; candidates for Orders, 24; churches consecrated, 1; baptisms, 1,866; confirmations, 780; communicants, 22,033; Sunday-school scholars, 15,958; offerings, $428,970.47. Besides the address on diocesan affairs, the bishop's historical sermon at the opening of the convention is published with the journal, and it has appeared in our columns.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Church of the Holy Cross.—For several years the clergy of the Holy Cross, who have been doing an important missionary work among the poor people of the East-side tenements, both German and English-speaking, have held regular Church services in the neighborhood of Tompkins Square, using such rooms as could be obtained. The St. John the Baptist Foundation, a corporation of this city, of which Mr. Francis H. Weeks is treasurer, began last May the erection of a new church on the west side of Avenue C, between Third and Fourth streets, to be used for these services. The building is now nearly finished, and it will be consecrated on the 14th of next month. Mr. Henry Vaughn of Boston is the architect. The lot measures fifty three feet front on the street by ninety feet in depth, and is almost entirely covered by the building. Owing to the nature of the ground, piles had to be driven for the foundations to rest upon, and there is no more basement than is sufficient to accommodate the coal vaults and heating apparatus. The style of the building is English-gothic, the materials of the front being brick and light sandstone, and the interior being sand-finished. It will seat six hundred persons, and will cost, exclusive of the ground, between $35,000 and $40,000. With the exception of about $10,000 subscribed by outsiders, this money has been given by members of the Foundation.

It is expected that the church will be incorporated under the Free Church Act, and will then be deeded over by the Foundation to the church corporation. The name of the church will probably be the Church of the Holy Cross. Father Huntington, the superior of the order of that name, will take charge of the work. As the parishioners are all poor people, the church cannot be self-supporting, and it is hoped that the public will contribute at least a part of the $6,000 a year needed to carry on the work. The members of the St. John the Baptist Foundation, having given the same field, wish to beguile other laborers in the same field, and cannot assume the permanent support of the enterprise. The work is among a class of people who are not reached by any other organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and who stand in urgent need of Christianizing influence.—Evening Post.

NEW YORK — Grace Parish Summer Home.—This parish some weeks since opened its summer home at Far Rockaway. The house is a delightful one, having an air of comfort and cheeriness which gives it indeed every feeling of home. The average family is about seventy, the stay of the children being from three to six weeks. The number of children provided for in the course of the summer is about two hundred, the ages ranging from a few weeks to ten or twelve years. The children have various amusements, such as games of different kinds, swings, croquet, and bathing.

In addition to the children, the house accommodates from twenty-five to thirty adults, who remain from two to three weeks, as their necessities require. The general good health, contentment, and happiness of the household speak for themselves of the benefits of the home. The house is in charge of Miss Wiltzie, who has so long had the care of the children in Grace House, in this city. It may be added that parties of children from the parish are two or three times a week taken down to Coney Island for a day's excursion.

NEW YORK—The Aneke Jans Suit against Trinity Church.—This old and spasmodically-reviving attempt to wrest from Trinity parish the value of a tract of land of about one hundred and thirty acres lying west of Broadway, between Chambers and Christopher streets, and stretching from Broadway to the Hudson River, has again been temporarily galvanised. A meeting of the New Jersey heirs of Mrs. Aneke Jans Bogardus was held in Newark, N. J., on Wednesday, August 19th. There were about thirty or thirty-five persons present, among them Mrs. Eunna H. Wallace, who is to be the plaintiff this time, and her counsel. The object of the meeting was to see whether the New Jersey heirs of Mrs. Bogardus would unite with the New York heirs in prosecuting a suit that has been begun in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York by Emma H. Wallace against the Rector, Wardens, and Vestrymen of Trinity Church, New York, to recover the value of the tract of land above mentioned. Trinity church claims title by virtue of a grant from Queen Anne in 1704, and the descendants of Mrs. Bogardus claim that she had prior grants from Governors Van Twiller, Stuyvesant, and Nichols. Mr. Hutchins, Mrs. Wallace's counsel, stated that Trinity church's grant in 1704 was never signed and sealed, and Governor Nichols of New York, the English governor, had given Aneke Jans a confirmatory grant. He said Trinity church had no legal title to the Jans property, and he thought he had hit on a plan to recover that property that will hold. Just what that plan was he did not care to say. He had advised Mrs. Wallace that the best way to proceed was to form a combination of the heirs, and if they were successful the property should be divided pro rata among them. He proposed that each heir should pay $50 per year, and he thought that in three or four years the matter would be disposed of. He did not say that the effort would positively be successful, but there was a large representation of the heirs, and if Trinity church could get a release from these heirs that corporation would be willing to give a large sum for that release. He believed that such an effort would get a very large compromise from Trinity church, as she would be willing to give a large sum to get valid title to that to which she now has no title except what arises from adverse possession. The plea that now is filed will have to be withdrawn, as it is verbatim copy of a plea that was filed in a suit in the New York State Courts, and decided some years ago, and it would be simply folly to go on under this plea.

Mr. Hutchins also said he had agreed with Mrs. Wallace that he would take her case and examine into the validity of her claim and give an opinion for $300, and then $150 per month for all actual work. While he was idle he did not ask for any pay. He would be two or three months in preparing his bill, and during that time would expect $150 per month, but while he was waiting for the decision of the court he should not expect any pay.

The enthusiasm of the meeting was not very great, and very few of those present seemed hopeful of success. The meeting was adjourned for two weeks, when it will probably be concerned whether or not the New Jersey heirs of Mrs. Bogardus will consent to support Mrs. Wallace in her suit.

NEW YORK — Calvary Parish Summer Home.—This parish, (the Rev. Dr. H. Y. Satterlee, rector,) opened its Summer home at Far Rockaway on the first of July, the privileges of the home being granted to sick children, to mothers with sick infants, to poor children, as also to aged and poor women, to girls and young women who cannot afford to pay the usual high prices charged for board in the country or at the sea-shore, and to those not connected with the parish, but recommended by parishioners. Of the others, all are required to be connected with the parish. Persons able to do so are expected to pay some thing for board. The price for adults, above sixteen is, including travelling expenses, $4.00 per week, and $2.00 for children. These prices, however, are modified by the pastor. Those unable to pay anything are taken free. According to the rules of the home no boys over fourteen are admitted unless in special cases of sickness, while no gentlemen are taken under any circumstances. The regular time of stay is from Saturday to Saturday. Whenever possible and desired, however, the time may be extended two weeks, and in case of sickness even longer. The parties start at twelve o'clock on Saturdays.

According to the matron's rules, which must be observed by all, old and young, family prayers must be attended morning and evening by all, as also service at St. John's church at least once on Sunday, unless prevented by sickness. No bathing is allowed on Sunday, and no one must leave the grounds without the consent of the matron. "There must be love and kindness on the part of all, and an unselfish spirit which will seek to help others for Christ's sake."

The parish first rented a small house at Far Rockaway last year, which was opened for three months, the total number of residents being one hundred and eighty-one, and of visitors for the day, forty-five. The house could only accommodate twenty-five all told, and the result was much inconvenience. This year a larger house has been rented, the number of persons accommodated being from forty to fifty weekly. The parish has a building fund amounting to $2,700, and hopes in time to have a building of its own. The work embraces a relief department and includes the members of all the parish. It is under the immediate charge of the Rev. Floyd W. Tompkins, Jr., minister in charge of Calvary Chapel.

NEW YORK—Visit of Archdeacon Farrar.—The following statement appears in one of the New York daily papers as coming from the Rev. Dr. Wildes:

Dr. Farrar will probably arrive at Quebec on or about September 11th. He goes thence to Montreal, Niagara, and Chicago. Returning eastward, he visits Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, at the latter city delivering lectures in the course known as the Griswold Lectures. He will be in New York on Saturday, October 17th, passing the interval between that and the 20th at Riverdale-on-Hudson, as the guest of the Rev. Dr. George D. Wildes, rector of Christ church. On Monday, accompanied by Archdeacon Vesey, of Huntington, England, he goes with Dr. Wildes to attend the annual session of the Church Congress in New Haven, Conn.

On Tuesday, October 20th, Archdeacon Farrar will be one of the speakers in the Congress on the topic "The Christian Doctrine of the Atonement." On Wednesday, the 21st, he, with Archdeacon Vesey, will probably take part in discussing the topic entitled, "The Grounds of Church Unity." If remaining during the entire session, which closes on Friday afternoon, he will then return to New York as the guest of Cyrus W. Field until the 30th, when he goes to Boston by invitation of the Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks.

Dr. Wildes expresses the hope that during Dr. Farrar's stay in New York some opportunity will be afforded, at either the Academy of Music or the Metropolitan Opera House, to offer a testimonial of public respect to one who in all ways, and notably in his recent eloquent utterances at Westminster Abbey on the occasion of the Grant memorial service, has conspicuously shown his Christian manliness and equally his cordial sympathy with all that is best in the social life and civil institutions of the United States.

LONG ISLAND

BROOKLYN—St. Ann's Church.—The funeral of the Rev. Edward F. Edwards, who died at the age of eighty-six years, was held in this church on Friday, August 14th, the Rev. P. L. B. Cross officiating.

Mr. Edwards was a graduate of Oxford University, England, and had been rector of churches in Albany and Cold Spring, N. Y. For a considerable period he has been retired from active duty in the sacred ministry, and during the last ten years has resided in Brooklyn.

NEW JERSEY.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—We find statistics as follows in the journal of the one hundred and thirteenth annual convention: Clergy, including the bishop, 100; churches, missions and chapels, 115; candidates for orders and postulants, 11; ordinations, 3; lay readers, 32; baptisms, 1,187; confirmed, 641; communicants, 9,304; Sunday-school scholars, 8,317; parish school scholars, 191; offerings, $288,498.00. Besides diocesan topics, the bishop in his address treats of "The Book Annexed" and the White Cross movement. Appended to the journal is the memorial of the centennial of the organization of the Church in the State of New Jersey.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

NEWARK—Grace Church.—The organ now in use in this church (the Rev. G. M. Christian, rector), has got very much out of repair, and a new one is to be constructed by L. C. Harrison, New York, successor to Erben & Co., only a few choice registers of the old organ being retained. The new organ will have thirty-eight stops and all the modern improvements, and will be placed in the gallery where the present one now is. The present organ will be used until about the 1st of October, when it will be taken down and the work of putting up the new one will be commenced soon after. In the meantime, a small organ will be put up in the choir to be used until the new one is completed. It is expected that the new instrument will be ready for use by Christmas. The new organ will be unusually strong, both in voicing and mechanical arrangements. It will be much larger, with more pipes and changes in the stops. The keyboard will be arranged as the present instrument.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON—St. John's Church.—Thursday, August 13th, was appointed as the day for laying the corner-stone of a group of new parish buildings for this parish, (the Rev. Dr. T. Gardiner Little, rector). There were present at that date the rector of the parish and the Rev. Messrs. A. A. Benton, P. B. Lightner, J. T. Wright, and S. F. Hotchkiss. A violent storm having come on an hour before the time fixed, it was determined to postpone the service of the laying of the stone to the following Saturday, August 15th. Many of the congregation and the choir being present, however, Evening Prayer was said, and an address delivered by the Rev. S. F. Hotchkiss. He reviewed the history of the Church in Wilmington, referring to its Swedish origin, to the founding of St. John's by Mr. Alexis Lrude du Pont, of French descent, and the ministrations there of four clergymen of English descent, the Rev. Drs. Charles Breck, Stevens Parker, Leighton Coleman, and the present rector. He gave many exceedingly interesting historical facts, thoughtfully drawing from them practical lessons. He appealed to the laity to give their aid gladly to all departments of parish work.

The corner-stone was laid on Saturday, August 15th, at 6:30 P. M. The procession formed in the Sunday-school building and passed around the church in the following order: The vestry of the parish, visitors from neighboring parishes, the vested choir and other singers, followed by the clergy—viz., the rector, and the Rev. Messrs. A. A. Benton, C. E. Murray, Jesse Higgins, and P. B. Lightner. The service was that appointed by the bishop, comprising appropriate psalms, verses, prayers, and hymns.

A list of the contents of the box was read by Mr. Francis G. du Pont, a son of the founder of the parish, as a similar act had been performed by his father, nearly twenty-seven years before, at the laying of the corner-stones of the church. The rector then received the box from him, placed it in the cavity, and striking the stone three times, in the Name of the Holy Trinity, repeated the usual formula. An address was made by the Rev. P. B. Lightner, who spoke earnestly of the great importance of the work. A large congregation manifested great interest and joined heartily in the service.

MARYLAND.

DIOCESAN STATISTICS.—Convention fund, $5,538.28; Committee of Missions, $7,301.34; Committee of Religious Instruction, $892; Supernannated and Disabled Clergy, $1,228.12; other objects within the diocese, $17,303.78; Domestic Missions, $7,488.91; Foreign Missions, $4,831.18; Education for the Ministry, $2,340; other objects without the diocese, $4,817.02; communion alms, $24,021.66; other contributions, exclusive of clerical salaries, $501,962.79; grand total (salaries excepted), $225,984.45; expended "within the cure," $253,900.92.

Parishes, congregations, &c., 183; reporting 127; baptisms, adults, 253, children, 2,484, total, 2,736; burials, 1,394; confirmed, 1,197; communicants gained, 1,536; lost, 1,170; present number, 22,705, or possibly by estimating the strength of the eleven non-reporting parishes, 24,211, a gain of 544 over the year 1884; marriages, 689; parish school teachers, 242; pupils, 2,414; Sunday-school teachers, 1,671; pupils, 16,300; clergy, 163, 8 being deacons. There are ten licensed lay-readers whose licenses terminate, except in special cases, on the first day of June of each year, subject to renewal, on proper application. The bishop has issued regulations for the lay-readers of the diocese, authorizing their use, during ministrations of the sacrosanct, or the academic gowns.

BALTIMORE—St. Luke's Church.—The question is agitated here for making St. Luke's church the cathedral for the diocese, the Rev. Dr. Rankin, for now so many long and useful years its efficient and indefatigable rector, having resigned on account of the infirmities of his honored age, and become, by the unanimous and heartfelt vote of the vestry, the rector emeritus. The Rev. G. W. Harrod is the assistant in this parish, which now numbers over 800 communicants, and raised during the last year the sum of $21,271, twenty thousand of which were necessarily expended within the parish itself. It has, besides the mother-church, which is capable of seating 1,500 people, two chapels, which, with the church, are worth some $135,000, and carry an insurance of $45,000. Parish and school buildings are valued at $15,000. There is an endowment of $14,000. The voice of prayer and praise daily ascends from this most lovely and beautifully appointed church. Sermons last year, 165; celebrations of the Holy Communion, 275. One hundred and thirty parochial school and between five and six hundred Sunday-school pupils make a goodly array of young under constant and vigilant instruction in the Church's ways and mind. No church in the city offers so rare an opportunity, or so rich advantages for becoming the cathedral as St. Luke's. The character of its services, its finely drilled choristers, grand and elegant organ, stately chancel, noble exterior, past traditions, and present outlook mark it out as beyond all question the church for this purpose, if one is to be selected. The Chapel of the Nativity, under the Rev. Mr. Briscoe, is encouraging, and merits the fostering aid which it has received.

BALTIMORE—Grace Church.—The rectorship of this church, vacant since the death of the Rev. Dr. George Leeds, has been filled by the election of the Rev. Channey Bruce Brewster, rector of Christ church, Detroit, Michigan. Mr. Brewster has signified his acceptance of the election, and is expected soon to enter on his duties.

BALTIMORE—Extra Parochial Duty of the Clergy.—Besides parochial duty, a number of the clergy of this city do large outside work: the Rev. A. Harding at Avalon, the Rev. Drs. Stokes, Fair, Gibson, Hall, and Lawrence at the Bayview Asylum, the Rev. J. S. Miller at the Church Home and Infirmary, the Rev. W. S. Jones at the McDonough Institute for boys, and others in other places, as opportunity offers. In some of the most degraded points of the city efforts have been made to reach such as may be reached, and the needs of the seamen, who in this city are numerous, are not neglected.

BALTIMORE—Church Work in Baltimore and Baltimore County.—The Church is everywhere here on the alert. Besides the forty churches there are twenty-five chapels, which aggregate seating capacity for at least 25,000 persons, and are valued at $1,500,000, one congregation (that of the Ascension) having no less than four chapels, all filled and well cared for in all points. Parsonages, 15; value, $210,000; land, school-houses, and other Church property, $45,000. Several congregations enjoy endowments, one of $8,000. Thus is this city, with its "suburbicarian" strength, a diocese, as it were, of itself, and well merits a cathedral.

BALTIMORE—The Colored Work.—St. James's African church rejoices in the number of ninety-two communicants, St. Mary's in four hundred and sixteen. The former church seats one hundred and seventy, the latter several hundred. Some $2,000 are raised yearly at these points for Church work. At the Vinton Memorial, South Baltimore, a Sunday-school is maintained, having one hundred and twenty-five pupils and a small corps of teachers.

CHURCHVILLE PARISH—St. James's Church.—Though no less than three other congregations have in recent years grown out of this, the old congregation of this parish, (the Rev. E. A. Colburn, rector), St. James's, still holds its own, with a steady though slow growth. The Church here owns property to the value of $4,000, including church, rectory and glebe. Each of the congregations which have separated from this the parent church is now larger and stronger than the one from which it withdrew.

CHURCHVILLE PARISH—Holy Trinity Church, Churchville.—Here the rector (the Rev. E. A. Colburn), ministers to a flock of several hundred souls, including eighty or more communicants embraced in some forty or fifty families. Church and chapel aggregate property worth at least $8,800, several acres of valuable land being included. The parish or Sunday-school buildings may be considered as nearly $1,000 to the real estate of the vestry. A parish school is conducted, having about fifteen pupils, while in the Sunday-school there are about fifty. A parsonage with six acres, valued at $3,000, adds greatly to the effectiveness of the rector's work in this community.

ST. ANN'S PARISH—St. Ann's Church, Annapolis.—This venerable parish and church holds the even tenor of its way, nearly 5,000 having been the last year raised and applied to its Church work. Three hundred and fifty-five communicants are now enrolled. The superannuated and disabled clergy are not forgotten by the sympathetic rector, and the sum of $46 was raised for that fund. Nearly four hundred pupils are in the Sunday-schools, and a corps of forty teachers aid in this important branch of parish duty. A parochial school of forty pupils is carried on. The property owned by this parish cannot fall very far short of $50,000. The church and chapels accommodate one thousand attendants.

ALL HALLOWS' PARISH.—All Hallows' Church, Davidsonville.—In this parish the rector (the Rev. D. A. Bonnar) effectively carries on a work amongst a wide-spread flock, having a church, which, with the chapel, affords room for about five hundred persons, who, according to ability, give of their means to the amount of about $400, most of which, being needed in the immediate work, is expended therein. A parsonage with three acres of land, of the total value of $2,000, and parochial and Sunday-school buildings, worth in all some $600 or more, adds to the effectiveness of the parish and its work. Distant Nashotah is remembered now and then in the almsgiving of the people. There are about one hundred and fifty communicants included in the numerical strength of this parish.

ANN ARUNDEL COUNTY.—Church Notes.—Christ church, West River, (the Rev. N. P. Dame, rector), St. Peter's, Guilford, (the Rev. O. Marbury, rector), Severn Parish, (the Rev. T. C. Gambrell, rector), St. James's, Tracey Landing, and St. Margaret's, Westminster Parish, (the Rev. Dr. S. Ridout, rector), aggregate about one thousand souls, of whom three hundred and fifty-five are communicants, and by whom are yearly raised some $2,000 toward the work of the Church. The total value of Church property among these five parishes is about $30,000. Three of the parishes possess endowments—viz., St. James's, $2,500; Severn, $1,000; St. Margaret's, $10,000; two have parsonages, one (St. Margaret) has a glebe of seven acres, value $200. These outlying points aggregate one hundred and sixty Sunday-school pupils. One has a missionary supply from a neighboring parish, the rector of Queen Caroline, a parish which lies in the two counties of Ann Arundel and Howard.

CUMBERLAND.—Emmanuel and St. George's Parishes.—About $3,000 were last year raised in these congregations, which aggregate one thousand souls, of whom are four hundred and twenty-five communicants. The Church property here is generally valued at about $40,000, of which Emmanuel is about one half in valuation. This estimate includes churches, chapels, Sunday-school and parish-school buildings, parsonages, and land. The Rev. Messrs. P. N. Meade, and A. C. Haverstick, and the Rev. Dr. J. W. Nott are rectors, and the Rev. Wm. L. Braddock, missionary.

For the new rectory of St. John's, Frostburg, $250 was during its erection obtained from beyond the limits of the parish, the remainder of $700 within. The insurance on the church has been increased from $600 to $1,000. Value of new rectory, $2,300; all Church property is kept under safe insurance.

SILVER SPRING PARISH.—Grace Church, Sigo.—Grace Church, St. John's chapel, Norwood, St. Mark's chapel, (memorial) and St. Mary's, are the points held by the Church in this parish, the Rev. Mr. Averitt, rector. The property of the Church here can not be far below $13,000, where but a short time ago not even a church edifice was to be seen; so grows the Church where it will be let grow. Two hundred and twenty or thirty communicants gladden the heart of the faithful priest who is in charge of these works, and no less than at least 7,000 souls are included in his wide-spread care. Four Sunday schools, embracing over a hundred scholars, each school situated so as best to reach the greatest possible number, aid as parts of the parochial machinery, while frequent catechisings and unremitting preaching testify to the indefatigable industry and fidelity of him to whose charge this portion of the field of the Church has been providentially committed.

ST. PETER'S PARISH.—St. Peter's Church, Poolsville.—Desirous of testing its own strength, this parish, (the Rev. H. Thomas, rector), at the commencement of the last missionary year, concluded to relinquish all claim upon the missionary stipend which had been appropriated for it by the Committee on Missions. Though expending the most of its strength for this reason within the parish, yet foreign missions were not forgotten, nor even the Jew neglected. Such sums as could be raised for several diocesan objects (save the Diocesan Missions) were raised. The churches, two in number, and parsonage with three acres, are valued at nearly $7,000. Over one hundred communicants are enrolled, and regular catechising help to give vigor to the Sunday-school work of this parish.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S PARISH.—St. Bartholomew's Church, Brookville.—In this parish, the rector, the Rev. Wm. H. Laird, administers the affairs of the Church among a population which is daily increasing in a knowledge and appreciation of the Church and her services. Under his care are St. Bartholomew's parish, St. John's church, Mechanicsville, St. Luke's church, Brighton, and Unity chapel, Unity. He has care of about seven hundred souls, about one hundred families, with about one hundred and ninety communicants. The vestry owns at these points property valued at $7,500, one church, three neat chapels, and four acres, with a $2,700 parsonage. The mother-parish from time to time distributes garments to the Children's Hospital, Washington, to the Home of the Friendless, Baltimore, as well as within the limits of the parish itself.

INDIANA.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Church Notes.—In this city of nearly one hundred thousand inhabitants the Church has three parishes and three missions. Christ church is the eldest parish, and has a creditable history. It has a substantial stone church accommodating a congregation of six hundred, with chapel and parish rooms attached, and is valued at $70,000. It numbers four hundred communicants. The Rev. Dr. E. A. Bradley, the present rector, has been thirteen years in charge. This parish has under its care St. George's Mission, with a substantial chapel of stone and wood. A Sunday-school of two hundred children, Mr. R. R. Parker, superintendent, and a flourishing mothers' meeting in charge of Mrs. Parker, are connected with this mission. A Sunday evening service is maintained by lay readers from Christ church, and the rector holds a Thursday evening service there. Christ church has a vested choir of thirty men and boys, weekly communion, and frequent week-day services. The Sunday-school numbers about two hundred, and an industrial school of one hundred and fifty girls meets on Saturday afternoons during the winter in the chapel. It is a live and working church. Contributions the past year $9,295.

St. Paul's church (the Rev. Dr. Joseph S. Jencks, rector), has a large brick church, with commodious chancel and beautiful interior, capable of seating nine hundred people, and a fine large brick chapel in the rear of the church. The property is valued at $35,000. It reports a communicant list of three hundred and seventy-nine, and contributions amounting to $5,678 for the conventional year. Its congregations are steadily growing. The Sunday-school under the superintendence of Mr. Aquila Jones, Jr., enrolls one hundred and twenty-five children. St. Paul's church cares for St. James's Mission, with a Sunday-school of one hundred and fifty children, Mr. J. M. Winters, superintendent, meeting on Sunday afternoons in the neat frame chapel. The rector of St. Paul's holds a Sunday evening service there. An industrial school is also connected with this mission.

The third organized parish is Holy Innocents, in the southeastern part of the city among the working-people, formerly a mission of Christ church. It has a neat wooden church building that will accommodate three hundred people. The Rev. W. W. Raymond is rector. There are sixty-six communicants, and a Sunday-school of one hundred and fifty children, a vested choir and orderly service. The congregation is composed of plain, earnest people. Contributions last year amounted to $1,432. This is the only parish in the city having a neat and comfortable rectory. The property is valued at $10,000, on which is a debt of $1,500.

Last comes Grace chapel, with which was formerly connected a flourishing congregation and Sunday-school. The chapel will seat three hundred, and has school-rooms and chapel attached. By misfortunes and financial embarrassments the parish became defunct, and its property came into possession of the diocese. The church was closed for years, and the congregation scattered. In October, 1884, the bishop opened it as his chapel, appointing a pastor, the Rev. A. Prentiss, to gather a congregation and minister to them, assuming personally his support. The chapel is well situated, and already a congregation numbering fifty communicants has been gathered, a Sunday-school of sixty children and a vested choir. The congregation contributes liberally to the support of the work. It is the bishop's intention to have weekly communion and daily service. Two guilds, St. Mary's of women and St. Agnes's of girls, have been working during the year with commendable earnestness, and the outlook is hopeful. A school for girls, it is hoped, will be opened at an early day. Thus it will be seen the Church has six church buildings in Indianapolis, with property valued at $140,000. It has about nine hundred communicants and nine hundred and eighty-five children in its Sunday-schools, ministering also to several public institutions, insane asylum, poor farm, etc., besides holding service in several adjacent towns.

CHICAGO.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—The statistics as given in the journal of the forty-eighth annual convention are as follows: Clergy, including the bishop, 68; parishes and missions, 76; ordinations, 3; churches consecrated, 3; postulants and candidates, 8; lay-readers, 24; baptisms, 1,253; confirmations, 742; communicants, 8,836; Sunday-school scholars, 8,011; contributions, $214,066.54. The bishop in his address, besides diocesan matters, discourses at some length the Book Annexed.

FOND DU LAC.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—The following are the chief statistics as given in the journal of the eleventh annual council: Clergy, including the bishop, 28; parishes and missions, 38; baptisms, 325; confirmations, 279; communicants, 2,382; Sunday-school scholars, 1,307; churches and chapels, 40; rectories, 11; offerings, $32,833.29; value of Church property, $16,136.83. The bishop's address is confined to matters of diocesan interest.

MINNESOTA.

MINNEAPOLIS.—The Sheltering Arms.—The Sheltering Arms of the Diocese of Minnesota, through its president, sends in the following report of its month's work to the August diocesan paper:

"It is with feelings of peculiar pride and joy that we send in our report this month. The transformation at the home, owing to the persistence of the ladies who took the matter in hand, has been very thorough and complete. Order and cleanliness reign supreme in every part of our home, and we ask and invite a visit of inspection from all who are interested in our work. The children are as healthy and happy as only children can be, responding quickly and entirely to the gentle rule and we care of our excellent matron, and no happier sight can be found than our nursery with its beautiful and well-cared-for little inmates. We have room and accommodations for more children, both babies and older children, and would be glad to see the benefits of our home extended to its utmost limits. We find our new system of work very admirable in its details, laying upon each member of the board her own peculiar share of the duties and responsibilities. Thus the talents of all will be called in requisition, and so borne the labor will be more easy and the burden more light.

The long list of donations bears witness to the readiness and fidelity with which our friends have sprung to the relief of our necessities when such help was needed, and we go on with our work with joyful and confident heart, thanking all these for such encouragement.

Since last month we have been favored with two visits from our beloved bishop, one at the home and one at a meeting appointed for the purpose. His words of advice as to our aims in this diocesan work and our methods in conducting it were most Christian and timely, and his commendation and encouragement very heart-cheering.

Our annual report was sent to the council and read by the bishop, who assigned it an honorable place in the convention journal, and recommended that it be printed as a leaflet to be circulated throughout the diocese.

The number of children at present in the home is thirteen. Others are expected in a few days.

We have had no sickness and no deaths during the month, for which exemption we are very thankful."

ST. PAUL.—St. Paul's Church.—This church, (the Rev. E. S. Thomas, rector,) which was closed for repairs, has been reopened. A new roof has been placed upon the church, and the walls painted. The interior decorations are very pleasing. The ceiling is paneled. The sides are a solid gray. The windows are decorated with piscine scrolls. The colors of the chancel are olive green, dark red and bronze. Around the chancel are medallions in gold leaf bearing the emblems of Christ and the apostles. Over the chancel arch is the inscription, "Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." The floor of the sanctuary is laid in tiles. The altar has been raised a third step, the steps thereto tiled in mosaic. A new memorial credence table has been placed on the south side of the altar, and a brass altar rail separates the sanctuary from the choir. A new carpet in dark blue and old gold was presented by the young ladies of the parish. Other parishioners have contributed memorial windows, colored altar cloths, and the proper vestments. A new corona illumines the sanctuary.—Minnesota Missionary.

TEXAS.

CALVERT.—Church of the Epiphany.—The young people of this parish (the Rev. Harry Cassil in charge) gave a lawn fête in the rectory grounds on the evening of Friday, August 14th. A good sum was realized, which, with money from future fêtes, is to be used to defray the expenses of the Christmas tree, for which, heretofore, a begging canvass has been made. The large rectory grounds, nicely adapted to such occasions, were beautifully lighted with Chinese lanterns and reflectors, and were visited during the evening by a large number of people.

On Sunday, August 16th, at 4 P.M., the minister in charge said Evening Prayer and preached on Captain Garrett's convict farm. The Texas convict system is a peculiar one. Not one-half of the unfortunates sent to the penitentiary are confined within the walls, but are hired out to railroads, wood dealers, and planters. Temporary hut strong jails are built by the contracting parties, in which the convicts are confined when not engaged in labor. Work is done in gangs, under guards armed with shot-guns and revolvers. No religious services are held, and all day Sunday the men are kept inside the jail. On Sunday, August 16th, the choir and members of this parish to the number of thirty-three went, with the minister in charge, to hold services on Captain Garrett's plantation. A temporary pulpit had been erected under an old oak tree. Benches were placed in the shade of two other oak trees, a space of about thirty feet separating the seats on the left, occupied by the convicts, from those on the right, occupied by the visitors. A small organ of powerful tone had been brought by the parishioners. The service was the evening service of the Church, except that Psalm cxxx. was sung in place of the Cantate Domino, and the proper prayers from the Office of Visitation of Prisoners were inserted. The hymns were "Rock of Ages" and "Jesus, Saviour of my Soul." The men were, more than anything else, affected by the first hymn. Many of them now listened to the Church service for the first time, but all of them, perhaps without an exception, were familiar with "Rock of Ages," and before the organ prelude was finished some of them were weeping, and as the grand old words of the hymn fell on their ears, nearly all of them seemed to be carried back to other days, when, in the innocence of boyhood, their voices had joined in the beautiful words of this prayerful hymn.

CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Grace Church.—Thirteen years ago this church had as bright a future, humanly speaking, as any parish had. Entirely free from debt, with money in the treasury, with a crowded church and an increasing congregation, with an income that enabled the payment of a $6,000 salary, and with a popular and eloquent rector, the outlook seemed most promising. But there came a change. For some reason or other things went wrong. The parish began to fall behind in its finances, a debt began to accumulate for current expenses, and this, in due course of time, ripened into a full-blown mortgage for $10,000. As a result the congregation began to disperse, and dwindled to a mere handful. The rector became disheartened and resigned, and the opinion prevailed universally that the magnificent church, costing $112,000, which is one of the best specimens of a pure Gothic cathedral in the country, would soon be sold, and pass into the hands of the Chinese for a Joss house. To make matters worse, the parish was without a rector for nearly two years, and all interest seemed completely paralyzed, if not dead. This was the state of things when the vestry determined to make one more effort to save the church. To this end they elected the Rev. R. C. Foute, then of St. Philip's church, Atlanta, Georgia, to the vacant rectorship. After some hesitation he accepted, and in the spring of last year entered on the duties of his new charge. The trials, discouragements, and difficulties with which he had to contend can be better imagined than described; and yet, nothing daunted, he addressed himself zealously and patiently to the herculean task before him. With no thought of self, he devoted all his energies to reanimating the parish. As an evidence of the great transformation that has been wrought in the condition of the parish, may be mentioned the facts that there were forty-nine persons confined at the first confirmation, the income of the parish rose to $12,000 the first year, the amounts contributed to Diocesan Missions exceeded that from any other parish in the diocese, and last month, on the occasion of the celebration of the bishop's golden wedding, the parishioners presented him with a purse of $2,700. But besides, above, and better than all this, the rector at a recent Sunday service announced that the mortgage of $10,000 had been lifted and every dollar of debt paid, and paid by the honest gifts of the congregation, without resorting to fairs or kindred abominations. This has all been done in six-teen months. This is a record of which any rector or congregation might be justly proud.

WYOMING.

THE Bishopric of Jerusalem, established by Prussia and England in 1841, is likely to be abandoned. That was an entangling alliance, which it was scarcely wise for the English Church to enter into.

THE new Sunday observance law in Vienna prohibits every kind of work from 6 A. M. Sunday, to the same hour on Monday. If rigidly enforced there can be no morning newspapers on Mondays.

THE city of Baltimore has come into possession of the original copperplate from which was taken the picture of the Baltimore oriole. It represents the nest of the oriole, with three of the birds and some foliage.

SHAKESPEARE'S church at Stratford-on-Avon is to be restored at a cost of $60,000. The tower, which is early Norman, is to receive the first attention. The doorway near Shakespear's tomb will be opened, to give access to the new street.

Of one hundred and twenty daily newspapers established in the life-time of a man still living, only six are now in existence, and he estimates that during the time $25,000,000 have been sunk in the vain efforts. The weekly papers could tell very much the same story.

MONEY has been raised in this city sufficient to erect a portrait statue of the Hebrew philanthropist, Sir Moses Montefiore. It is to be hoped that it will be creditable not only to the liberality of the Jewish residents of New York, but to art as well.

THE strongest wood in America is the nutmeg hickory of the Arkansas region, and the weakest is the West Indian birch. Tamarac is the most elastic, and the ficus aurea is lowest in specific gravity. The highest in specific gravity is the blue wood of Texas.

ST. ANNA'S Guild of the Church of the Transfiguration, with its eighth annual report, has published the address of the rector, the Rev. Dr. Houghton, and an Office for the admission of members. The guild would seem to be composed entirely of working bees.

THE Bank of France has a studio behind the cashier's desk, and at a signal a photograph is taken of any suspected customer. The camera is also used to detect frauds, a word or figure that seems to be entirely obscured being clearly reproduced in the photograph of any document.

AN ancient, 3,000 years old, found on a mummy in Egypt, is now in the British Museum. It is strongly religious in character. The days are in red ink, and it gives probabilities of the weather. It establishes the date of the reign of Rameses the Great. It is written on papyrus.

SOME Jewish Rabbis, present at the funeral of General Grant, could not ride because it was the Sabbath day, and they walked the whole distance, some Christian ministers keeping company with them by turns. It was a tribute not only to General Grant, but to principle and duty.

A BRONZE statue of Hercules, in a good state of preservation, has been discovered near the Gardens of the Colonna Palace, Rome. The only defect is a fracture across the legs. It is more than six feet in height, and probably belonged to the Baths of Constantine, or to Hadrian's Temple of the Sun.

SEVERAL of our bishops were afoot on the staff of some general in the Confederate army, as Bishops Galleher, Elliott and Harris, and a number of our clergy, some of whom have become clergymen since. Quite a list of clergymen could be made who have entered the clerical ranks from West Point.

A SERVICE of Benediction for the new parsonage of St. Paul's church, Marinette, Diocese of Fond du Lac, was performed August 6th. The Bishops of Fond du Lac and Wisconsin, the Rev. In the Paris Salon this year there were 5,034 works, of which 2,488 are oil paintings and 1,067 sculptures. A number of artists are from this city, and some with notable pictures.

THE American Historical Association, not yet a year old, has 281 names on its roll, with

THE Art Agencies that any white paper may be made transparent by moistening it with benzine, and then used for tracing paper. The benzine after while evaporates and disappears. A design can thus be transferred to any part of a sheet of paper without the use of tracing paper, which is often a very great convenience.

In the last Andover Review a Congregational minister is quoted as saying, "I teach that Congregationalism is a transient form of Puritanism, that Puritanism is a transient form of Protestantism, that Protestantism is a transient form of Christianity." It seems to be a sort of rapid transit, but the Church is steadfast and immovable.

THE number of communicants and the amount of offerings in the Diocese of Chicago are greater now than they were in the undivided Diocese of Illinois eight years ago. With a loss by death and removal of 850 communicants last year, the net increase for the year has been 913. It would seem to be a good rule to divide and conquer.

It is now said that the English school of painting is like to lose its national characteristics in its imitation of European and Asiatic styles. It is a good while since any original English painting worthy of remark was produced, and in this country the fatal facility of imitation is doing a world of mischief. It is easier to copy than to originate.

A GOOD deal of dignity hedged in the college magnates in the old times at Yale. An undergraduate could not wear his hat within ten rods of the president, eight rods of a professor and twenty-seven yards of a tutor, and a freshman must remove his hat when speaking to any of his superiors, including the classes above him, and not put it on until hidden to do so.

A PRETTY fan was modeled after a begonia leaf. It was made in stout Bristol board, covered with olive-green plush, the veining being done with delicately tinted paints, reproducing the veining of the natural leaf. After joining the edges and twisting the handle with green satin ribbon, a bunch of small begonia buds of the natural leaf were added, and the fan was much admired.

THESE seem to be a falling off in the emigration to this country. Since the first of January about 30,000 fewer emigrants have landed at Castle Garden than in the corresponding period last year; the totals being 217,388 for 1884, and 188,070 for 1885. Germany leads the way, and there is a decrease from Ireland and Italy. The best class of emigrants are from the Scandinavian countries.

ROBERT LANGLAND wrote "Piers Plowman's Vision" somewhere about 1363, and in it he refers to pews in churches as follows:

"Among wives and wedowes I am wont to sit, Y-paroled in paves. The parson knowe it,"

Or, in later English:

"Among wives and widows I am wont to sit,
Y-parked pews. The parson knowe it."

Like many other evils, pews boast of a long antiquity.

M. FAYOL ascribes spontaneous fires in coals to the absorption of the oxygen of the atmosphere by the coal, and this is aided by the high temperature of the mines and the finely-divided state of much of the coal. Lignite, in the form of dust, ignites at 150°, canal coal at 200°, coking coal at 250°, and anthracite at 300' and over. Another theory attributes the spontaneous combustion to the presence of pyrites in the coal.

While Prince Albert Victor of Wales was with his militia regiment at Bermonth, Wales, he was ejected from a pew in which he had taken a seat by the owner. We can imagine the severity of the punishment to the owner when he was made acquainted with the name of the victim of his rudeness. A similar incident once befell the Duke of Wellington, and after the service was over he sent his card to the uncivil person.

M. V. BURD, after thirty years of investigation, regards copper as a preventive and curative of cholera. Absorbed into the system it is, he says, a prophylactic. He recommends the external application of copper in the metallic form, the burning of dichloride of copper in alcoholic lamps, and the use of vegetables rendered green by sulphate of copper. One might well fear the remedies suggested would be more fatal than the cholera itself.

The French Academy awarded the prize of $8,000 for a test to prevent persons being buried alive to a physician, who demonstrated that, if on holding the hand of a supposed dead person to a strong light, a scarlet tinge was seen where the fingers touch, his life was not extinct. No scarlet is seen if death has occurred. Dr. Max Busch says, if a muscle is contracted by electricity, the temperature will rise if life remains, but otherwise will remain unchanged.

SULPHURIC acid lemonade was freely used in the insane department of the Blockley Hospital, Philadelphia, as a prophylactic during the prevalence of cholera in 1866. Within twelve hours after the lunatics were put upon the free use of it all signs of cholera disappeared, and when its use was foregone for two days new cases broke out. Twenty drops of dilute sulphuric acid were mixed with four ounces of water and sweetened with white sugar. Some oil of lemon and a few cut lemons assisted the diuine.

Archdeacon Farrar will visit this country about the middle of September, and will be heartily welcomed as well without as within the Church. His recent tribute to General Grant has endeared him to many hearts, and he is recognized as one of the voices of England. He will go as far west as Chicago, and will visit most of the Atlantic cities. It is said that he will preach during his brief visit but few times, perhaps but twice, once in this city and once for Dr. Phillips Brooks in Boston, but will lecture in several cities.

MINERAL VEINS do not require as long time for their formation as is generally supposed. Dr. Fleitmann filled a trench with common clay containing iron, and found that in two years the clay had changed its character and become white, and was traversed in several directions by fissures 1-25 to 1-16 of an inch thick, which were filled with compact iron pyrites. The oxide of iron in the clay, the doctor supposed, coming in contact with water impregnated with sulphate of ammonia, became transformed into sulphate of iron.

The Wilson Industrial School of this city furnishes a "School Sewing Box, with a Sewing Primer," in eight graded lessons. The box contains 400 basted sample patches and a complete outfit for a sewing school of forty girls for three months. Illustrations accompany the box, and it will be readily seen how useful it may be to parishes organizing sewing schools. The Wilson School is at 125 St. Mark's Place, in this city. The box will most likely be as popular as the "Illustrated Sewing Primer" of the same school, which is used in China, Japan, Africa, etc.

MR. JOHN RUSKIN, who has recently been at the borders of death, has said many things, some wise and some otherwise. Among the former may be included his contrast between the beatitudes of Christ and those of modern free thought:

CHRIST.	FREE THOUGHT.
Blessed are the Poor in Spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.	Blessed are the Rich in Spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of the Earth.
Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.	Blessed are they that laugh, for they shall be in the most.
Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.	Blessed are the proud, for they shall inherit the earth.
Blessed are they which hunger for righteousness, for they shall be filled.	Blessed are they which hunger for righteousness, for they shall be filled with manure.
Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.	Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain filth.
Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.	Blessed are the foul in heart, for they shall see God.
Blessed are the Peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God.	Blessed are the war-makers, for they shall be called the children of men.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDING BISHOP.

Right Reverend Father in Christ:

In common with some of my venerated brethren in the episcopate I feel very deeply that a conference of the bishops (in council) is very desirable at this time, and in view of the recorded vote in council (October 26th 1883.) I venture as one of several to call your attention to the subject. As our Presiding Bishop you have been authorized to invite us to such a conference, if a majority of the bishops unite in requesting it, at a given time. Now, it has been suggested to me by a greatly respected brother that the preliminary missionary meeting in Philadelphia (on November 18th and 19th) will necessarily call many of the bishops together, and there informal conferences touching important interests of the Church, over which God has set the episcopate as one solid body, can and must naturally take place. But, as has been often urged, such conferences, if "informal," might seem to rob the episcopate of its solid unity, if not to divide it into cliques. On that very ground it was urged that no one-sided conferences should be held on such occasions. The whole body of the episcopate should know of all conferences touching the common welfare, and, if not present in person, should be heard by epistle touching any concern or subject dear to his official heart. The fact that many of the bishops must be unable to attend was felt to be no reason why their brethren should not consult together, provided, first, that all should have full knowledge of the conference beforehand, and second, that no vote should be taken on any subject other than those of routine (adjourning, etc.) necessary to the sessions of any "conference" whatever.

Now, can any one doubt (after the experience of October, 1883,) that the bishops ought to have some chance to know one another personally, and to see "eye to eye" and speak "heart to heart" on their common duties and anxieties. Just now, a crisis in our missionary system is upon us. The subjects of "Theological Education," of the "Revisions" (Scriptural and Liturgical); of Canons elaborated in our House which the other House had no time to entertain, in 1883; and many questions arising as "The Work among the Blacks," which we had no time to consider, are surely of such importance as to deserve matured consideration before we meet (D. V.) amid the confusions and pressure of business in 1886. By "taking sweet counsel together" beforehand, and knowing something of the trials and anxieties of brethren upon matters which are especially with some, we can all become prepared for our work, when we meet for legislation. I write this "open letter" to elicit responses (addressed to you, privately or publicly) because if we are to meet in November no time should be lost.

With great respect, I am, Rt. Reverend Father, yours in Christ,

A. CLEVELAND COXE,

Bishop of Western N. Y.

To the Rt. Reverend the Presiding Bishop.

RESTORATION BY A STANDING COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I do not mean to discuss the action of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Southern Ohio in remitting a sentence of deposition. It was done in full conviction of our canonical power, as the Canons now read. It will, however be brought up as soon as possible for re-consideration, out of deference to the views of the bishops, some in a minority, who question our power under the Canon.

Bear in mind one thing, as a fact in this action. The bishop of the diocese requested us to act. We acted for him. If he had been inaccessible we should probably not have acted. If he had been dead we should, for it was not a question of power but of decorum toward the bishop who pronounced the deposition, and who was soon to return.

There is constitutional law, article 6, that none but a bishop shall pronounce sentence of admonition, suspension, or degradation. Restoration is not mentioned. There is canonical provision how, in a vacant diocese, the sentence of admonition, suspension, or deposition shall be pronounced. There is no such provision for pronouncing a sentence of restoration. Parity of reason may suggest a similar course, or critics say, But, mentio unitus, excoctio unitus, a legal maxim. This is the meaning of "admonition, suspension, and deposition," and the omission of restoration, excludes restoration from this operation of both the Constitution and the Canons.

If we distinguish between orders and mission, the case is simplified. Orders conferred in ordination are not taken away in deposition. The exercise of them is forbidden. It is a matter of mission or jurisdiction. Sovereigns exercised the power in England, a commissary in colonial times. Ecclesiastical Authority, constituted under the Canons, and limited by Canon, exercises it in the United States.

The writer thinks an additional section in Title II, Canon 11, desirable. It would make the restoration of a presbyter a more noticeable proceeding, and harmonize it with the action in case of deposition. See Title II, Canon 5, § 1., and Canon 10, § 11. [1] The added section should read somewhat as follows:

§ 11. "If the bishop who pronounced the deposition be deceased or incapacitated, his successor or some bishop invited by the Ecclesiastical Authority, and consenting to act, shall, in the presence of two or more presbyters, pronounce such person restored to the ministry. Notice of this restoration shall be given to every minister and vestry in the diocese, and also to the Ecclesiastical Authority of every diocese of this Church."

The word restoration too should be inserted in Article 6 of the Constitution.

SOCIETY OF THE TREASURY OF GOD.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

This, among societies lately organized to advance the Church's work, commends itself to all parishes and to all rectors. Its agency, accepted and applied, directly assists the solution of all questions of Church finance and clerical support.

We owe this society to our Canadian brethren in the diocese of Ontario, Canadian bishops, and many of our own, are its patrons. Its appearance is timely, for the subject of "Tithes and Offerings" now engages all Christian bodies.

Should not our Free and Open Church Association make an alliance with this society, the purpose of which gained, removes the objection to free churches; for, when parishes receive and distribute the tithes, neither clergy nor worship will require assessments or merchandise for their support. Without a similar society, or branch, among us, this society will lack what it greatly needs, but everything that unites us in good works promotes unity and increases strength.

The Rev. C. A. B. Poccock, Brockville, Ont., Canada, is Secretary of the Society of the Treasury of God.

I earnestly ask the Free and Open Church Association to lead us in furthering this good work of Canadian Churchmen, and trust that brethren everywhere will seek the help which this society offers.

If we must honor the Lord with our substance, and if one in ten is a unit, then we cannot offer Him a true and fair portion, unless, at least, we tithe.

Why should faithful Christians, sons of faithful Abraham, withhold from their Divine Melchisedec, tithes of all? These are the "meat of His house;" let us gladly give them.

CHARLES E. BONNELL.

"N. OR M."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In THE CHURCHMAN of AUGUST 23d it is stated that N. or M. in the Catechism may refer to the various first names of one child.

Bishop Nicholson, in his invaluable "Exposition of the Catechism," (p. 19) adds to "What's your name?" "A. B. C., etc." Does not this refer to the various children who are to give their names!

In Bishop Charles Wordsworth's "Catechism; or, Christian Instruction Preparatory to Confirmation and First Communion," he gives this note (p. 105) to "N. or M.":

"Probably designed to represent Nicholas and Mary. See Calendar, December 6th and 8th."

Is it not pleasant to think of the good boys as bearing the name of St. Nicholas, while the girls were honored by the name of the Mother of our Lord! S. F. HORCIKIN.

CRITICISM AND OBJECTION OF "THE BOOK ANNEXED."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

It is quite true that a liturgical service cannot be written down that must every little criticism and objection. This would mean and narrow. Like the artist who made two fac simile paintings, placing one at the door, and screening himself from view, he listened to what the public had to say. According to the tenor of their objections he used his brush, until the picture was beyond all recognition a monster. First, I do not like the verbiage and put it alongside with the placard, "This is my picture; the other is yours." The Joint Committee may feel so disposed to say, as the critics and objections of individuals and diocesan committees come flooding in upon them, "This is our book; the other is yours." Nevertheless, I will, for a change, use verbiage. First, I do not like the phrase "Oh, Lord, save our souls." Nor do I like "The Beatitudes," a sort of litany not at all necessary. The Decalogue, too, and the Summary of the Law should be made alternative. In the Prayer of Consecration, also, the word "whosoever" should not take the place of "we and all others, who, if a change were necessary, this word, which has a doctrinal savor, copied from the so-called Scotch Communion Office (from the Scotch Prayer Book of 1637 and from the Prayer Book of 1549) should not be employed, but rather the words from the English Prayer Book, "all we who are partakers of this feast." More especially to say is in reference to "The Transfiguration of Christ." Why, as is alleged, conform the Collect of Mary Magdalene to this feast, when that from the Roman Missal is so ineffectively more suitable! Let me place these collate side by side:

Collect from Roman Missal: "O, God, who by the testimony of the prophets didst confirm the mysteries of our faith in the glorious Transfiguration of thy Son, and by a voice from heaven shewest to us that we are thy adopted children, mercifully grant that we may be permitted to behold the Transfiguration of thy Son, O, Father, and thee, O, Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth one God, with thee without end. Amen."

Collect from B. A.: "O, God, who by the mount didst reveal to chosen witnesses thine only-begotten Son wonderfully transfigured, in radiant white and glorious glory, and gloriously appearing: Mercifully grant that we, being delivered from the darkness of this world, may be permitted to behold the Transfiguration of thy Son, O, Father, and thee, O, Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth one God, with thee without end. Amen."

The first, liturgically speaking, is incomparably more suitable.

The epistle II. St. Peter i. 13 is taken from this Missal, though the latter begins at the 16th verse instead of at the 13th verse as in B. A. The first three verses, namely 13, 14 and 15 of the B. A. have no particular reference to the statement of fact made in the next verse, but refer to the Missal of Peter i. 16-19 which would be liturgically more correct. But why not take the Gospel as it is in the Missal, St. Matthew xvii. 1-9 instead of St. Luke ix. 28-36.

I modestly assume that it would be unwise to adopt "The Book Annexed" as it is. If the Prayer Book is to be revised, enriched and restored in its new form, as the subject of it should be done not hurriedly. Unlike the year 1785 we have a Prayer Book, one consecrated with the blessings of a century, one simple in its outline and endeared in its use. It will harm no one to let it continue as it is until 1880, when perhaps its enriched proportions will receive an great accession, as it itself from Oct. 10th, 1790. J. BRYAN PURCELL. "AIDS TO REFLECTION."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The Bishop of Long Island, in his sermon commemorative of the late Dr. Schenck, has some remarks on the relation of the Church to the Gentiles. It is to be regretted that no significant word should be entirely supplanted by "Heathens" or "Pagans"), and on the constraining motives of her divine mission to them; and the Rev. Dr. Courtney afterward commented upon them somewhat unfavorably in a letter to you. His gave expression to a wish that the subject which is to be now discussed the common one; but the statement of which seems, to those who do not find it possible to accept it as harmonizing either with reason or Holy Scripture, to be justly classed with those of which St. Paul says, "Their word will eat as doth a canker (gangrene)."

The following extract from Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection," is worthy of careful consideration in connection with this subject; and it is hoped that it may induce our clergy and thoughtful laity to read the entire work, which is helpful toward a solution of some of the perplexing questions of to-day:

"Every doctrine is to be interpreted in relation to those to whom it is to be revealed, or who have, or have had, the means of knowing or hearing the same. For instance: The doctrine that there is no other name under heaven by which a man can be saved, but the name of Jesus. If the word here rendered name may be understood—as it will may, and as in other cases it may be understood to be power, or originating cause, I see no objection on the part of the practical reasoner to our belief of the declaration in its whole extent. It is true universally, or not true at all. If there be any redemptive power not contained in the power of Jesus, then Jesus is not the Redeemer; not the Redeemer of the world; not the Jesus that is Saviour of mankind. But if with Tertullian and Augustine we make the text assert the condemnation and misery of all who are not Christians by baptism and explicit belief in the revelation of the new covenant—then, I say, the doctrine is true to all intents and purposes. It is true in its very truth, in which any practical, moral or political interest or end can be connected with its truth. It is true in respect to every man who has had, or who might have had, the Gospel preached to him. It is true and obligatory for every Christian community and for every individual believer, wherever the opportunity is afforded, of spreading the light of the Gospel and making known the name of the only Saviour and Redeemer. For even though the uninformed heathens should not perish, the guilt of their perishing will attach to those who not only had no certainty of their safety, but who are commanded to act on the supposition of the contrary. But if, on the other hand, a theological dogmatist should attempt to persuade me that this text was intended to give us an historical knowledge of God's future actions and dealings—and for the gratification of our curiosity to inform us that Socrates and Phocion, together with all the savages in the woods and wilds of Africa and America, will be sent to my company with the devil and his angels in everlasting torment—I should remind him that the purpose of Scripture is to teach us our duty, not to enable us to sit in judgment on the souls of our fellow-creatures." NEW BOOKS.

A DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Pronouncing, Etymological, and Explanatory, embracing Scientific and other Terms, and a copious selection of Old English Words. By the Rev. James Stormonth. The pronunciation carefully studied by the Rev. H. H. Phelps. [New York: Harper & Brothers, 1885.] pp. xiv., 1,038.

This English dictionary is not as large or as costly as the great imperial of Worcester or Webster, but it is scarcely inferior in value, and in its fresh publication we have the benefit of the most recent investigations in all branches of its subject. A living language is all the while undergoing changes, portions of it become obsolete, new words are added and old words revived, new light is thrown upon its etymologies, and an old dictionary loses its character, as does an old almanac, by the mere lapse of time. We keep our Bailey as a curiosity of dictionary-making in former generations, but for any useful purpose it is hardly worth shelf room.

The Rev. Mr. Stormonth has been for many years engaged in philological studies, and in 1871 first published his "Etymological and Pronouncing Dictionary." It at once took high rank, and has passed through seven editions in England. An edition with larger type has long been called for, and the author has taken advantage of it to give to his work a thorough revision, and it may be said that the addition of ten years' labor has been bestowed upon this volume, so that it may be fairly called a new work. Not only many new words have been added to it, but "the wells of old English undefiled," Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, the English Bible, and the Book of Common Prayer, have yielded up new stores of old words that are still in use. Another advantage is given to this edition in the full recognition of the progress which is constantly making in the language of science and art. They are constantly inventing new technical terms which hitherto have had meaning only for experts, and ordinary readers have looked in vain for the terms and for the definitions of them. Science and art are no longer confined to the few, but are rapidly spreading among the people, and dictionaries of the language cannot afford to ignore them. The daily and the religious press devote no little space to articles upon some branch of science and art, their numerous readers desire to understand what they read, and the dictionary must help them, so that these branches of knowledge may be something better than a jargon of sesquipedalian words, and the better to insure correctness the scientific terms have all been revised by a distinguished scientist. The greatest pains have been taken with all definitions in the work to make them accurate as well as concise both as to the primary and the derived meanings, and, while precision is aimed at, it has been thought better to err by excess of definitions than by defect. In etymology the most recent philological writers, such as Skeat, Max Müller, M. Brachet, M. Littré, Wedgwood, Dr. Farrar, etc., have been freely consulted and used, and the subject is treated in an exhaustive way. There may be new discoveries hereafter, but Mr. Stormonth has presented us with the past results entire of etymological science. In orthography and orthoepy the work follows the English rule, and is the better and not the worse for it. This portion has been carefully revised by the Rev. Mr. Phelps, who bestowed the same attention upon the original edition. It can hardly be expected that the pronunciation and spelling will meet with universal approval, especially in this country, where, taking Webster for precedent, every man is his own law; but the endeavor has been to follow the best usage—the fas et norma loquentium. In the appendix can be found the tables of the postfixes and prefixes, abbreviations, foreign phrases, and proper names, scriptural and classical. The words of the dictionary are in bold, black letters, in groups or single entries, the groups containing the words naturally derived from the key-word, those intimately connected in etymology or signification, and some words grouped as a matter of convenience. The dictionary is thus convenient to consult, and while it might point out some defects, such as that to which we recently alluded in our editorial column, which is only to say it is not perfect, or that Homer sometimes nods, we have learned by experience, on the whole, to place a high value upon it, and we commend it to our readers.

THE FUTURE OF EDUCATED WOMEN. By Helen Kuhn Barrett; and Mrs. WOODS AND MOREY. By Frances Kalm Allen. [Chicago: Jansen, McClurg, & Co.] pp. 75. Price 50 cents.

These two sisters have here contributed their share to the literature of the "Woman's Emancipation Movement." These papers are well and temperately written, which is more than can be said of much of the writing in the same behalf. Without claiming, in so many words, the absolute right of suffrage and office-holding, it is sufficiently indicated as the future aimed at. Without discussing that point which involves the larger one of the right to suffrage and the desirableness of its indefinite extension, we can only say that the real issue is herein avoided, as it always is. The tacit claim which is set up is that woman should retain all the immunities of the one sex while sharing all the privileges of the other. It is a singular characteristic of the average feminine mind to regard matters in this way. Perhaps it is the fault of the "slavery" in which woman has been hitherto held. But the logical issue remains severely the same. If all human beings are to be regarded simply as individuals, irrespective of sex, then it will be just as impossible for one position of them to obtain any respite from the obligations of the other, as for one part of a line of soldiers coming under fire to escape the chances of being hit simply by virtue of wearing a different uniform from the other part. If a distinction is to be made, then we simply ask who is to have the benefit of it? The formula thus expresses itself, "Woman is by nature the equal of man, therefore she ought to have all the rights he has. Man is by nature the inferior of woman in certain particulars, in all these she should have the preference." We suppose there are women who, confident in their own special powers, would gladly waive the claim of femininity, but we can only say that they are not the ones to whom it would always be well to confide the fortunes of their weaker sisters, and that it would be especially unfortunate for the masculine element were they to lose their sense of obligation to the (so-called) "weaker vessel." If there is one thing more than another which has elevated the human race, it is the feeling of deference, the duty of protection toward the female part of it.

There is just one fair illustration of the absolute, impartial equality of the sexes. It is in those English collieries, where boys and girls were harnessed to trucks to drag the coal out of the workings. It may be hard for women that they must remain dependent in order that men should learn to become manly, considerate, and gentle; but, considering the immense importance of the work, we fear that the "fair sex" must be content to be worked for a little longer, lest, in providing for themselves, they force back the rougher sex into the place of mere rivals. If this is not the true issue of the question of woman's rights, then what we have said before must be—viz., that women expect to retain their privileges, but to acquire those of men in addition. This, by the very nature of things, is impossible, not to say hardly equitable. The theory of these ladies is that the whole business of domestic or household care will soon be adjusted on a new scale—that is to say, with public laundries, bakeries, etc., dispensing with all private family cares. This will release woman from the drudgery hitherto her lot and enable her to freely compete with man in the field of business. This may be so; but we predict that if that day comes the chief end and aim of woman will be to have an establishment of her own, and the indispensable mark of ton will be for a lady to have her own servants, and to leave the public conveniences severely alone. But before this or any "reform" is reached the point aimed at must be clearly defined. If woman is to be man's competitor she must be so on the usual terms of competition, loss and trouble to the weaker. If she is to be man's helper and companion, it is scarcely wise to make the terms of partnership too elastic.

ANNA OF A SPORTSMAN. Leisure Hour Series, No. 164. By Ivan Turpinoff. Translated from the Authorized French Edition by Franklin Pierce Abbott. [New York: Henry Holt & Co.]

Turgeneff is a writer of great merit, so terse and at the same time descriptive in his language, thoroughly in love with his subject, which is always Russia and her people. The "Annals of a Sportsman" are a series of adventures and singular people met with during long tramps after wild fowl. The chapters describing his wandering into the encampment of the boys' guarding the horses of their village during the night is a perfect picture, with all the lights and shadows, for the boys laugh and tell stories, are brave and timid, while the stranger lies in the fire-light and listens to their babble. We advise every one to read the book if only for the pleasure of happening upon this charmingly told incident.

NORFOLK IN THE NORTH: OR, HUNTING AND FISHING ADVENTURES IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS. By Frederick Schwatka, Laureate of the Paris Geographical Society and Imperial Geographical Society of Russia; Honorable Member Bremen Geographical Society, etc. etc. Commander of the Longest Sledge Ride in the World, 3,300 miles, 1878-79-80, and Commander of the Longest Raft Journey in the World, 1,200 miles, 1881. (London, Paris, New York and Melbourne: Cassell & Co. Limited.)

A book from the pen of a man with Lieutenant Schwatka's experience and many adventures cannot fail to prove interesting. This gorgeously bound and profusely illustrated volume consists of a series of sketches of Lieutenant Schwatka's adventures in search of game in the arctic zone. From polar bears to eider ducks nothing comes amiss to the Nimrod of the nineteenth century, and the description of these adventures, together with some account of the curious people who live in this frozen region, make up the book.

SWEET MACE. A SUSSEX LEGEND OF THE IRON TIMES. By G. Manville Fenn. (London, Paris, New York and Melbourne: Cassell & Co. Limited.)

The story is laid in England years ago, in the reign of King James. The heroine is the daughter of an inventor of cannon, who is regarded by his neighbors as one having an evil eye. Her lover is a freebooter, or pirate, properly speaking. Several court gallantries are also her humble admirers, and the book abounds in adventures, in most of which the lovers fare badly. There is a witch in the story, too, who barely escapes burning at the stake for her supposed crimes, and there are many minor characters who play their little parts ably. Good summer reading.

CARRIBTON'S GIFT AND OTHER TALES. Leisure Hour Series. By Hugh Conway (F. J. Fargus), author of "Called Back," etc. With a Portrait of the Author, and other Illustrations. [New York: Henry Holt & Co.]

Apart from its literary merits this volume will have a melancholy interest from the fact that these stories have been collected in book form since the death of their talented author. Whatever Mr. Fargus's literary faults were—and he had many—no one can deny him the quality of being an interesting, forcible and very original writer. The present volume fully confirms this view of the man.

THE OLD FACTORY. A Lancashire Story. By Wm. Westall, author of "Larry Lobengron," etc. (London, Paris, New York and Melbourne: Cassell & Co. Limited.)

This story has its plot and scenes laid in Lancashire during the time of the labor riots, when machines were taking the place of hand-laborers. The story is the life of a determined and not very scrupulous man fighting his way to wealth and power, of his numerous adventures, and also of the adventures of his children. Very readable and handsomely bound.

MARIE DE PRENEL. Leisure Hour Series. By E. Frances Popper, author of "My Little Lady," etc. etc. [New York: Henry Holt & Co.]

The book bears for its title not the name of the heroine of this pleasing little romance, but that of the fairy godmother, who smooths the lovers' rough road for them. The plot is quite original, the scene laid in Rome at the present day, and the author shows himself familiar with the ways and lives of Roman society people.

SUPPLY A LOVE STORY. By Philip Orme. (Boston: Cappel & Co. Old Corner Book Store.)

This book is exactly what it professes to be—a love story; but the sayings and doings of the young people in love during the one summer in which we are supposed to share their pleasures and misfortunes, are naturally and pleasantly told. The book is capital reading for August weather, as it is full of the savor and breath of the sea. A description of a storm is very good.

LITERATURE.

THE REV. DR. H. R. HOWARD'S "Address at the Funeral of Mrs. George H. Norton" of Tullahoma, Tenn., has been printed by request.

THE REV. M. P. LOGAN, Wytheville, Va., has published a little tract, "The Churchman's Historical Sketch Book," which will prove useful.

An excellent notice of "H. H." (Mrs. William S. Jackson) can be found in the Critic of August 23d. Her recent death has called out much sorrow in the world of letters.

DR. LABBERTON is preparing a series of thirty maps to illustrate English history. He is also writing a text for his "Historical Atlas." He is an authority in cartography.

BISHOPS W. PAKENHAM, Walsh, and Beck-with and Canon Liddon are represented in the September number of the Pulpit Treasury. There are several illustrations in the number.

THE September Van Nostrand's Engineering Magazine is filled with solid reading, both original and selected, and would seem to be indispensable to the class to which it is chiefly addressed.

"THE Ground and Transfer of Suffering," by L. W. Mansfield, is printed in pamphlet by E. & J. B. Young & Co. Mr. Mansfield is a deep thinker, and the author of "Traces of the Plan of our Being."

IN the August Musical Herald, Boston, among the nine pages of music is a Miserere by Palestrina, and a Domine Deus by Himmel. The words are in Latin and English, the English version being by Laura M. Underwood.

FUNK & WAGNALLS have in press "The Wit of Women," by Miss Kate Sanborn. There are many who have thought that wit and humor were just what women did not excel in, and they will be curious to see Miss Sanborn's demonstration to the contrary.

"A BAND OF THREE," by L. T. Meade, "Hester Tracy, a School-Room Story," by A. Weber, and "The Children's Sunday Hour," by the Rev. Benjamin Waugh, are among Mr. Whitaker's forthcoming juvenile books. The latter will have sixty-five wood-cuts.

"CHURCH Principles the True Basis of Christian Unity," a sermon delivered by the Rev. W. R. Richardson at the consecration of St. Stephen's church, Galid, Texas, appears in pamphlet form. Mr. Richardson is dean of the Cathedral of St. Mark, at San Antonio.

THE Rev. Dr. John H. Elliott read a paper before the alumni of the Theological Seminary in Virginia on "The Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures," and it is deservedly printed in pamphlet form. Dr. Elliott believes that the old is better, and is not carried away by the new theology.

H. T. KNAKE, Pittsburgh, Pa., has published "General Grant's Funeral March," by L. P. Kleber, and Perry & Noble, New Bedford, Mass., has issued a song and chorus by Walter A. Perry, "Gone, Brave One, Gone," of which the music strikes us more favorably than the poetry.

IN the August Eclectic, Rev. J. H. Barn begins a series of papers on The Three Creeds, and the Rev. A. S. Crapsey writes in defence of Altar Lights. The selections are full of interest, and in the summaries the editor vindicates his excellent judgment. One of the beauties of the Eclectic is that it never gives an uncertain sound.

"SUNDAYS," the new annual of Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co. is meeting with great success, and at half the price of the old volume is placed within the reach of all Sunday-schools. The same house has brought out in book form a full and complete report of Archbishop Farrar's sermon on General Grant, as delivered in Westminster Abbey.

THE Christian Guardian, No. 2, "Occasional Papers," is largely devoted to Mexico and the Church work in that country. Its papers are illustrated and replete with facts, and they enable the reader to understand the condition of things there, concerning which there has been much ignorance, not to say misrepresentation. A portion of the number is devoted to the missions in Spain and Cuba.

"ERRORS of ROMANISM," a series of lectures by the Rev. Dr. Wm. Graham, have been published in a pamphlet by the Brandon Printing Company, Nashville, Tenn. They will be read with interest. The same author has issued, by request, the Otey sermon on "The Divine Constitution of the Christian Ministry," delivered before the Convention of the Diocese of Tennessee, in a second edition.

"BABYHOOD" is more necessary in August than in all the year beside, and it shows its appreciation of the fact by Marion Harland's article, on "The Baby that must stay in Town," and Dr. Robt's paper on "Prickly Heat." Marion Harland also continues her "Nursery Cooking," and "Stray Leaves from a Baby's Journal" are bright with good sense. "Babyhood" has interest and power in all its pages.

A MOST interesting paper in the August Macmillan is one on popular songs of the Scottish Highlands by John Stuart Blackie. Mrs. Ritchie's (Miss Thackeray) "Mrs. Dymond" reaches its twenty-third chapter, and R. Mackey gives an interesting account of the "Recent Rebellion in North-west Canada." There are several other notable papers, and among them the conclusion of a "Walking Tour in Landes."

CASSELL'S Family Magazine for September, with its delightful articles and fine illustrations, is promptly at hand, and shows how well it deserves its growing constituency. The second paper, by C. F. Gordon Camming, "The Postmen of the World," is as interesting as the first, and its pictures of early letter-carriers are very curious. There are seven-teen papers, besides the fashion gossip and the Gatherer.

CHRISTIAN Thought for July and August contains "Is Prayer Reasonable?" by Prof. Davis, "Capital and Labor," by Bishop Harris of Michigan, and "The Vicarious Principle in the Universe," by the Rev. Dr. Bradford. The Letter Book, Memorabilia, Notata, and About Books are all full of interest. The magazine is well named—it is Christian and it is Thought. Bishop Harris treats a very important subject vigorously and without fear.

THE QUIVER for September is one of the best of the magazines, and all the more so because in much it is so well suited for Sunday reading. There is in it a very curious paper, with illustrations, on "Gargoyles," showing the grotesqueness of some portions of ancient art. The frontispiece represents a young girl tripping across the fields, with the long-expected letter just received from the post-man pressed to her bosom. It illustrates a short poem in the number.

LIPPINCOTT'S for September opens very reasonably with a paper on "The Truth about Dogs," by F. N. Zabriskie. Just now in the cities they are being destroyed by thousands. The closing paper, "The Story of an Italian Workwoman's Life," by Marie L. Thompson, is said to be an o'er-true tale. Between these two papers are many others full of life and interest, well calculated to preserve the high favor with which Lippincott's is regarded by its many readers.

The colored plate in the Art Interchange for August 13th is a study of Golden-Rod and Cardinal-Flower, and the number has a supplement of its valuable Notes and Queries. The colored plates are copyrighted, and that might raise a question in the minds of amateurs as to how far, by way of experiment, they would be justified in their private studies in reproducing them. The Art Interchange is especially helpful to students, but it will cease to be so if it puts restrictions upon them.

THE Nashotah Scholiast, with the July and August numbers, closes the second volume, and hereafter will be known as the Church Scholiast, and will be edited by the Rev. H. B. St. George. The Scholiast has been very ably conducted and has deserved to win its way to favor, if for nothing else by its preservation of many historical documents and reminiscences. Every number has been illustrated, and there are four illustrations in the July and August numbers, of which one is a photograph of Dr. DeKoven. There are copies bound and unbound of volume II. for sale.

ART.

A MUSEUM of Christian Antiquities is to be founded at Athens, Greece, and it will be of great interest to Christian scholars.

Is a handsome art catalogue, printed out West, the facts in the life of Benjamin West are given under the name of Gilbert Stuart.

SINCE 1860 the National Gallery, London, has expended on art $1,350,500, but no single picture was purchased for a larger sum than $50,000.

CARL MARR, a Milwaukee artist, has gained a prize at Munich for a painting of one of Napoleon's battles. The piece contains more than a hundred figures.

AN American artist in Paris has received $11,000 for two genre pictures. The artist, Humphrey Moore, who is deaf and dumb, was a pupil of Gerome.

A GERMAN artist is reproducing, in clay, hard-baked and tinted, the little Tanagra figures, and so accurately that it is difficult to distinguish them from the originals.

Two broken tombstones of the Roman period have been found near Carlisle, Wales. They are to the memory of soldiers of the first cohort of Nervii which served in Britain in the time of Trajan, A. D. 105.

THE criticism on Raphael's "Ansidei Madonna" at the National Gallery, London, oftenest heard is, "Seventy thousand pounds! Seventy thousand pounds!" That tells the story to a commercial people.

EYES Homer sometimes nods. The Louvre purchased in England for $50,000 what was supposed to be a Raphael, and it is now said to be not the best specimen of Perugino. The picture is worth about $2,500.

THE fragments of the celebrated Carian Mausoleum are now gathered in a new hall of the British Museum. The chariot of Mausolus has been reconstructed, and everything has been done to reproduce the past.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Western paper having said that an artist in Munich could live on $250 per year, ten American artists have written that it would be only by very close pinching that $500 a year could be made to suffice.

THE Chinese decorative slabs, that under the name of pagoda stones are often seen, are sections longitudinally of a fossil orthoceras, a shellfish that has left its mark in the rocks as a long straight horn. The kosmos stones are also fossil bivalves.

THE attempt to restore Titian's "Trihnte Penny" has not proved satisfactory. By using too thin a coat of varnish it has been unduly heightened in several places. The experiment made at Dresden with the "Madonna di San Sisto" was entirely successful.

IT is not every picture bought in Paris that is genuine. The counterfeiting of old masters, and even of living artists, is a great and flourishing trade. There are up for sale every year 8,000 Corots, 2,500 Theodores, Rousseaus, 1,800 Rosa Bonheurs, 1,400 Diazes, 1,200 Daubignys, and so on. It is said there are 75,000 Daubignys now, and some one says a century hence there will be 1,000,000.

THERE are existing more than forty Egyptian obelisks; many of them are fallen and broken. There are seventeen of them in Italy, seven in England, two in France, two in Constantinople and one in this country. The smallest is at Berlin, which is twenty-five and a half inches high. An unfinished one in the quarries at Syene is estimated to weigh 1,500,000 pounds.

IT is a matter of general interest that photography in its relations to artistic reproduction is being developed in New York with the best promise of success. Hitherto the work has been mainly experimental. The prevailing impression that the Germans had "appropriated" the process having stifled domestic enterprise in this direction. Now and then photographs of imported photographs happily executed seemed to encourage systematic efforts towards production from originals. Among the firms interested in photographic work from American pictures, Klackner, Keppel and Nichols and Handy deserve mention. Wood in the Bowery has, however, executed most of the work. In estimating the importance of this pioneer stage it must be remembered that special technical skill and experience are demanded, that paper properly adapted is not produced, as yet, in America; and that our home workers were literally dependent upon the German houses at every stage, from the skilled operator to the sufficient camera, and the plate-paper. Photographs are now successfully produced of the largest dimensions imported, i. e., about 28x38 inches. Indeed the most expert and exacting dealers are forced to admit the absolute equality between domestic and imported work.

BUT in the unlimited replication of American pictures for popular distribution, several important considerations arise. The value of important pictures, it has been held, is either diminished or destroyed by repetition. In this conclusion the photographer is more to be dreaded than engraver or copyist, and his rapid processes are the Nemesis of art values. If the ultimate value of a picture consists in the fact that it is unique, by all means shut out the photographer with sleepless diligence. But a better logic insists that any art work intrinsically precious suffers nothing by reiteration. It would be a starveling criticism that turns the key on the only copy of a great poem in order to protect or enhance its value. It does not appear that Lycidas, a Lament, loses any of its divine fragrance as it reappears in endless editions. Indeed, the perpetual influx of new editions enriches millions who otherwise would be poorer without their Shakespeare and Milton and Tennyson, while in the multiplication of copies there is no subtracting from the fascination and inspiration of the great master-singers. It is left only to a half-insane king of Bavaria to exemplify the old spirit of individual proprietorship in the art-world. Indeed, it may be fairly urged that any picture that would suffer aesthetic deterioration under any process of multiplication deserves it, and that such a result demonstrates its intrinsic weakness. It is a crucial test, and it is indisposable in reaching sound conclusions of aesthetic values. The world's accepted poems have undying melody, and the world's accepted statues and pictures have imperishable beauty.

The Dresden "Madonnas," the "Last Supper," the "Crucifixion" of Durer, the "Christus Consolator," and "Christus Remunerator," and the "Angelus," can never be less than they now are and have been from the first.

Only the photographic reproduction of any favorite composition accelerates a verdict, and conclusions are quickly reached that formerly lingered. It is a winning process, and in the end invaluable. The photograph is inexpensive, and the occasional displacement and replacement in a collection is a slight matter. The same process, however, is sometimes very costly and almost ruinous when applied to galleries of paintings as it now and then must needs be.

The picture that has a life in it suffers no dilution or enfeeblement in the widest possible distribution. It is safe to assume that the last rose and the last lily will repeat the fascination of the first. So a spiritual energy is in the true picture which is perennial, and we need not distrust the copyist or the photographer any more than does the poet the printer.

But is there no protection for the artist or purchaser which shall in turn serve property and the people? Next week we will seek a solution in copyright.

REPENTANCE.

BY J. O. M.

Low at Thy footstool, Lord,
Bending in mute appeal,
I bring my troubled heart,
In sorrow, sadly kneel:
"Forgive," my soul cries out to Thee,
Oh! Saviour, be Thou Christ to me!

I come; but cannot plead,
I knew not the right way;
For light from Heaven was shed,
To guide me day by day;
I turned aside and would not see,
The narrow path, made plain by Thee.

I cannot plead that Thou,
Did'st ere my griefs deride:
No! from Thy patient brow Forgiveness pours its tide.
In silence Thou did'st bear each wrong—
In gentleness; oh! make me strong!

Radiant in light I see,
Thy kindly form appear,
The world beneath Thy feet,
The cross, the crown are near!
I hear Thee call and offer me
Hope, pardon, immortality.

If I the cross will take,
Help me uplift it, Lord,
Cross-bearer for Thy sake,
Thy favor my reward.
This troubled heart accepts the cross,
Counting all else beside it loss.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

It was almost a week since Garton had left—a long week as it seemed to Rotha, sitting so patiently in Belle's sick room day after day.

Rotha flagged a little in the heavy atmosphere, as was natural, but she never complained of its dullness. It seemed a dreary exchange for the free happy life of the last few months, when Mary and she sang and laughed over their work, and Garton and the boys came and teased them out of all propriety; how she missed their boating excursions and their happy rambles, and the grand teas which Meg prepared to surprise them on their return! Now hour after hour she sat listening to the faint click of her own and Mary's needles, broken now and then by low-voiced conversation while Belle dozed. Here was daily suffering to be witnessed—suffering borne patiently indeed, but without the cheerfulness of real submission. Here was the languid body and unquiet mind acting and re-acting inmentably on each other—suffering which Rotha strove to lighten, but without success. Still it was something that Belle liked to have her, though it did seem a little hard for Mary that Rotha's was the only absence ever noticed. Not that Mary's unselfishness ever wasted a sigh on this; she would sigh sadly over this new infatuation of Belle's, but only remonstrated when her exactions were likely to be injurious to Rotha.

"Has not Rotha come yet? How long she is!" was often the querulous complaint of a morning. Rotha would come up presently with all sorts of pretty excuses for her delay, in the shape of tiny baskets embedded with moss, with rare hot-house flowers or choice fruit daintily nestled in the greenery. Sometimes it would be a picture, or a new book, or a portfolio of engravings from Bryn—all sorts of little surprises to cheat the invalid's new day into brightness. It was a sign of changed feelings on Belle's part that the Cashmere shawls were in their old place. One day she made some sort of mention of them in a shamefaced way, and the next afternoon she woke up to find them covering her. Belle drew them over her face and shed a few silent tears underneath their soft folds. It was so like Rotha's magnanimity.

One afternoon Rotha had left her somewhat unexpectedly, in obedience to a summons from Meg. Mrs. Carruthers wanted her up at Bryn on some domestic business. Belle was a great deal better, and she could leave her comfortably, especially as Guy promised to be on guard when his mother was not there. It was a lovely afternoon, and even these few steps were a refreshment to Rotha, and so was her quiet talk with Meg. She had promised to be back again as soon as possible, but by the time her letters were written and tea was over it was getting late—almost time for Robert to be back from Thornborough, and then she would no longer be wanted. She said something of this to Meg as she put on her hat.

"I shall just say 'good night' to Belle and see she is comfortable, and then I shall come away. You shall not have another lonely evening, Meg, if I can help it. We will have one of our home-evenings—music and a little reading. How delicious it will be!" And Rotha ran off with one of her sunny smiles.

It was moonlight, and the sea looked just as she loved to see it—all black shadow, save for one broad pathway of silver ripples. Down by the bridge lay a stretch of shining sands. The whole scene, so full of fixed shadow and gleaming light, the white road, the dark wintry sky, soon here and there with stars, seemed full of a new beauty to her, and a sense of her unworthiness and littleness suddenly smote upon her as she remembered the pleasant lines that had been appointed to her, and how from "If needs be" she had learnt to say, "It is well."
"God is very good," said the girl softly to herself, "and I am, oh, so happy!" And as she looked over the moonlight haze she thought of Garton, sailing farther and farther from her, but without any mournfulness. "What is, is right," she thought.

It was about the time when the family were generally gathered round the tea-table—the most sociable hour of the day, as the mother called it—but, to Rotha's surprise, the meal remained untasted on the table, and only Laurie and Arty were in the room

—Arty sitting disconsolately on Laurie's knee with his finger in his mouth, and his small round eyes fixed on the cake; both were rather incoherent in their answers to Rotha's questions. Arty opined that somebody was cross, Deb was for one, and they weren't going to have any tea at all, at all. "Do be quiet, Arty," interrupted Laurie, giving him a shake; "here I have been telling you Jack the Giant-Killer for the last half-hour, and it is all no use."

"I don't want Jack Anybody. I want my tea," returned Arty, beginning to whimper. "If nobody's cross, why can't we have some, Laurie?"

"Where is everybody?" asked Rotha, bewildered by the children's disconsolate condition, so unlike the mother's ordinary care. Arty's hair was rough and his collar tumbled, and Laurie's hands were covered with ink.

"Where's everybody?" repeated Laurie, slowly. He always meditated over his words. "Oh, I don't know. Guy's up with Aunt Belle and Rufus has gone to the telegraph office, and mother is shut up with father in the study, and Uncle Robert is there too, and—do be quiet Arty! Deb has just been in, and is going to bring us our tea; and it is so dull all alone," finished Laurie, running his blackened fingers through Arty's hair, at which Arty, being cross enough already, fairly roared.

Rotha could learn nothing from Laurie's drawled-out sentences, so she betook herself to Belle's room, but Belle had fallen asleep, and at first sight she thought Guy was asleep too, for he was curled up on the easy-chair with his head on his arms, but she started at her light footstep and held up his hand.

"Hush! Aunt Belle is asleep, and mother says we must be very careful not to wake her; she had such a bad night." And Guy, having delivered his message, seemed inclined to put down his head again, but Rotha knelt down and put her lips close to his ear.

"What's become of the mother, Guy? Is she busy? Why, Guy, you have been crying."

"Oh, hush!" implored the boy. He sat up quite straight now, and looked very frightened. "If you wake her what am I to do, and mother not here? Don't ask me any questions," he continued, with quivering lips, and trying hard not to burst out crying. "I must not tell you anything; they told me I must not."

"Not tell me? Is anything the matter? Oh, Guy, if you love me don't keep me in suspense. There is not anything the matter, is there, dear? You have only tried to frighten me."

"I haven't," returned Guy indignantly. "I wouldn't be so wicked. Oh, dear Rotha, do go downstairs; I can't bear it," cried the boy, trying to swallow his sob—"I can't bear it, when we all love you so, to see you looking at me like this."

"Oh, Guy, don't." The lad's rosy face was quite pale now, but it was not so white as Rotha's as she rose stiffly from her knees. Why does she put her hand to her side as though she had been struck there? why do her thoughts fly to Garton instantly? "That it may please Thee to preserve all that travel by land or by water." "We beseech Thee to hear us good Lord." Why do these clauses rise unbidden to her mind as she leans for a moment over the sobbing child? Guy, who never cried—who, his mother said, had never cried since his babyhood—and Guy loved Garton; she remembers that.

"Do go down, Rotha; they are all in the study," groans out poor Guy. Rotha makes a gesture of assent and goes slowly down, not hurriedly, but dragging one foot heavily after another, as though they were suddenly weighted with lead. When she had got there she paused in the dark hall and said two things to herself—or rather the two things got themselves spoken unconsciously in her mind. "Whatever happens, God is good, and I must remember that. And if anything be wrong with Gar—my Gar—I would like to lie down and die before life is a long misery to me." But she never knew that she spoke thus within herself; she had a notion instead that she was standing for nearly half an hour trying to turn the handle of the study-door with her nerveless hand, and listening to Mary's low sobbing inside, and yet five minutes had hardly elapsed since she had left Guy.

If she had gone in quite unprepared she would have known at once that something had happened. The vicar was sitting in his usual place at his writing-table, just opposite the picture of the Good Shepherd, with his head bowed down on his hands, and Mary was kneeling beside him with her arms round his neck, and Robert—but Rotha saw nothing beyond the vicar's motionless figure and Mary's tear-stained face.

"Oh, Austin, here is Rotha! Why, my dear, my dear, who has sent you in here just now?"

"Nobody sent me. I came of my own accord." How strangely her voice sounds! Her lips have become suddenly dry, her strength fails, and she leans heavily on Mary's shoulder to support herself. There is a deep-drawn sigh behind her, and then some one, she fancies it is Robert, places her silently in a chair.

"Mary, I was not prepared for this. Robert—Mary, what shall we do? I am becoming weak with all this suddenness. I must have time." Was that the vicar's tone, so broken, so irritable? Who was it that said Garton was his favorite brother, his pupil, his— No matter, the strongest man will give way under a sudden shock.

"Some one must tell her, Mary; this is a woman's work," says Robert, still from the background. Through it all Rotha fancies his voice comes from a distance—miles away—muffled—sepulchral. She shudders away from it.

"Yes, Austin, I will tell her; dear husband, dear husband, as though I would not spare you this ten times over." When did Mary Ord consider herself when Austin was in trouble? But, with a sudden terror, Rotha put out her hands as though to ward off her approach; she would stop up her ears if see could, she knows it all; why need they trouble her with words? But Mary, pressing the cold hands to her bosom, falters out "that she loves her, she loves her, and that she must be very patient, for their heavenly Father had afflicted them all. Do not look at Austin, my dear, do not look at my husband, he is not himself just now, he cannot help us. Look at Robert, Rotha darling; he is so brave and thoughtful for us all." But Rotha, moving her dry lips, shakes her head and fixes her eyes still on Mary.

"When our dear boy left us only a week ago—"

"Only a week ago!" repeated Rotha; then suddenly: "Oh, Gar, Gar!"

"When our poor boy, our dear Gar, sailed last Tuesday night, Heaven knows how little we expected such bitter tidings, how much need there would be for our prayers: 'That it may please Thee to preserve all that travel by land or by water.' 'We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.'—The two little hands locked together on Mary's bosom struggled hard to be free.—'We beseech Thee, we beseech Thee, good Lord.'"

"Oh, Mary, the cruel seal the cruel, hungry sea! Oh, Gar, Gar!"

"Robert, what shall we do? She guesses, but she does not hear me. She looks blind and deaf—stupefied almost, poor darling." But Rotha only repeats again and again, slowly, "Oh, Gar, Gar!"

"When our poor Gar," began Mary again, this time very slowly—"when our poor Gar left us never to return again—"

"Never to return again!" repeated Rotha, and then stopped suddenly with a low moan.

"He little thought what would happen so near home. They were fog-bound, Rotha; and on Sunday night," said Mary, speaking as though to a little child, "when they were quite near home, and all but the helmsman were asleep, a great vessel ran on to them and sank the ship, and they were all—oh, pitiful God!—all lost but a few men and two or three women."

"And Gar was not among them—speak louder, Mary, louder; the waves seem to drown your voice! The waves! Oh, my poor boy, my poor boy!"

In the many mansions she knows it now—no need to tell her more. Somebody behind her says, "That will do. Open the door, Austin, and give her air." Cold, fragrant waters splash on her forehead. She has a notion that Mary has taken her in her arms and is crying softly over her. The vicar's massive figure seems to block up her vision, but he does not say much. She tries to tell him that she is not faint, that he must not be so sorry for her, because it is his loss too; but breaks down at her first word and hides her head in Mary's bosom.

"The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away," said the vicar, solemnly. His voice reaches Rotha. She can hear him, oh, so clearly! "Dear wife, I have been very weak. I ought not to have left this to you. It is not poor Gar, it is happy Gar now, and she will think so by and by." And as he lays his hands on her head pitifully, yet in silent blessing, Rotha suddenly looks up at him with wild eyes and prays him to take her home.

But it is not the vicar—it is Robert who takes her; but she hardly knows it, for she is looking up at the starlit sky, where her saint is—her lover, her Garton. She has no idea of the strong arm that is supporting her all the way, or of the looks of anguish that he casts on her pale, uplifted face. She scarcely knows what he says as she totters into Meg's arms, but she wonders with a dreary wonder why Meg cries so. Mary cried too, and Guy; but she has no tears, only a hot, choking pain. By and by, when she lies down on her little white bed, and Meg extinguished the light and leaves her, by her own desire, to the friendly darkness, Rotha turns her face to the wall with an exceeding bitter cry, "Oh, Gar, Gar, I loved you so! Come back to me, Gar!"

CHAPTER XXXV.

An Errand of Mercy.

"I hold it true, what'er befall:
I feel it, when I sorrow most:
'Tis better to have loved and lost Than never to have loved at all."
—In Memoriam.

"Oh! 'twere to see unbroken light!
That watched me as a seraph's eye,
And stood between me and the night
For ever shining sweetly bright."

"And when the cloud upon us came,
Which strove to blacken o'er thy ray,
Thou purest spread thy gentle flame,
And dash'd the blackness all away."
—Byron.

Never till she had lost him did Rotha know what Garton had been to her, and how their brief engagement and the loss of his great love would influence and sadden her life. For a little while she seemed utterly broken.

It was not that she rebelled against his cruel fate—cut off in such an awful way in the midst of his youth; it was not that she failed in meekness and submission, or complained that her lot was unduly hard. She was far too humbly and sincerely a Christian for that. It was only that the spring of her energy and life seemed broken by the suddenness of the shock, and that for a little time she seemed so crushed that it was difficult to rouse her.

All the next day she lay on the couch in her own room, with her face hidden from the light, as she had hidden it on the previous night; just ill enough to be soothed by Meg's attentions, but neither asking for nor needing sympathy, and keeping perfect silence in the midst of her grief.

But, as hour after hour passed on, Heaven only knew the bitterness of that girlish heart as the tide of recollection swept over it, recalling Gar's tenderness and sad farewell. Once, toward evening, when the tide was rising, the low surging of the waves seemed to break the stillness of the room. Meg never knew why she suddenly buried her face in the cushions and tried to stifle her sobs. Many and many a night for long afterwards she dreaded to go to sleep for fear that sound should mingle with her thoughts, and so the awful scene be reproduced in her dreams. Often she started in affright, thinking she heard the crash of the broken timbers, the angry rush of the water, the despairing cries of drowning men, and amongst them one dark figure, steadfast, yet with a look of mortal agony on his young face, calling on his God as he went down into his yawning grave.

Oh, no marvel if she brooded silently over her trouble, and shrunk from the least mention of any of the facts; not for many a long week did she learn any of the distressing details, though she must have known that the papers were full of them, and that the country was ringing from end to end with news of the sad disaster. Meg put them all carefully aside in case she should ask for them, but she never did; by and by she heard all the particulars from another quarter, when she was better fitted to bear it.

From the moment they brought Rube to her they ceased to be seriously uneasy, for at the sight of her favorite the white strain on Rotha's face relaxed; and though she wept bitterly, anything was better than the numbness and apathy for the last few hours, and tears, as they knew, would ease the overburdened heart.

Rotha was more herself when she had seen Rube: the boy's sorrow seemed to arouse her to the conviction that others were suffering as well as herself. She did not try to comfort the poor child—that would have been impossible; but she stroked his curly head as he knelt beside her, and whispered to him that he was her boy now, and she would love him—oh! so dearly—for Gar's sake. And then she called to Meg faintly to take him away, for he would make himself ill with crying, and she could do nothing to help him.

But the next day she had him again, and the next day after that; and Meg found that she would do anything that Rube asked her, and that she seemed always more restless and unhappy when the boy was away. After his second visit she roused herself to inquire after her friends at the vicarage, and found that, to her surprise, Robert had been every morning and evening to inquire after her.

He looked very ill, Meg added, and he had told her that the vicar had been far from well too. Mrs. Ord had sent all sorts of affectionate messages to Rotha; but she had not come round herself, as Belle was fretting so sadly that she could not leave her.

Rotha was greatly disturbed when she heard this. She felt as though it were selfish for her to be sitting alone and feeding on her grief, while Mary had her own and her husband's trouble to bear, and was worn out besides with attending on her sister. She thought how Gar would have acted in her place, and wept and prayed that she might have strength to do what he would have done.

She tried, and not ineffectually, to make some sort of beginning that same evening, and sent Meg round, laden with good things, and with a little pencilled line to Belle, in which she told her that she had not forgotten her, that she was thinking of them all from morning to night, that she sent them her dear love, and that she would come round very soon, when she felt she could help and not distress them.

It so happened that as Meg left the house, charged with Rotha's commissions, she met the vicar coming slowly toward Bryn, bound on much the same errand as herself. Meg turned back and let him in with her own key, so that he went in, as he wished it, quietly and unannounced. Rotha was sitting by the fire in her black dress, looking white and weak, as though she had had an illness, but trying to interest herself in some work Meg had wished her to do. She started up when she saw the vicar; her composure visibly left her, and she trembled violently. But he sat down beside her with his old kind smile—a little graver, perhaps—and questioned her so tenderly about her health, and what she had been doing with herself, that her agitation soon subsided, and she found herself talking to him, soothed in spite of herself by his calmness and sympathy.

And yet the vicar looked worn and ill, and there were dark lines under his eyes, which betokened sleeplessness and pain. He looked like a man who had battled through some great sorrow and had attained peace. He could think now for others besides himself, and very tenderly and skilfully he set about performing the work which he had in hand—which was not only Rotha's consolation, as she found out afterward.

But just now he seemed to have no thought but for her, and indeed the weary young face smote him with strange feelings of compassion.

"I have been thinking of you so often, Rotha," he said. "I have thought of the little sister as one whom I have loved and chastened, and who will always be dearer to us than ever now, because Gar loved her."

Ah! she has not heard the name since, and her tears fall fast.

"Do you remember what I said that night about our dear boy—that he was not poor Gar, but happy Gar now? Ah! Rotha, think of it literally, not figuratively, 'drawn out of many waters,' and so brought into the haven where he would be."

"I know," she returned; "but so young, and to die so terrible a death!"

"Is it terrible, I wonder?" mused the vicar. "They mount up to the heavens, they go down again to the depths, it may be their soul is melted because of trouble. Let us hope that bitter baptism, that weary chrisom, were less terrible than our imagination paints them. Oh, Rotha, never forget 'man's extremity is God's opportunity.' What if the angel of healing went down with him into the troubled waters? Are not the darkness and the light both alike to him?"

"He was fit to die," said the girl, weeping; "none more so—I know it."

"He would not like to hear us say so, and yet we may console ourselves that 'this our brother rests in sure and certain hope.' When I speak of Garon I always think of some trusty young soldier of the cross. If any one loved his Lord, he did. It seemed to me," continued the vicar solemnly, "at least in my poor human judgment, as though he always strove to follow the advice of the Wise Man, 'Let thy garment be always white, and thy head lack no ointment.' He was not worldly-wise, Rotha, hardly as clever as most men; but it may be that of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Rotha still wept, but more silently. These premises of her lost love were like a sweet solemn dirge. "Oh, if we could only be like him!" she murmured out of a full heart.

"Yes, indeed," returned the vicar; "he has taught me many a lesson, has my poor boy, when he only thought he was learning from me. Once, when he was a very little child, Rotha, a mere infant at his mother's knee, he asked if he might not pray to die young; and only a few years ago he told me that he always missed out that clause in the Litany, 'From sudden death, good Lord, deliver us.' I had some difficulty in persuading him that it merely meant 'sudden unprepared death.' Oh, Rotha, when I think of his hidden life among us, a life so different from other men's, I feel sure that the Lord's mark was on him."

"I always said he was good," faltered Rotha. "When all he were against me, he was kind to me. Even that dreadful evening at Nettie's he came up to me and wished me good-night. Do you think I shall ever forget it? He was my best friend, the kindest, the truest, and he loved me. Oh, Mr. Ord, what shall I do, what shall I do?"

He waited quietly until the pent-up feelings had had their vent, and then he took her hand and told her—what she knew already, and yet what it was always good to hear—how the sinless One had wept beside an open grave, and how since then the tears of all mourners had been hallowed. He told her that she was right to weep for Garon, for a nobler and a braver heart had never gone to its rest. And then when he had said this he asked her to listen to him, for he wanted to tell her about some one who was more unhappy than she, and when she looked at him inquiringly he told her that it was Robert.

"Robert?" repeated Rotha doubtfully. She was a little confused as to the vicar's meaning. "Robert more unhappy than she?" Her sad face seemed to add "impossible."

"Yes, Robert; my brother, Rotha. When I saw him just now I was almost shocked at his appearance. He looked as though he had gone without food or rest for days; his eyes were bloodshot, his face quite haggard, and his hand felt almost as weak as yours. I could hardly speak to him, he started me so."

"But why," asked Rotha, quite bewildered. She began to feel rather frightened at the vicar's description. "Surely it could not be Gar's loss only? I did not know he loved him so," she said, with quivering lips. "I thought he could not quite understand him; that he made him impatient?"

"Perhaps so," returned the vicar; "but, Rotha, do not your very words give the clue to Robert's misery? If he felt he had always been kind and patient to the poor boy, do you think his grief would be so unbearable? You know the tenacity with which Robert clings to one idea. Well, he has got it into his head that it is all his fault that this has happened—that, but for him, Gar would never have gone away. He tells me that you said so, and he says that he never means to see you again."

"What!" exclaimed Rotha, sorely troubled, "not see me—Robert! Mr. Ord, surely you misunderstood him, he could not have said that?"

"He not only said it, but I am afraid he meant it," replied Anstin. "He says he has injured you past all hope of forgiveness, and that you will not care to see his face again. He was terribly vehement over it. You know Robert's way. What with this hopeless engagement of his and Gar's death, and all his morbid feeling, I am afraid he will torment himself into a fever. He looks ripe for anything to-night, and Rotha, we can hardly bear any more trouble just now. My dear child, where are you going?"

"I am going to Robert, of course. Come, Mr. Ord."

"But now, at this late hour of the evening?"

"Why not? There is no time to be lost. Did you not mean me to go and see him?"

"Yes, certainly, when you are stronger. I only hoped you would volunteer, but not to-night. You are not fit; and it is so cold and damp outside, snowing hard too."

"Do you think the snow ought to prevent my going to Gar's brother? Oh, Mr. Ord, how can you think such a thing; Would not Gar have gone?" And the vicar, secretly overjoyed at this unlooked-for success, offered no further objections.

It was a bitter night. The wind had subsided, but the air was full of the driving snow. The roads were already covered with it, and Rotha shivered and clung closer to the vicar's arm, for it seemed to her excited fancy as though the whole place was one great winding-sheet, and she was being pelted by frozen tears. She had no idea she was so weak till she stood at the vicarage gate with trembling limbs waiting for him to go in.

"Not there!" exclaimed the vicar. "Robert is in his own house. He never stops long with us of an evening now." And, opening the door, he looked back and beckoned her to follow.

Rotha was a little staggered when she found it was Robert's house that she was to enter, but she took courage when she remembered it had been Garton's home too. She followed the vicar through the dark hall and up the narrow staircase, wondering how she was to account for her intrusion, but perfectly convinced she was doing the right thing all the same. She waited while the vicar tapped at the study-door, and followed him closely when the impatient "Come in" gave them a right to enter.

"I have brought a friend to see you, Robert," began the vicar cheerfully. "Rotha heard you were far from well, and she wished to accompany me and judge for herself. Well, my dear fellow, what's the matter?"

"Miss Maturin here—in this house!" burst out Robert. But Rotha stepped forward and laid her hand lightly on his shoulder.

"Yes, I have come to see you, Robert," speaking his Christian name for the first time so naturally. "I could not bear to think that Gar's brother was ill, and I might do him good and yet keep away. I am very weak. May I sit down?" she said softly, taking the seat next to him.

Ah! there was no need to question the vicar's account when she saw his face.

He had been sitting, or rather crouching, over the fire when they had entered, and had hardly raised his head till Rotha's name was mentioned; a more desolate figure, amid more desolate surroundings, it was scarcely possible to see. The fire had burnt low, and was merely a mass of reddened embers; a candle guttered on the table by the side of a smoky reading-lamp, and a solitary meal, untempting and untouched, was spread amidst a mass of books, inkstands, and heterogeneous rubbish. Cinders lay curled up on Garton's empty chair, and beside her was his old felt hat, still left as he had last flung it down. How tenderly the vicar took it up, and lifted the favorite cat on his knee!

"Don't touch it," said Robert savagely; "he left it there." He had made no sort of response to Rotha's friendly pressure—unless the weary stare he gave her may be called one; only, when she took that seat beside him, he turned away his face with a sort of groan. If this had come to him, if her reproachful face were to haunt him, let him die, for what good was his life to him?

"Will you speak to me? I am not very well, and I have come to see you. Dear Mr. Ord, ask him not to turn from me when I am so sorry for him—so very sorry for him."

"Do not waste your sorrow upon me," returned Robert hoarsely, addressing her for the first time. "Austin, why did you bring her when you knew that I never intended to see her again? Have I not darkened her life sufficiently without bringing her here?"

"He did not bring me; I came of my own accord," returned Rotha, trying bravely to restrain her tears. "I heard that you were ill and unhappy, and tormenting yourself; and I said, 'If Gar's brother wants me he will never send for me; I must go and tell him that it is all right—that it will never be wrong again between him and me.'"

"Rotha, are you mad? Do you hear her, Austin? Right between her and me when she knows that but for me that poor boy would never have gone away—would be happy now—yes, happy, and sitting where you are!"

"God would have it otherwise," replied the weeping girl. "Do not make it too hard for me to say, 'His will be done.' I will not blame you—no, not for worlds; because you had pledged your word, and thought it right for him to go. Could you know that he would never come back again—that we should see his face no more?"

"If I thought you could forgive me—" he began; but she interrupted him.

"There is nothing to forgive—nothing," she said hurriedly. "To think I could cherish bitterness against his brother when he loved me so dearly, and wanted me to be his wife! Oh, put away those terrible fancies; they are not worthy of you. Dear Mr. Ord, tell him that I will love him and be his sister if he will only let me."

But the vicar, making her a sign, moved quietly away; he thought it well that, for a moment at least, he should leave him to her woman's tenderness. It was well he did so, for he had scarcely left the room a minute before Robert, overwhelmed by his conflicting emotions, and worn out by sleeplessness, broke into those convulsive tearless sobs which are so terrible to hear—a man's agony finding sudden vent, but giving no relief, and tearing his frame to pieces with useless throes.

Rotha lost her courage when she heard those terrible sobs.

"Do not; I cannot bear it. You are hurting me. Do not make me sorry that I came. Oh, Gar, Gar, if you were only here to help me! What would you say to see him like this?"

"Have I frightened you, Rotha? Give me your hand a moment—there, it will pass directly. Oh, forgive me! I know you do. I feel you do; but if you knew what I have suffered! There, say something more to me; call me Robert again; it may exorcise the demon within me."

"Poor Robert! There, you are better now. You were ill; you could not help it. You have not slept for nights, perhaps, and that has shattered your nerves."

"I think I prayed not to sleep," he returned, shuddering. "Have you not seen it all, Rotha? I have, over and over again. I dare not shut my eyes, for fear that poor boy's face should haunt me. Last night I saw him clearly; he had his hands clasped on his breast, and his dead eyes seemed to look me through and through."

"Hush!" said the girl, trembling. "It was only a dream. When I see him I always fancy there is a halo round his head."

"I cannot get his voice out of my ears. How long ago is it? hardly a fortnight, since he said: 'Good-bye, Robert; I hope you will not miss me much. Take care of yourself.'"

"Are you doing as he said?" returned Rotha gently. "The vicar tells me that you eat nothing. I can see you have not tasted anything this evening. No wonder your nerves are unstrung if you neglect yourself like this."

"What does that matter? What good am I to any one! Oh, if these three months were but over, and I could get away somewhere—anywhere out of this place."

His agitation began to return, but she laid her hand on his arm and called him brother softly, and then put aside her cloak, and told the vicar, when he came back, that she was not going to leave him just yet, and begged him to help her to put things a little comfortable for him.

Did she guess what she was doing for him when she laid aside her own trouble and weakness to minister to the stricken man who a little while ago had been her greatest enemy? Years afterward he told her that she had saved him from brain-fever, for sleeplessness and want of food, and the morbid dwelling on one diseased idea, had driven him well-nigh mad. "A few hours more, another night of that terrible solitude would have done for me," he said, and Rotha, as she recalled the fierce fire of his eyes and the strangeness of his manner, felt within herself that he was right.

Some one besides Robert blessed Rotha as she moved softly about the comfortable room. In a little while she had coaxed the sullen embers into a cheerful blaze, the smoky lamp was re-trimmed, and the little black kettle sang merrily on the hob, the cricket came out with a premonitory chirp, and Cinders, rousing herself in the belief that something was going on, jumped uninvited on Robert's knee and purred loudly as she whisked her tail in his face.

The vicar knew how to be useful, and had the table cleared in a trice. Old Sarah toddled up with more tempting-looking viands; and then he and Rotha sat down to break bread at Robert's table.

When had Robert ever failed in his duty as host before? But he failed now. He let Rotha bring his cup to him, and, though he loathed the very sight of food, he ate and drank to please her. The vicar told Mary afterward that he almost shuddered at the haggardness and beauty of Robert's face, and that, as Rotha sat beside him in her black dress, she looked, but for her un-covered hair, like a young Sister of Mercy.

Rotha did not say much till tea was over. She began to look somewhat spent, and the vicar told Robert that he must take her away; but before she left she told him that she should be at the Vicarage to-morrow, and that she hoped he would be there. And then she whispered to him a few words, and that he must never hurt her so again, for that it was all right between them—that she prayed for him every night, and pitied him from her heart.

Later on, just as Robert was beginning to relapse into his dreary brooding, and the cricket had gone in, and the fire had began to burn very low, the door opened, and a round boyish face, very sleepy, and no longer rosy, thrust itself into the room.

"Please, Uncle Robert, it's nearly eleven! Aren't you going to bed? There's such a jolly fire in your room, and mother's muddled some wine, and it's all so comfortable. Do come and see."

"A fire in my room! Am I ill? Good gracious, Guy, whatever brings you here at this time of night? Go home, lad, and go to bed, do."

"I am not going to bed till you do," maintained Guy sturdily. "I've come to keep you company, Uncle Robert, and to see that your fire does not go out, and that you have proper food to eat, and that Cinders does not drink up all the cream. Holloa, Cinders, come here."

"But, Guy," remonstrated his uncle feebly, but cheered unconsciously by the lad's sleepy face, "this is all nonsense. I am not ill—at least, not very. Who sent you to me?"

"Who sent me? Oh, father and Rotha. I was asleep when they came in; but it was so jolly getting up. I heard Rotha tell him that you must not be left alone to feed on your own thoughts. Mother came in, and got all comfortable; but she is gone now. Come along to bed, Uncle Bob, there's a good fellow; for I am awfully sleepy, and I won't budge an inch till you do."

Rotha knew what she was about when she persuaded the vicar to wake up Guy, for the boy dearly loved his uncle, and for his sake would be ready to sacrifice anything. He sat on the bed and chatted till the muddled wine, and the warmth, and the company had made Robert drowsy. Half-a-dozen times in the night he turned out of his warm bed, roused by Robert's restless murmurings:

"Is that you, Gar. I didn't mean it, Gar. I wouldn't have sent you away for worlds."

"No, of course not. Go to sleep, Uncle Bob. It's only Guy."

"Only Guy! My dear lad, are you sure of it? I thought it was Gar. Give me your hand, boy—there." And Robert, turning over on his side, and muttering still, would fall into another short moaning sleep, and so on, until with the dawning day he slept soundly for a few hours.

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXV.

The perusal of the Book of Ecclesiastes leaves upon the mind of a thoughtful reader impressions of profound melancholy. Human life is there sketched in most sombre colors. As we listen to some wild, sad piece of music, wherein amid much variety there ceases not to be heard, now faintly and now with heavy distinctness, the toll of the funeral bell, even thus do we listen to this story of human sorrow, with its ever recurring theme, Vanity of vanities; all is vanity.

The Preacher gives, as we have seen, a mournful account of the progress of decay as we reach old age. And then the curtain falls.

We may think of life as a cord woven of many silver strands, easily severed at its best, and sure in the end to rust and break. Or let it be as a lamp supplied from a golden reservoir, and that fed by unseen hands; a light apt to be put out by violence or accident, and sure to flicker and die when its supplies are exhausted. Or, regarding especially its wonderful mechanism and ceaseless circulation, we may compare it to an Eastern cistern: its waters will pass away until but the dregs are left; its overworn machinery will finally give out, and the dilapidated wheel and broken conduit tell that its work is done. "Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

In silence is the worn-out frame borne to its last, long home; for a few days the mourners move in melancholy procession through the streets; and nought remains but for the thoughtful survivor to exclaim, "Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; but if a man live many years and rejoice in them all, yet let him remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity."

Such is the prospect which bounds the view of mortal man; this is the wine which the world keeps for the last. Leave the unseen out of the question and indulge ourselves with the hope that earth shall treat us as favorites, that no sudden disaster shall overwhelm us, nor unexpected summons shall call us hence; and what does it all come to? Languor and imbecility, joylessness and fatigue; the members stiffening slowly for the shroud, the earth withdrawing from us day by day, and at last to die; a thing of course; and the event next in natural order.

There is a bright side to this picture; but unless Faith directly or indirectly gilds these closing scenes, the darkness is without relief. And if this be a fair summary of man's history: he is born, he sports, he labors, he is disquieted, he is merry, he rears children to tread the same path a little way behind him, he grows old, he dies; then no pathos is too deep, no words too sad, no dirge too mournful to suit the end of his profitless career.

Observe that Solomon is describing the sorrows of an old age which knows no God, and founds on it all the argument for early piety: "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not nor the years draw nigh," whose manifold woes he so touchingly describes. He would impress upon us that as in old age we most need the consolations of a reconciled God, so, also, it is almost hopeless to reconcile us to Him then, if we have spent our lives at variance with Him.

If in early age the Creator be remembered, then is there implanted in us the germ and principle of another life, which spurs the limit of threescore and ten, and whose years are the cycles of a vast eternity—a life which is not fed on meat and drink, and whose property is to thrive and grow in the midst of ruin and dilapidation.

As the eye and ear grow dull to things of sense, this life quickens them to see the radiance of the heavenly city and to hear the music of its eternal song. As the things of time do cease to please and active labor is suspended, it fills the memory with sweet recollections of the past, and invests the future with holy hopes. Let the outward man perish, the keepers of the house tremble, and the strong ones bend, the inward man is renewed day by day, and the faculties of the soul are invested with immortal youth.

This memory of the Creator sits like a halo of glory upon the gray hairs of age, and makes the Christian warrior most honorable as his warfare approaches its end.

And when at last the silver cord is loosed and the golden bowl is broken, when the pitcher is broken at the fountain and the wheel broken at the cistern, howbeit all may seem wreck and ruin, the useless remnant of a fallen house, that soul that dwelt therein while yet its tenement was new and strong, shall haste away to be clothed upon with its house which is from heaven, and to dwell where time makes no invasion, where sickness comes not to destroy.

"Then," as Seneca has said, "that day which men call our last shall be our birthday into eternity."

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH TRAVEL.

York and York Minster.

BY M. MEDLICOTT.

From Ely to Peterborough is only a short railway ride, and we did not like to pass by this city, even though the visit must be a brief one. So on our way to York we decided to stop over at Peterborough for a few hours, and felt repaid for the visit, though we saw the cathedral under great disadvantages, indeed very imperfectly. The great central tower was torn down, and all the middle of the cathedral filled with scaffolding, only the eastern end of the choir being boarded off for use, so that we could get but faint impressions of what must have been, and would be again, the beauty of the whole. What chiefly interested me here was the brass lectern, dating from the fourteenth century, which had been buried in a garden near by, to preserve it from the vandalism (as we may well call it) of Cromwell's soldiers. The feet were broken off in this hiding, and the mending so roughly done that the soldering still shows plainly. The roof of the nave is painted in a similar style to that of Ely, but under the circumstances we could not so well appreciate the beauty of the building, and hope sometime to visit it again. Outside, the quiet enclosure was thickly strewn with grave-stones, and beautifully shaded as it was, seemed to afford a favorite resting-place for persons passing by, or nurses with their juvenile charges, for I noticed many such here and there seated on the ground or the stones.

The restoration of Peterborough Cathedral has been unfortunately delayed by differences of opinion among those who have charge of this noble work; but we trust all vexed questions are now happily settled, and that the tower will rise again ere long in more than its former beauty, and in perfect strength and fitness for its place.

It was late in the evening that, arriving in the ancient and venerable city of York, we found ourselves comfortably housed in the Royal Station Hotel. As is the case in many towns in England, the hotel adjoins the railway station, so that we could pass directly from one to the other, following the smart looking porter wheeling our luggage. Too late for anything but supper and bed, glad were we of these and of a night's rest.

York at last! Thought was busy with all we had heard and read and hoped to see. Not alone for its famous minster is this place interesting, its history and associations command our deepest respect, nay, reverence. Way back in the times of the Roman's, Eboracum, as it was then called, held high rank, being of more importance than London. It was the usual resting place of the Roman emperors on occasions of their visits to Britain, and was conquered and occupied by the Romans (being then a British town of some importance) about A.D. 70, and indeed was made by them the metropolis of their empire in Britain. Since then what changes it has seen! Occupied in turns, as we see, by British, Romans, Saxons, Danes, Normans, all of whom have left more or less of their own impress on the place. One of the most interesting episodes—if we may so call it—must have been the baptism on Easter Day, A.D. 627, of the Northumbrian king, Edwin, who, under the teaching of the good priest, Paulinus, had embraced Christianity, having married the daughter of the Christian king, Ethelbert of Kent. To the latter, under the direction of St. Augustine, we owe the Cathedral of Canterbury. To Edwin, under the direction of Paulinus, who was made its first bishop, we owe the cathedral church of York. For though the original building in which the king was baptized, reared in Saxon fashion chiefly of wood, was soon replaced by a larger stone church enclosing this small temporary one, in its turn to be rebuilt or replaced, wholly or in part, again and again. From that time, on this spot, for more than twelve hundred years has been uplifted the voice of prayer and praise to the glory of God.

So much to see, one hardly knows where to begin! As all roads are said to lead to Rome, so here all streets lead to or centre at the minster. But on the way thither, how much of interest! Across the river Ouse, (though a different stream from that at Ely,) and outside the walls enclosing the old city, as our hotel stands, we have to pass through heavy arched gates, or "bars," as they are called, the "gates" meaning streets, to gain admittance to the town. High and broad the walls are, and we must walk around them, or part-way at least, for they are broken and taken away in places. But now let us go through the nearest "bar," and across the fine bridge, at the end of which a man comes out of a little house, demanding the toll of a penny. Having inquired our way previously, there was little difficulty in knowing where to go. York is not a hilly town, and the minster is shut in very much by surrounding houses, though many of these have been removed of late years. Grand and noble in its massiveness, it rises soon before us, and we do not realize at once its great size, any more than we can realize its exceeding beauty. Perhaps beauty is scarcely the word to use, for majesty and dignity seem more in keeping with all its proportions.

How stately is the west front rising directly before us, with its rich Gothic arched doorways, a deeply-recessed, beautifully-ornamented double one in the centre, smaller ones under the towers that flank the sides. The beautiful window above the central doorway, the dignity of the towers on either hand—all combine in grand effect. Let us walk around the outside of the minster before we enter, so shall we gain a better idea of its majesty. Note the height of the walls of nave, the walls of aisles only about half as high; the clerestory windows nearly as large as those in the side aisles, the massive, gabled transept, with the rich doorway and window above on the south side; the high window in the choir transept breaking the line of wall; the east end, so striking in all its detail of strength and beauty; the grand chapter-house, with its conical roof running so steeply aloft; and the length of north side with the gabled end of transept so totally different from the opposite one; and around and below all the lovely rich green of the velvet turf, and overhead the soft, fleecy clouds tempering the brightness of sun and sky. 'Twould be hard to find a fairer or nobler picture than this.

Within, as we enter at the west door, the better to gain our first view of the glorious harmony of nave and pillared aisle, involuntarily our steps are hushed, our voices stilled. We cannot talk in such a spot as this, we can only gaze and wonder, and treasure up in our minds to recall when far away the hallowed memories of the place. Hallowed indeed, as we think of some who have worshipped here and loved to tell us of this famous minster. So often described as this has been, we will not repeat the attempt. We will only in thought dwell upon the grandeur of the lofty nave, with its stately pillars separating it from the aisles, the exquisite carving on the capitals of these pillars, the beautiful, richly colored windows of both aisles and clerestory, the central tower open to such a height, with its windows on every side, adding richness to the whole, the massive screen, dividing choir from nave, consisting of fifteen compartments or niches, each holding a life-size (though they do not look so) statue of kings of England, ending with Henry VI. Then on either side, opening from the central tower, are the great transepts, the north one ending with the window so well known as the "Five Sisters," interesting to study in detail as well as exquisite at first glance, the south transept ending with a magnificent doorway, to which steps lead up from the floor, and rose-window above, with the same exquisite carvings to be seen here as elsewhere. From this doorway, too, how fine the view across the cathedral, unequalled by similar view in any other building for extent and grandeur, while the choir is in keeping with all the rest, and what more can be said of it, and the east window beyond, the largest in England, and one of the most beautiful.

Sunday in York! How much the words convey to one who has had such a privilege! To begin the day, looking out across the gardens and river and houses, to the grand old minster beyond, listening to the music of the bells chiming out for early service, ending with the full chime of twelve bells, was inspiring in itself, and a fitting prelude to the worship that was to follow, and which is not to be described in words. Such music I have never heard surpassed, and but rarely equalled, and though no musician. I can now recall the pathetic, entrancing notes of the anthem, "Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee," etc., and see the almost heavenly face of the young chorister in his white robes as he seemed to lose himself in his singing. Also the sweet words, "O rest in the Lord; wait patiently for Him, and He shall give thee thy heart's desire," forming the anthem at evening service. Here, too, we heard the "reading in," as it is called, of a newly appointed canon, giving another feature of interest to the day, and his sermon was a well-presented argument in favor of an established Church. Memorable services these were, and who could engage in such without feeling that it was indeed worshipping God "in the beauty of holiness." Then to end all, the organ pealing through the vaulted arches, and echoed back from wall and pillar and fretted roof, the thunder of its melowy would have been overpowering elsewhere. For half an hour or more we sat and listened, entranced to the glorious harmony, long as it lasted.

Later on, when the heat of the day had abated, we went out on the walls of the town, striking the portion of them surrounding the minster on two sides at a short distance off. From here the effect was very beautiful, for the western sun shone through the windows of the great tower from one side to the other, and gave such a strange impression. For there one stood almost betwixt heaven and earth, looking across the high roofs of the minster, through the richly colored windows of the tower, and down on the houses of the town below. One of the finest views can be had from this point, and especially worth seeing at such an hour. Perhaps even then few are so fortunate in obtaining such a unique picture as we had.

Of course there is much to interest one in York. So many old streets, narrow and crooked, and with overhanging houses, the upper stories projecting beyond the lower, till two persons could sometimes touch hands across the street from those upper windows. Some houses have old timber fronts, with odd little projecting windows; in such funny little court-yards opening out from the street, with houses surrounding them in turn. The market-place, running the length of two streets at right angles, with awnings stretched overhead. And more interesting, perhaps, still, the old walls of the city, wide enough for two or three to walk abreast on, with a battlement on one side and small towers at intervals, also here and there wide recesses with seats around them, forming pleasant places for rest and outlook.

The ruins of the old Abbey of St. Mary are very picturesque, almost jutting on the river, and the grounds about them are lovely, included in the Gardens of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society. This Abbey was one of the earliest founded in Yorkshire, and a colony of monks from here afterwards founded the famous and beautiful Fountains Abbey. At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, under Henry VIII., this Abbey of St. Mary's was one of the richest, not only in Yorkshire, but in the north of England. Only portions of the walls now remain, but these are well cared for. There are also some interesting old churches to be seen in York. Indeed, one could pleasantly spend many days in exploring this quaint old city, but further account must wait for another time.

A HYMN TO HOLY SPIRIT.

BY JOHN CULLEN.

"But the fruit of the Spirit is Love, Joy, Peace, Long-suffering, Gentleness, Goodness, Faith, Meekness, Self-control."—GAL. v. 22-23.

Blessed Spirit, Holy Ghost,
Now as at the Pentecost!
Fill us with Thy light and love,
And all graces from above.
Make us true in thought and word,
Pure and meet to serve the Lord,
That our life may ever be Wholly ruled, O Lord, by Thee.

We are dark, be Thou our light,
We are weak, be Thou our might,
We are sinful, make us pure,
We are wavering, us assure,
We are dying, give us life;
Calm, O Lord, our weary strife.
Let Thy love fill every heart,
Holy joy to each impart.

Give us peace, O Spirit blest,
Lead us unto Christ, our rest;
Let Thy gentleness divine,
In our lives in patience shine,
Lead our faith from strength to strength,
Till we reach our home at length,
There the praises we shall sing
Of our Saviour, God and King.

Meekness guide Thou in Thy way,
Goodness strengthen every day,
Power to bear, give us, O Lord,
Self-control in deed and word.
These the graces freely given Unto all who thirst for Heaven!
On us shower them, Lord, that we May live only, all, for Thee!

INDIVIDUALISM AND COMBINATION IN THEIR RELATION TO PURITY.

BY ELLICE HOPKINS.

The Church of England identifies herself with the Church of England Purity Society, of which her two archbishops are the presidents, and all her bishops are the vice-presidents, and she agitates for coercive legislation in the form of greater protection for the young from those who would betray their weakness or make a profit out of their corruption.

In reality, all who think deeply on the subject are inclined to consider both views as true, intense individualism and powerful combination being complementary to one another. Do not the curiously opposite decisions that thoughtful people arrive at on this vital and complex problem arise from their regarding it from two opposite sides? One mind contemplates the sins of impurity as they have their source in the individual will, and proceed from the evil heart of man. From this point of view it seems as absurd to combine against them as it would be to form a society for keeping one's temper or subduing one's pride. Intense individual dealing with souls and bringing them to the fountain of all healing, he sees as the only remedy.

Another contemplates it more in its external aspect. He sees it as a great organized evil, with its thousands of active emissaries, in its sadder aspect of the systematic degradation of woman, probably the most extensive and highly-organized trade in the world, and he is impressed by the wild absurdity of meeting it in any other way than by counter-organization. All individual effort he sees but too clearly will shatter itself in vain against these organized forces of evil. Take but one branch of the trade—the trade in bad literature. That one society has in little more than ten years suppressed in New York 130,000 pounds of bound books of an evil character; 194,000 bad pictures and photographs; 14,900 pounds of stereotype plates for printing 145 different obscene books; 22,000 names of persons catalogued and sold to dealers in bad literature as persons likely on receipt of circulars to send orders; that of evil books of the cheap kind, sold from twenty-five to fifty cents, there are one hundred and nine varieties, besides a large number of items that cannot even be specified; and that this does not represent more than one-tenth of the output of sewage that is being poured on New York, do we not feel the utter hopelessness of meeting so gigantic an evil by any amount of isolated, individual effort? Mere preaching the Gospel and saving individual souls will be as powerless against this traffic as it proved itself against the drink traffic till we learned to combine against it. Here, if anywhere, men must learn to stand shoulder to shoulder, if they are not to be swept before this muddy torrent. And are merely repressive measures sufficient in moral any more than in physical therapeutics? What should we say of the physician who merely repressed the fatal abscess he had to cure, and took no steps to strengthen his patient's constitution to throw it off by pouring in food, and tonics, and pure air? Besides your repressive agencies, do you not manifestly want some organization like the White Cross for the systematic circulation of good sound teaching on the whole subject, an organization with its members everywhere, and penetrating into your workshops and counting-houses, into your clubs and smoking-rooms, where the foot of the parson never comes—men banded together to strengthen one another's hands and hearts, and everywhere maintaining a higher and a purer standard and spreading sound teaching, till the outflow of sewage is met by a river clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God?

Or take again the state of public opinion. What hope is there while public opinion is where it is? Take the utterances of some of your own public papers at a recent election, or take the utterance of a peer, last year, in the English House of Lords, when, in opposing a measure for protecting virtuous girls in the streets, he said: "We have, all of us, been guilty of immorality in our youth, with very few exceptions, and I beseech you, my lords, to pause before you pass this law, lest our own sons come under it." Would he have said, with the same engaging frankness: "We have all of us cheated at cards or forged cheques in our youth, with very few exceptions," or have confessed to anything that men hold to be really disgraceful; but while the degradation of woman is not thought disgraceful to the men whose money alone makes this trade in the souls and bodies of their fellow-creatures possible, what hope is there?

Or take the evidence of those great truth tellers, words. Take the word virtue, and look it out in Chamber's Dictionary, and you will find as one of its meanings, "female purity." But the word originally meant manliness. Why then do we apply it to women? Why do we never speak of a man losing his virtue as we speak of a woman losing hers? Or the purely sexless word virgin, from the Latin virgido, to be fresh and green, how is it that it has come to mean an unmarried woman, and not equally an unmarried man? Whilst a young man going into business is met on the very threshold by the lie that chastity in men is a mere hypocritical pretence, whilst public opinion is where it is what hope is there? Have you intense individualism? get your regenerated individual. But will not his first action be to combine with others to get a sound public opinion? Is not the first want some ready-made public opinion on the side of right that you can quote? An ounce of fact is worth a ton of talking. Let us be able to point to the fact that men are banding themselves together to reverence womanhood, and live high, pure lives themselves and our young men will no longer feel themselves alone when they try to do right and will catch the inspiration of a high ideal.

On the other hand, I do not think in England we are blind to the need of intense individual effort, as well as of combination. We have only to remember that "individual" and "atom" are the same word, to be reminded that the nature of the combination depends on the qualities of the atom.

We must get rid of that "tradition of the elders" which makes it impossible for the present race of fathers to speak to their own boys, and makes the law of God by which the father is constituted the natural moral teacher of his own son of no effect. We must shatter that other "tradition of the elders" which has made it a received code that there must be an unclean land of mystery in her own son's life from all knowledge of which the mother is excluded, and mothers must be led to look on themselves as especially the guardians of their boys' purity. Such White Cross papers as "True Manliness" * I trust will prove helpful to parents in showing how the positive teaching of purity may be given without the difficulty that must always attend negative warnings against vice. School-teachers must be energized to watch over the purity of the children committed to their care far more than they have done. I do not know whether a little tract called "A Word to School-mistresses," † containing some helpful suggestions, is known in America. Educated women must lovingly take their working sisters by the hand and help them up to a far higher standard of care and decency in the training of their children. And the ministers of religion must make up their mind to give far more definite teaching as to the body being the temple of the Holy Ghost, and the life-giving functions the very shrine of that temple; and that purity is that which differentiates us from the beast, and is the very eye of the soul, without which, all divine vision, all high-seeing of duty and self-sacrifice and lofty endeavor becomes impossible, losing which, we lose the power of "seeing God" in the humblest of His redeemed creatures, or reverencing the sacred weakness of the divine in women and little children.

When the "intense individualism" of home teaching passes men on to the old order of knighthood for which that home teaching has been one long training—and let it be remembered that the White Cross movement is nothing more—when the standard of the White Cross is publicly raised, and men's "strength is as the strength of ten, because the heart is pure;" when they use that strength to protect woman from all that lowers and defiles them, and makes them unfit to be the mothers of our noble race; when of every man in that noble brotherhood, the poorest and most unprotected girl can feel, as of King Arthur:

"That all the time he by his side her bore
She was as safe as in a sanctuary."

Then through intense individualism and noble combination we may attain to a higher and a purer manhood and womanhood, and the strength of our race will be as the strength of ten, because the heart of England and America, her men and her women, will be pure and will "see God."

DUTY--GENERAL GRANT.

It is alone the military key which unlocks his character. He was not pre-eminently great as a statesman, nor as a political manager; and as a man of affairs in the business world he was simply a child. His ideals throughout were of that simple, frank, and faithful sort which belong, characteristically, to soldiers and sailors; and his faults, by so much, were those of one whom circumstances, in the hour of triumph, most unfortunately dragged beyond (or below) his sphere. For it was General Grant's very camp-bred simplicity of manhood—and, I believe, never the smallest tincture of dishonesty—which made him such an easy prey to the gross selfishness of those who surrounded him, first politically and afterward financially. And remember, there is grandeur, after all, about this kind of simplicity, which, in our American worship of the brilliant, and the smart, and the dexterous, and the shrewd, we are seriously in danger of forgetting. This is one of the lessons of this great death, to teach us that manhood alone is great, and that "the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God," and, in the end, with all good men as well! Brethren, there is in the long run a vastly greater foolishness in the swindler, however smart, than in the victim, however trustful. It needs a death like this, perhaps, to beat this in upon our numbed national sensibilities. For we are not quick to see it.

Two contrasts are suggested by this death. The first is historical, as between Grant and Napoleon. Think of it! The one represents the superiority of Duty above Ambition. The other represents Genius above Everything. The one sacrificed his thousands for the Imperial personality; the other, his tens of thousands for a principle! And oh! how just is the logic of events, and how sweet its poetry, too! Napoleon dies on the island of St. Helena, surrounded to the last simply by his military household. Grant dies upon a mountain of his native land, with his loved and loving household close beside him, and with his last thought completely saturated with the homely love of a husband for a wife and of a father for his children! Surely, we are great, and great is the republic!

The second contrast is not so flattering to us the nation over. It is the contrast which will be presented on the burial day between the two ends of the metropolis; for at the one end will be the most glorious and solemn interment that our nation has ever known. And at the other there will be Ludlow Street Jail. At the one end will be gathered the greatest men of the nation to honor the stern, rugged, self-sacrificing dutifulness of the dear old soldier-hero. At the other there will be the "Napoleon of finance." But wait! The antithesis is intensely moral as well as dramatic. For who is Ferdinand Ward, after all, but the single fruit of a vast business system of unmanly duplicity and selfish evasion which is producing Ferdinand Wards every hour? We can't avoid personalities at this sacred moment. No more can we afford to make the contrast merely personal. God goes deeper. He is no respecter of persons. With Him the antithesis forms the condemnation of no particular swindler. It rebukes the spirit of covetousness wherever found, which goes on prostituting genius and entrapping greatness every day among us. Oh, let us learn something of noble usefulness in this our hour of keen bereavement!—From a sermon by the Rev. C. W. Ward.

BISHOP WHIPPLE MAKES APPEAL.

In all the dark story of our broken faith with the Indians, I recall no instance of greater wrong than that done to the Chippewas. They have, as a people, always been our friends. A large part of Minnesota's goosly heritage belonged to them. The lands which have brought us untold wealth and on which are now builded our villages and cities were once their hunting-grounds. It was an Indian paradise. The lakes and rivers were filled with fish, the forests and prairies abounded with game and the wild rice was God's manna for the red man. The amounts which were promised to them for the sale of their land were sometimes wasted or stolen, and the deadly fire-water and the evil example of bad white men dragged them down to a depth of sorrow their fathers had never known. At a time when their annuities have nearly ceased, when their game has been destroyed, and hunger and disease stand at the door of the wigwam, we have done this poor people the greatest wrong in their history.

We needed more water for our manufactories and for our river commerce. Without regard to the rights of the Indians, Congress authorized the building of dams on the upper Mississippi. They have cost several hundred thousand dollars. They will overflow over fifty square miles of land on the Leech Lake Reservation. It will destroy their rice fields from which they gather over two thousand bushels annually. It destroys part of their sugar orchards from which they gather a large yield of sugar. It destroys their main supply of fish. They depend for winter food on a species of white fish, "the tull bee," which comes in vast numbers on the shoals of their lakes in October, and they say when the lakes are raised fifteen feet they cannot take their annual supply of fish. For four years these Indians have sent appeal after appeal for redress. The Department of the Interior asked their agent to report the facts, and his statements were received with incredulity. Captain Blakely and the Rev. J. A. Gilliland were appointed a commission to assess the damages, and their report shared the same fate. The Government has offered the Indians less compensation than the value of the millions of feet of their pine used in the construction of the dams.

There is hardly a month that I do not receive some pitiful appeal from these poor, wronged men.

I have hoped against hope that at last justice would be done to them. I fear the words of Secretary Edwin M. Stanton to me are true: "Bishop, your pleading at Washington is useless. The United States Government never redresses a wrong until the people demand it. When the heart of the nation is reached, then, and not till then, will the Indian receive justice at our hands." If the plea of justice is unheeded by us, we may be sure we shall receive justice at the hands of God.

COURTESIES AND DISCOURTESIES.

There are many courtesies which a gentleman should render to a lady, the absence of which is at once felt, and causes people involuntarily to remark inwardly to themselves, "Oh, not aloud to their friends; 'That man has not good manners.'" I passed that judgment the other evening when I was sitting with a friend by her fireside. A gentleman was ushered in who was well-known to my friend, but a comparative stranger to me. He shook hands with her first, which was, of course, the right thing to do, and then, while speaking to her, he shook hands with me. The breaker of this law of courtesy was a young professional man, well endowed with this world's goods. I should not record this little rudeness if it was only of rare occurrence, but I often notice people guilty of this discourtesy—namely, that of shaking hands with one person while they are speaking to another person. If you wish to say more than "How do you do?" to your hostess, or to any one else whom you greet at first, it is less discourteous to continue your conversation with her for a few moments before taking notice of any one near her, than it is to stretch out your hand and shake that of her neighbor while your face is turned away and your lips are addressing another person.

The discourteous young man to whom I have alluded gave me another reason for my verdict, and as in this respect also he is by no means the only offender in general society, I shall mention the little rudeness. There are three, if not more, separate syllables and sounds which some people utter or make when they have not heard what has been said to them, or when they wish to express assent. These are: What? Eh? Uh! and a guttural sound of the letter m, which cannot be expressed in writing. "I beg your pardon," or "What did you say?" are sentences which should certainly be said when a repetition is asked for; and "Yes" should not be replaced by a grunt when an assent is given.

There are numerous little acts which a man of courtesy will perform. While he is calling at a house, he will rise and open the door for any lady who leaves the room, even if she is an entire stranger to him; in his own house he will not only open the door of the room, but accompany the lady to the hall door, and open that, if there is no servant at hand to do so, for a departing guest, whether lady or gentleman, should not be left to find their way alone. Neither should they be allowed to find their way into a room. When you act as a host, and your guest accompany you into the drawing-room, do not say, my dear sir, follow the practice of some forgetful or neglectful men, who walk in and march straight up the room, leaving their one guest, or a train, as the case may be, to follow and to close the door. A host should open the door, and shut it after his guests have entered the room.

Amongst other small courtesies a gentleman will rise from his chair, however luxuriously comfortable, and offer assistance, if need be, to a lady if she goes to put coals on the fire, or if she tries to open or close a window. When he escorts her into a room, he will see that she is seated before he looks for a chair for himself; when he escorts her to a table, he will wait to arrange for her comfort, hold the chair, or push it backwards or forwards, as required, before he takes his own seat. And during the meal he will see that she is provided with all she is likely to want. The lady ought not to be obliged to ask for salt, for water, for another cup of tea, or, in fact, for anything that is on the table.—Cassell's Family Magazine for September.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

HARE AND HOUNDS.

BY ETHEL SAUNTON JULIAN.

"It'll be a capital place for hare and hounds."

"Yes, won't it though, just think of those big fields and the woods!"

"Is there anything else?" Mrs. Brown asked, "smiling, this is not more than the twentieth game you have proposed, so I really think we shall have to stay all the year that you may manage them. I know there is excellent skating on the pond."

"What a shame, mother, you are teasing us; of course we want to think of all these things beforehand."

"Certainly, I was only suggesting the skating."

"I wonder if those English fellows will know of any new games."

"Yes, heaps, likely: don't you think so, mother?"

"I daresay, dear; Tom, hand me that shawl-strap; and Charlie, I wish you would let Alice lie down on the seat."

The train whirled along, and the merry party that had been chattering since morning, subsided into silence. No wonder every one was very happy and talkative, for at last they had started on the journey that had been anticipated for a whole year; Mother, Ella, Tom, Charlie and Alice.

Mrs. Brown felt relieved to think that all the trunks were packed, and better still, locked; Ella was thinking of the strange cousin, and a little bit about her dresses as well; "girls always thought of such silly things," the boys said contemptuously; and their heads were full, yes, more than full, of the lads from over the sea.

Surely nowhere was there a more charming place to spend the summer than at the farm. Such boating, fishing and bathing as any boy's heart could desire, and this year it would be doubly pleasant, for Aunt Fanny and her flock were coming across the Atlantic to join them.

The sun sank lower in the west, throwing bright beams across the car and revealing the smut on the travelers' faces, but no one minded dust or cinders when they were so near their destination.

As the train slackened speed at the last station a pair of eager faces were thrust out of the window, soon however to be drawn back in disappointment.

"I don't believe they are here, mother, there are lots of people, but no one we know."

"I am sure the carriage must be behind the station, bring those parcels, boys, and Alice, take my hand."

"Here they are surely, Hugh, come and speak to them."

"Wait a minute, Rolf, be quiet till we see."

"There isn't a doubt, what nonsense."

The younger of the two boys on the platform stepped forward and laid a hand on Mrs. Brown's bag.

He had unusually broad shoulders, and a comical twist about his wide mouth that made Ella inclined to laugh.

"You must be our aunt," he said, "let me carry this."

"And you are Rolf, I am sure," Mrs. Brown replied, stooping down to kiss him.

Then Hugh came forward, and after hasty greetings they all got into the carriage and were driven rapidly to the country.

It is wonderful how quickly boys become friends. Before Ella and Mary had overcome their shyness the four were firm allies, and scouring the country in search of adventures, which they generally succeeded in finding; for if Rolf did not tumble into a pond, Charlie was almost sure to be thrown from a colt's back, so it was fortunate "the mothers" had no nerves.

They were all sitting about the dining table one damp evening, and an unusual silence prevailed, as "Old Maid" had lost its charm and no one could suggest a pleasanter game.

"I wish we had some corn to pop," Tom said, looking meditatively at the grate, where a little fire had been kindled.

"Yes, wouldn't it be prime?" assented Rolf, stretching himself on the hearth rug in an unmanly position that Hugh would have scorned.

"Or apples to roast."

"Yes, it's the wrong time of year," Charlie replied forlornly, and they were beginning to think themselves ill-used and much to be pitied when Aunt Fanny changed the current of their ideas.

"What are you going to do on Saturday, boys?"

"Nothing particular, I think. Oh, it's Rolf's birthday, isn't it?"

"And Saturday always ought to be jolly."

"We've talked a great deal about hare and hounds," Charlie said, looking up from the "Old Maid," whom he was adorning with a mustache and a horrible squint.

"Let us have that," Hugh replied, with unusual animation. So of course no one could be happy until a basket and some newspapers were found, and they all fell to tearing scent—forlorn no longer.

"If only it is a fine day," they all said, as if Saturday were the only day in all the year that the hounds could chase the hare.

But a fine day it was, with a fresh little wind to temper the sunshine, and some fleecy white clouds in the sky.

It had been arranged that Rolf and Tom should be hares, and soon after eight o'clock they were off, leaving the hounds by the home gate.

It was just the day for a brisk run, and the soft grassy wood-path was pleasant to the feet.

"We may as well scatter it pretty thick here," Rolf said laughing, as he threw out a handful of the torn papers. "But we'll give them more trouble to find it by-and-by."

They had turned into the fields and hardly thought of their route until they reached the third fence, where they stopped a moment for breath.

"Which way had we better go now?" "I don't know, down by the brook? or we might take those turnip fields."

"Then we'll get on old Barry's land," Tom said as they went along, going rather slowly to be in good order for the long home run.

"They'll have some trouble to find the scent here," Rolf chuckled as the paper fell under the broad turnip leaves. Then on and across a brook, where they jumped from stone to stone, letting little white boats float down the stream.

"Hark! I hear voices."

They stopped suddenly, trying to hush their loud breathing.

"They couldn't have struck us the wrong way," Rolf whispered reassuringly, and as there was no more sound they went on cautiously, stepping softly through the dry underbrush, taking the thickest paths and doubling a good deal to deceive the hounds.

Meantime the other party were on the path, and had little difficulty for some distance.

"I have an idea of the way they will take," Hugh said, loftily, going a little in advance of the others; for the girls had joined the chase, and held on bravely over ploughed ground, ditches, and stone walls, though their progress was somewhat impeded by helping Alice over the fences and hedges. The boys were nearly a whole field ahead, when the scent turned, bringing them back to the same spot from which they had started.

"Oh, do help me, Charlie," Alice begged; "I'm stuck, and the girls have gone away."

Charlie stopped a moment, and lifted her from the fence.

"It's dreadful hot. Couldn't you take me home?"

"Oh, I say, pussy, that's too much," he said, but kindly, for the little girl was a great pet of his.

"I'm so very tired; please do, Charlie."

"It would take me a good half hour," he said, considering, "and the others would get miles ahead. Both the girls, where did they go?"

"Way over to get fowers," Alice replied, trying to keep the tears back, and lifting such a weary, warm little face, that Charlie's heart melted, and he lifted her over the fence again.

"You must come pretty fast, pussy," he said; so the little maiden struggled bravely over the upturned furrows, which were as mountains to her small legs, and made no murmur about the gravel in her slippers.

"I don't care much 'bout hare and hounds or Rolf's birthday, do you, Charlie?" she panted, as they gained the last field.

So they went on together, the little one slowly, and he holding his impatience in check with a strong hand.

"What brought you back, Charlie? Alice isn't ill?"

"Oh, no mother; but she was tired, and the girls had gone off."

"My dear boy," Mrs. Brown said, bestowing a motherly kiss on his warm forehead. "Wouldn't you like an apple turn-over?" Aunt Fanny suggested, her admiration taking a practical form that was not to be despised.

The commendation, turn-overs, and a glass of milk having had a good effect on Charlie's spirits, he set off with renewed vigor, taking another direction, as he reflected that the hares must make a circuit to reach home.

He went on for several miles without meeting a hound or seeing the trail of the hares; he had watched closely, and could not have crossed their path; so they had

THEY WERE OFF, LEAVING THE HOUNDS BY THE HOME GATE.

"It might be good enough," he replied, trying to speak graciously and smother the selfishness that rose in his heart.

"You could go on alone from here, couldn't you?"

"Yes," Alice answered, doubtfully. "I'm not ticularly fond of that turkey cock."

"Neither you are, pussy," he said, smiling.

taken a wider range than he had expected.

The sun was high in the heavens, and had it not been for his lunch he would have felt that it must be nearly time for dinner.

On one side was a long tract of open country, with some heavy log-fences that would have furnished capital covert for the hares, and on the other a deep, unbroken forest.

"Woods are nasty a hot day like this," he muttered; "plenty of mosquitoes and flies, then that underbrush to fight against; but I guess I'll try it."

He tightened his belt, gave his face an extra polish, and swung himself over the fence.

Something made him pause just then, it was a long sound like a far-away whisper borne down by the wind. He listened again, holding his breath to catch the tone. It might be the sigh of the wind through a swaying tree or a cry for help.

Once more it reached him, and he started off in the direction from whence it came, battling his way through the thick branches. It was a belt of cedar, and the bare under-boughs switched about his face and neck.

He paused once more to listen for the halloo when he reached the heart of the forest, where there were old paths that looked as though they had been trodden centuries ago, when the giant trees were but saplings.

Then it came again, still far away, but perfectly distinct, a cry for "Help! help!"

Just then Charlie caught sight of a bit of paper, another, and then another, he had no difficulty now in following the trail, and went on faster, his heart beating uncomfortably, for it was evident the cries must come from the hares. What could have happened to them?

The scent took a roundabout path, and there were fresh marks of hoofs on the leafy brown earth.

Then the halloo rang out above his head, so close as to startle him, and looking up among the thick maple branches, he saw a white face peering down anxiously.

"Halloo! Who's there?"

"Charlie, I say, Charlie, is that you?"

"Yes, what's the matter? What are you doing there?"

"Rolf's hurt," Tom answered softly; "don't speak loud, for that brute must be somewhere near. Come up, and I'll tell you."

"Why don't you come down?" Charlie asked impatiently.

"I can't. Come up," Tom said impatiently.

So Charlie shinned up the smooth bole after several ineffectual attempts, and gained the lower branches, where Tom sat, holding Rolf's head on his knee.

"He's bleeding dreadfully," he explained, "and we must have help at once. That beast of a bull chased us, so we managed to get up here, and would have been all right, only Rolf fell as we were getting up to the top to call for help. It was lucky the lower branches were so thick and caught him, for he would have gone down on the bull's horns."

"Not old Barry's bull?" Charlie asked, growing white. "Why the men are afraid of him."

"Yes, I know. I say, Charlie, what shall we do? One of us ought to go for help, or shall we try to carry him?"

"We couldn't," Charlie said, after considering for a moment. "Think of those thick bushes; let me see him."

Tom lifted the coat, and showed a spot of deep red staining the shirt-sleeve, and oozing down the side.

"His arm ought to be tied up, shouldn't it?"

"I did try to, but we might do it tighter between us. Shall you go, or will I?"

"I will," Charlie replied promptly.

"Well, old Barry's is over there, I know, but if you should meet that bull; he used me up dodging round trees."

"Poor old chap," the boy said as tenderly as if he had been speaking to his mother or Alice. "Never mind me, I'll be all right and back in no time."

He dropped down the tree, and set off at a quick run in the direction Tom had indicated, which brought him in a short time to the outskirts of the forest.

Here there was a stretch of pasture, where a herd of cattle were grazing, and no doubt the boy's enemy among them, so it would not be safe to cross the open, and he had to make his way through the bushes. An unwary step on the dry sticks caused the cattle near at hand to lift their heads when he was obliged to pause and wait till they went on grazing.

It was slow progress, terribly slow progress as he thought of Rolf lying white and senseless with the life-blood oozing from him, and his aunt's face seemed to rise before him. "Why did you think of your own safety when my bright, merry boy was dying?"

He felt like the veriest coward and inclined to dash across the fields, but this would have ruined all their hopes, so he was obliged to go on slowly with that sickening fear at his heart whose only relief seemed the agonized cry for help that rose up above the forest to the sky.

Never before had Charlie felt so utterly helpless, nor such comfort from the thought of One who was Almighty.

After a time he could go on more rapidly, and half an hour of breathless running brought him to the old farm-house where there were men at work.

His story was quickly told, and seizing a pitch-fork the farmer bade his man follow them, taking the shortest cuts and reaching the place in a very short time.

"He's just the same, not bleeding so much though," Tom reported.

And then the boy was lowered carefully from the tree and carried with gentle hands by the sun-browned men.

"Come from Mr. Doran's, do you? That's a good bit round, we'll go to my place and I'll send you round in the wagon. A little English lad, you said? Poor little fellow! he's in a bad way."

To the boys it seemed hours before the journey was accomplished, though the old farm horse was whipped into his swiftest trot, but the nice birthday dinner had grown cold, and the mothers anxious before they appeared.

The jolting ride had partly restored Rolf to consciousness, so that he looked a little less limp when he was carried in and smiled reassuringly at his mother's anxiety.

"Only a sprained arm, and a pretty bad cut from the fall," the doctor said when he was called. "It might have been worse."

"Yes, it might have been much worse," they all echoed with thankful hearts, thinking of the danger the boys had escaped.

So the day ended more pleasantly than could have been anticipated a few hours before. Rolf was propped upon the sofa, looking very white but quite cheerful, and the others were ready to do full justice to that long-delayed dinner.

"I agree with Alice, I don't care much about here and bounds."

"Oh! I say, that isn't fair, the first part of the day was jolly, wasn't it, Rolf?"

"Prime," Rolf assented weakly.

"And the last part isn't bad," Charlie added, helping himself to a chicken-bone.

"I was a donkey to take the girls over that rough ground; I'm glad you knew better, Charlie," which was a good deal from Hugh, "and I'm precious glad I came home with Alice."

"So are we," echoed the mothers.

"It will be cool this evening, so we'll have pop corn, roast apples—and stories," concluded those indefatigable boys.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1885.

It is pleasant to record here that the closing of the fiscal year of the Domestic Committee shows that the contributions are almost exactly the same as those of the year standing second in the scale of contributions, and that five hundred more parishes contributed this year than during the preceding year.

COPIES of the proposed Excise Bill for the State of New York will be sent to all the ministers, editors, etc., in this State, in the hope that the bill on being presented to the Legislature at Albany, may become a law. The bill has been drawn with the greatest possible care by committees appointed by the Church Temperance Society and the Society for the Prevention of Crime. It has had the advantage of the best legal talent, as, also, of such revision and re-revision as mature thought seemed to call for. If it is not the best excise bill that has ever been drawn, it is not that other measures have not been largely consulted and drawn upon by way of suggestion, in addition to the original conceptions and improvements by the committees having the work in hand. For licenses of the first class in cities of more than 300,000 inhabitants the fee is not to be less than $1,000. In all other cities, towns and villages, the fee is to be not less than $500. There are also licenses of the second class, and down to the sixth, the fees ranging from $500 to $10. The undoubted success of high license in several of the other States would seem to make the passage of the proposed bill in this State a matter of great expediency. In a State embracing such large and so many cities, no other form of restraining the liquor traffic is to be hoped for. That the measure will meet with strenuous opposition goes without saying. On the other hand, the very grounds on which the bill will be opposed may make its passage the more desirable.

"THE RELIGIOUS LIFE."

A position that could not be maintained by open advocacy has time and again found favor by an assumption, and all the more readily if skilfully covered by a shrewd imposture in the use of words. A case in point is taking it for granted that preeminently the religious life is a celibate conventional life.

The time was when the famous religious orders did so largely attract the most devout and noble souls throughout Christendom, that by common consent the "Religious Life" came to mean the conventional life. But it is not the case now, and has not been for hundreds of years. It is a vain thing, then, to think that the mediaeval conception of the ideal life can be brought back by a use of mediaeval terms. Are the best, highest, noblest examples of Christian living to be found to-day in the celibate life of religious orders? Manifestly not. There is, then, no longer any propriety in calling the conventional life the religious life. To do so is now an anachronism. It is an assumption notoriously in conflict with the facts of the present Christian civilization. It is, too, one which cannot but be, now as in the past, in every way hurtful. If not a reflection upon the Christian character, it is at least upon the Christian ideal of the great body of the faithful, who, in the common vocations of life, are trying to serve God in that state unto which it has pleased Him to call them. It is to assume that such lives, however useful, are inferior in purpose and attainment, and, in fact, are not worthy to be compared to those of a higher ideal, namely, the celibate, the conventional. Such life—that is the inference—is so much higher in aim and end that it is to be termed the religious life. This is an assumption without any foundation in fact. It is one, too, that must now, as in the past, have a very unhappy effect upon the minds of those who belong to celibate orders or associations, because it is one which, however unconsciously to them, must minister to spiritual pride; and that, as all Church history is witness, has been a most unlovely characteristic of the so-called religious orders.

It is to be expected. Human nature being the same now as in the past, it is as likely to be a characteristic of community life to-day as heretofore. That such spiritual pride is a danger of modern brotherhoods and sisterhoods, will, we think, be the testimony of not a few who not only have no prejudice against them but gladly recognize their value and even necessity to the work of the Church. It is far from our purpose to foster an unreasonable prejudice against such orders, but we do think that the old assumption that pre-eminently the religious life is the conventional life is not only untrue but one in every way hurtful. Let men say all that is to be said in favor of brotherhoods and sisterhoods, but let that morbid mediaeval notion never obtain again that the ideal Christian life must be sought in the community life of celibates. The religious life is not one of orders or associations. It is the life lived unto God, in that state—whatever it may be—unto which it has pleased Him to call His child.

ACTIVELY AT WORK.

May it not be fairly said that denominational Protestantism has largely come to believe in a far-off Saviour, a Lord who has been here and may be again some day, and yet a Lord who, having once taught and wrought, has gone away, not intending to have over-much to do with men until He shall come again? This is indeed His world, and yet has He not largely left it to its sins and sorrows? Has not, we say, some such undefined, unexpressed belief settled down over denominational Protestantism? And is it not a hopeful sign that Churchmen are coming more and more in this day to apprehend the present working of the Lord, the risen living Saviour, performed by the Holy Spirit in and through the Church which is Christ's Body? The earnest soul, the honest inquirer, may then now as of old come, saying, "Art Thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" And the answer now as then must be, "Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: The blind receive their sight and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them."

If, as Churchmen hold, the Lord's life is perpetuated in His Church, must it not be characterized by unmistakable signs of His power? The works which He did of old shall not His followers do, and, as He said, greater works, because of the aid of the Holy Spirit? What evidence can the Church bring as witness to her Divine mission and message? Shall it not be the very proof that her Lord Himself gave: "The works that I do they bear witness of Me." Amid the manifold trials and difficulties with which she has to contend, the Church Militant can still make this answer. The works of the Lord in His Church are the seals of her mission, witness to the fact that God is in the midst of her.

Few are aware of the manifold instrumentalities which the Church is now making use of in her efforts to minister to the bodies and the souls of men. There is a vague though inadequate appreciation of the fact that in large cities, such as New York and Philadelphia, Churchmen have done and are doing very much to which they can point with thankfulness, but the widely extended field of the charitable work is not appreciated by even well-informed Churchmen. Still the diocesan journals show that the charitable work of the Church is not confined to large centres of wealth and population. Thus, for instance, in the appendix to the recently-issued Journal of the Diocese of Central New York may be found interesting reports of St. Luke's Home and Hospital, Utica; of the House of the Good Shepherd, Binghamton; of the House of the Good Shepherd, Utica; of the House and Hospital of the Good Shepherd, Syracuse; of the Shelter for Homeless Girls and Women, Syracuse; of the House of the Good Samaritan, Watertown, and of the Hospital of the Good Shepherd, Binghamton.

What a goodly list of noble charities, and this, be it remembered, in a new diocese, largely made up of small country parishes.

A ROMAN MARTYR.*

Not a Sebastian, not a Rienzi nor a Cairol, this Roman martyr of whom I have to tell, and yet he endured a longer, and, as it seems to me, a far harder trial of faith than any of these. His body lies in a newly-made grave in the crowded commonplace cemetery of S. Lorenzo, where strangers in Rome bought a modest place that his bones might lie in piece beyond the ten years which is the time of rest in the grave allotted to the poorer Romans. On a simple slab set in the wall above his grave is the following inscription, which was written, I may say, by a prelate of high rank in the Roman hierarchy, one who had known him well from his early manhood:

"To the dear and venerated memory of Paolo Panzani, late Brother Andrea d'Altagene, of the Capuchins; a priest without spot, strong and unconquerable, hungering after righteousness and truth; he lived only for God and for his country, persecuted by man, well pleasing to God; strengthened by the Holy Sacraments, called for with ardent longing, amidst the pitying comforting of friends in this City of Rome, where he suffered such great things, in the 65th year of his age; he breathed out his great and generous soul on the 28th of November, in the year of his Lord 1884."

He came to Rome in 1820, from Corsica. His parents were small proprietors in the village of Altagene—poor as all their neighbors were, but independent, patriotic, and intensely religious. Two of the sons devoted themselves to the monastic life. Paolo was twenty years old when his feet carried him within the gates of Rome, a devout pilgrim full of faith and enthusiasm. He entered as a monk in the Capuchin convent in the Piazza Barberini, under the name of Fra Andrea d'Altagene, and looked forward, doubtless, to having his turn in due time in the holy earth from Jerusalem which fills the convent crypts, and finally to decorating its ghastly walls with his dry bones. He gave himself to study with hungry eagerness, and reading with unremitting diligence soon acquired an immense mass of un-systematic learning. He was ordained to the priesthood as soon as he was of legal age.

But his learning, he thought, ought to be used; was not something for his own intellectual gratification simply, but was to be brought to bear on the life about him. And his duty was the clearer in the case, because few of his brethren had or cared to have any learning at all. Before he studied from books, too, he had learned in his Corsican boyhood to observe closely the men and things about him. So as he drew breath from the first eager rush forward in the fields of written knowledge, and began to take in more of the life about him in Rome, he was startled and dismayed by what he saw of the state of his Church. Instead of the "city of God" that he had read and dreamed of, instead of the Bride of Christ, without spot or blemish, nursing the souls of men, he saw a great ecclesiastical despotism, in which all the great spiritual interests of mankind were held wholly secondary to the material interests of the wretched temporal sovereignty of the popes, and were freely bartered for place or gain; and in which the clergy, from the highest to the lowest, were almost universally abandoned to dissolute living. The distress and pain of this awakening was terrible. His whole soul was shaken with tremendous doubts. It could not be otherwise to one of his intensely truthfulness and simple honesty. He pressed, however, came off conqueror in this inward trial of faith; and strengthened thereby with might in the inner man was made ready to meet the singularly hard outward trial of faith that was before him, and which ended only with his life in the flesh.

He set himself then to observe carefully the situation, and study the causes that had led to the grievous corruption and abuses which afflicted the Church; if so be by God's grace they might be withstood and corrected. The temporal power he felt to be an evil, as well as the whole system of ecclesiastical imperialism which had grown up about the Vatican. But the thing to be reached was that which had made such corruptions possible; and this root evil he found in the law of clerical celibacy and the vows of perpetual chastity required by the Roman discipline.

He wrote out a lengthy and exhaustive argument on this subject, and without giving his name, sent it to the pope (Pius IX.), begging him to submit it to the examination of the Catholic episcopate, that they might by their united wisdom find some remedy which would serve for the purification of the Church and the pacification of the world; for this poor monk had seen with alarm the growing estrangement between the Church and society, and foreseen with prophetic insight the evils that would follow to religion if the Church, refusing to reform herself, should provoke the civil power to open antagonism and trying to reform the more intolerable abuses by the clumsy and violent hand of the civil law. This was in 1854, when the bishops of the Roman obedience had been summoned to Rome to carry out the pope's will in the matter of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The only result of this letter was to alarm the pope, always jealous of the episcopal claims to the teaching power. It even led him to forbid at the episcopal gathering any discussion of the needs of the Church, and to shorten it as much as possible. Twice again in the following year Panzani urged the pope, with new letters and arguments, to give his attention to this matter; but the latter thought that he had found a remedy for all possible evils by hribing the Blessed Virgin to his side by the personal flattery of his solemn decees in her honor, and that with her aid he was far more than a match for modern society.

But Panzani's conscience would not let him rest. The bishops after all were the teaching body of the Church; and if he could not reach them through their recognized head, he would reach them through other channels. So he betook himself to those who were foremost for learning and character among the doctors of his Church, that their influence and reputation might gain a hearing for the truth and open a way for the entering of reform—to men like Perrone, Patrizi and Passaglia. They heard him, admitted the sad truth in regard to the evil state of the Church, agreed with his general views, but told him to be silent. He could do nothing. The mountains were too great for him to move by any efforts or any suffering. But this man could not be silent. He felt himself responsible for the light he had received, and that no woe could be so great to him as failing to shine it forth to men. "I have never known," said to me this winter a Roman Catholic archbishop, "a soul so passionately in love with truth and righteousness. It consumed him, and made him, who ordinarily was one of the gentlest and most submissive of men, terrible and at times even violent in his denunciation of wrong." So he would not yield to the advice of these who intended to be his friends. He worked his way to Paris, and managed to get a copy of his book into the hands of Napoleon III. He visited Turin and himself placed a copy in the hands of Cavour. He hoped through them to get a hearing from the French and Italian bishops. This poor Capuchin brother began to be alarming with his intense beliefs and his awkward readiness to do and dare everything for them. Manifestly the dungeons of the Inquisition were the safest place for him. Still he had done nothing worthy of bonds. He was quite within his right in writing of the evils that afflicted the Church and threatened her with greater losses, and in appealing to the recognized heads of the Church to find and apply a remedy. Nay, all that he had done was only that which every good son of the Church was bound theoretically to do.

Finally in 1859, all other means having been tried in vain, he determined to print his writings, in the shape of a cry to the Catholic episcopate, and send them to the several bishops. The false friend to whom he intrusted their printing turned informer and carried them to Cardinal Antonelli. Fra Andrea was forthwith seized in his cell at midnight and thrown into the dungeons of the Inquisition. The frightened monks were powerless to help him, but stood by watching the police ransack his cell with closest search and carry off every scrap of writing. The Father General of the order appeared on the scene, and protested warmly against the violation of his convent, but to no purpose. He however insisted on a minute inventory being taken of the papers and other things that were carried off, which was thereupon made and witnessed by several of the monks.

For six months Panzani was kept in the prison of S. Michele, badgered through a long and a secret trial by the Inquisition. But no charge of heresy could be made out from his writings. He was found, after the closest examination, "perfect (integerrimo) as regards the faith." Neither had he been guilty of any act of schism. His life had been without reproach, and his obedience in his order without fault. He was highly esteemed and much loved by his Capuchin brethren. The judges, as well as they might, hesitated to condemn him, and the president carried the case to the pope, proposing to recommend his release. But the latter, with his ambition already reaching forward to the definition of the papal infallibility, felt this monk to be a very dangerous man. The appeal to the Catholic episcopate was, to his thinking, in itself the most damnable of trésies. There was also a chapter in the unpublished book which touched the self-stilting pope to the quick. It is entitled "How the pope would be more glorious covered with a sack, in the heart of the Catacombs, than clad in brocade and shining with gold, in the midst of soldiers." Pius IX. cut short the very beginning of the recommendation for elemency—or justice rather—saying, "You know what I think in the case. Do your duty." He added that he prayed daily for Fra Andrea's conversion. So by the pope's arbitrary order, this perfectly guiltless man was sentenced to twelve years of forced labor, and to perpetual suspension from his priestly ministry. Guarded by mounted gendarmes, he was marched off on foot as a common malefactor to the galleys at Corneto, where for more than two years he suffered a merciless imprisonment.

Among the papers seized in his cell when he was arrested was a sealed packet addressed to the French emperor. His brother monks conveyed information of this to the French ambassador, who was all powerful at a court whose only real support at that time was the bayonets of French soldiers. The ambassador demanded this packet for his emperor. The pope denied its existence. But the monks were able to satisfy the ambassador that at least it had existed. The result of this was that after long and unsatisfactory negotiations the French ambassador at last peremptorily demanded the release of the prisoner Padre Andrea d'Altagene as a French subject. Under these circumstances this was promptly effected. The pope himself went to the Capuchin convent, and gave to the Father General the order for his release. But, indeed, it was to pass from one kind of imprisonment to another. He was sent under special surveillance to a convent near Viterbo, where he had no friends, and was looked on as a disgraced and degraded monk; for the part of his sentence that deprived him of his priestly faculties had not been remitted. Here an object of prejudice and suspicion to the bigoted brethren, and unable under pain of again falling into the hands of the Inquisition to say a single word in his own defense or justification, the situation became so intolerable that after five months of suffering he fled with the connivance of the abbot, who was afraid that his life would be practiced against, out of the papal dominions to Leghorn, where under the Italian government the Inquisition was powerless to follow him with material persecutions. This act was the first breach in any way on his part of the discipline of his Church.

He joined himself to a convent of his own order at Leghorn, and took upon him the lowest menial duties of a lay brother. The papal enmity, however, followed him here, and he was called on to retract what he had written. Refusing, his superior was forced to put him under the ban. He betook himself then to his native Corsica, and joined himself to an extremely poor convent as a lay servant, and in this capacity he was allowed a short period of rest. Sadly needed it must have been, for his mind had been strained almost to breaking, not so much by the wrongs put upon him personally, but because through all these trials he had been forced to see Christ, as it were, deuded and sold and bound in the person of his truth, and found himself utterly powerless to help his Lord and Master.

Presently came upon him here a new trial of faith that few could have resisted. The pope, moved by what compunction I know not, sent the message that he should return to his convent in Rome, and that he should be fully rehabilitated in his priesthood, a ministry dear to him as life itself. His friends in the order urged him to accept this truce. No retraction was asked of him now; only outward submission and silence. He answered that the evils against which he had cried aloud had not ceased in the Church and that only when they were remedied could he be silent. Upon this his poor Corsican brethren, who to this day hold his name in unfeigned respect, were forced to drive him from their company. He went to Turin, and now for the first time giving up his conventual habit, which had not been stripped from him even in his imprisonment, he supported himself working with his own hands as a gardener. But he ceased to work for the Church as little as St. Paul did when reduced to a like necessity. He sent a general letter to the Catholic episcopate urging them to raise the standard of reform, and claiming that his book should be recovered from the Inquisition and given to the light, or rather to the knowledge of the bishops. No result, of course, came from this; and so, with infinite pains and patience, he rewrote from memory—for all his notes had been sequestered—the work which the Inquisition had suppressed, and added to it many like words; and with what he could save from his scanty wages, and some help from his brothers, he published this, with some introductory documents, under the title of "The Public Confession of a Prisoner of the Roman Inquisition, and The Origin of the Evils of the Catholic Church." 660 pp. Turin, 1855. The work was diffuse, going over much ground that had already been worked, and was somewhat rugged in thought, and uncouth in style; but it is the work of a profound and powerful thinker, and there are parts of it that are as fine gold tried in the furnace. It took no hold of the popular mind in Italy. The writer saw his work fall on barren ground. The Italian people, excited to the last degree with political hopes and ambitions, were quite indifferent to religious issues. They were utterly sick of everything ecclesiastical; wanted to hear nothing about such things, to have nothing to do with them.

But Panzani's courage was equal still to this reverse. He had done his duty, had given to the world the truth that he had in charge. He could wait now with patience for the precious fruit, even until the latter rain. So he went on with his work in gardening in Turin, hoping even against hope, until at last the freeing of Rome in 1870 opened the way for his return thither with safety to his life and conscience, and gave him the occasion for renewed efforts for the reform of the Church. The Vatican Council had turned men's thoughts for the moment toward ecclesiastical matters, and the Old Catholic movement seemed to herald the dawn of a reawakening of conscience in the Church. He came into relations of correspondence with various leaders of this movement, and of particular friendship with M. Loyson, who was that winter in Rome; but this movement, too, disappointed his hopes. Instead of turning the Vatican toward reform, it rather drove it to the extreme of more defiant self-assertion.

I first met Panzani in 1871. He came to me introduced by a Capuchin friend, who told me "This man is of the very salt of the earth." He was eager to see a newspaper or review started in Rome which should advocate the cause of reform within the Church. He never asked any help for himself. He never, indeed, thought of himself. His mind was wholly taken up with the needs of the Church and of the times. He saw the former driving madly on to certain final wreck, and the country looking indifferently on, and no one would heed his desperate signals of danger. He had found work in an iron-dealer's shop at six dollars the month, and later, when this work became too heavy for him, in a small fancy store in the Corso at eight dollars a month. On this meagre pay he lived for the twelve years following his return to Rome, but he never spent it all on himself. Out of it he always put apart something wherewith to publish pamphlets that might help the times, and all his spare hours went to study and writing. He produced during these years a great store of manuscripts, with painful diligence, for he was not a ready writer. Whatever he did in this way cost him hard and real work. One unusually cold winter, seeing that he was insufficiently clad, I got him twenty-five dollars, and told him to get himself some warm clothing. Ten days later he brought me the first copies of a new pamphlet. Twenty dollars of that given him had gone toward printing this pamphlet, and five had been used for clothing. Later, when I wanted to help him in the same way, I took the precaution to make him order the clothing, promising to pay for it when I saw him in it. He came presently in a new suit and overcoat, showing almost a child's pleasure in the unaccustomed physical comfort it gave him, but not quite easy in his conscience about his right to such luxury at a time when there was so much that the world ought to hear waiting to be printed. For twelve years I have known this man endure hardness thus in Rome, depriving himself of sufficient food and clothing, in order to lay by his pennies to publish writings that contained truth which he thought it was his duty to bring to light. What wonder that men who had never cared or suffered for truth could not understand him, and began to think him insane! In all this time I never knew him to lose faith or courage. He looked inexpressibly weary at times, but when spoken to by a friend his worn face would lighten up with a smile so beautiful that it revealed a soul kept in perfect peace. He was a very simple-minded man, notwithstanding his powerful intellect, possessed of that long-suffering—I had almost said dumb—patience, which we see often in the peasantry and in domestic animals. He could never understand why other men did not see and care for the truth as he did. He saw that they did not. He knew that some men had no power to see truth; but it was wholly inflexible to him. This he knew, however, whatever others could or would not see, his duty was clear; and though many were blind or false, still God could bring light out of darkness and order out of confusion, and would somehow in the end shape all things far better than he, Fra Andrea, could. So the years went hardly by, seen as through a glass very darkly; but still with him abided faith—yes, and I think, too, hope of a certain kind, and always charity, the never failing.

Two years or so ago, seeing that he was failing in health under his hard life, I undertook to provide for him a small support as priest-sacristan in charge of the rooms of St. Paul's Italian Catholic Mission started a short time before, under the Count di Campello. Partly to insure his taking proper food, partly from some mistrust of what his later writings might be, I made it a condition that during his service in this capacity he should publish nothing whatever without my express consent. He accepted the condition with a sort of patient wonderment, and kept it faithfully; but he went on writing all the same, working about nineteen hours a day, and, as I found out afterward, putting always aside from his small pay something to send to the poor children of his brothers in Corsica, to repay, in some measure, the money which the latter had put with him into the unsuccessful venture of his first book, published in Turin in 1865. So, in spite of my precautions, he deprived himself of the food which his advancing years required.

On returning to Rome, in October last, I was startled to notice a great change for the worse in his health. It failed rapidly, so that in a few weeks he was unable to take his place in the choir. The able and estimable physician of the German Embassy, Dr. Erhardt, kindly undertook his case as a labor of love, and did all for him that medical skill could do. It proved, however, that he was suffering from an internal cancer, brought on by long use of very coarse and insufficient food, and that his days were numbered. The ever-charitable heads of the American Legation in Rome supplied him with the best that their kitchens and cellars afforded. Two nurses from St. Paul's House for Trained Nurses volunteered their efficient help, and this poor man found himself, at his end, surrounded with a care and with comforts such as he had never by any chance known in all his long life of hardness. He appreciated this keenly, when he thought of others and their goodness; but when he thought of himself—his unworthiness—it disquieted him. As he simply expressed it to me, it seemed to him "in some way not right that he should find such unlooked-for kindness, and be so well cared for in his last hours, when his Lord had been denied and deserted and cruelly tortured as He entered the valley of the Shadow of Death."

I have been called on to see many men die, in circumstances the most varied, but never to whom death came more as a victory. His only care was for the writings—a great mass—that he should leave behind him. In some way he conceived the idea that his death would bring all these before the world; that by his death attention would be challenged to the truths which he had tried in vain to set clearly before men all through his life, and that so at last they would all be published, and accomplish their work. "We must die," he said to me one night, "to conquer, as the Lord did;" and so up to the very last he worked over his writings, arranging them and giving such directions for their disposition as he thought would make them most serviceable in the cause of reform.*

I found him one evening apparently at the last gasp. The physician warned me that he would not pass the night in the flesh. He felt himself to be at the very threshold of death, and was troubled lest he should cross it before he received the sacrament, there having been some little delay in bringing the priest who was to give it to him. When this was assured, I left him about eight o'clock. Toward midnight I called in again, supposing it would be to consult in regard to his funeral. But as I came near his bed, he opened his eyes wide, and said with a firm voice, "The sacrament has raised me up." And so it was. Some change had been suddenly wrought which gave him a great accession of strength and nearly two weeks more of life.

Both at this time and just before his death, the last ministrations of the Church were given him by Monsignore Savarne. An archbishop in full standing in the Roman communion supplied the consecrated oil for extreme unction; another sent him his solemn benediction in extremis. This archbishop told me of this himself, saying that Panzani had wished it, but adding, "Panzani had no need of my benediction; I needed his far more." Both of these prelates would have given much to stand by his dying bed, but were afraid of compromising themselves with their Church by doing so. And both of them recognized in this poor monk—for had they been as true to their convictions of truth as he was to his, they, too, had both long since been outcasts from the papal synagogue—their spiritual superior. And as his long struggle to die went on, all about him were forced to recognize the spiritual greatness of this poor man. He was rugged in appearance and in speech. He had always been poor. A large part of his life had been spent in hard manual, often menial, labor. Not only the world had not known him, but even those about him in the mission chapel in which he filled the comparatively humble position of priest-sacristan, but not known what was in him. Now it was as if their eyes had been suddenly opened to see the greatness of him who had been walking among them in such humble guise.

His end was not like an approaching death. It was as of one under orders to report for special duty at headquarters. A friend said to him, as he spoke with dying inspiration of the glory of the truth, "Well, you will see the Christ to-night or in the morning. You will tell Him that even in Rome there are still some who love His word as He spoke it, and would, if need be, die for it, even as so many of his first followers did here." And he accepted the words, with a glad light in his eyes, simply, as a message which he had no doubt that he should presently deliver. He seemed to be moving in a world of the sublimest truths inspired by the Holy Scriptures, and the writings of the Fathers, whose best words were constantly in his mouth, not as empty forms of speech, but applied with living reality to the circumstances through which he was passing. And at last he departed, recognized by all who had looked on these things as one that must needs be very great in the kingdom of God. Certainly I have met no man, bishop, priest, or layman, in any nation, of any Church, who, as far as human eye could teach, has better endured hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, never entangling himself with the affairs of this life, careful only and always to please Him who had chosen him to be a soldier.

By one of those providences which we call strange coincidences, over his dying bed, in the long school-room, to which I had had him carried one night to have the benefit of a better ventilation than was possible in his own small room, was the illuminated text in Italian, "Fight the good fight of faith." The disciple to whom these words were first addressed finished his course, it is claimed, in Rome; at least, his ashes are preserved there now as the object of a superstitious worship that he himself would have utterly repudiated; but I do not believe that Timothy himself fought his fight better, kept the faith more firmly, was in any way more truly a martyr for Him who said "I am the Truth," than Paolo Panzani.

He was buried, as I said above, in the cemetery of S. Lorenzo. Within the church itself are deposited the remains of the valiant pontiff who had hunted him down with unjust persecution. Of the two men—the persecutor and the persecuted—the latter has, as so often happens, unquestionably come off the conqueror. The temporal power of the papacy, one of the great evils which Fra Andrea attacked, and which to Pius IX. was dearer than life itself, came to its just end fourteen years before, and is remembered now but as a hideous nightmare of past darkness. The body of Pius IX. reached its last resting-place in headlong flight before an angry rabble, who heaped mud and curses upon it in its midnight course through the city where he had played the tyrant for over a quarter of a century; a rabble led by men who had suffered cruel wrong—bondage, imprisonment, banishment, the loss of all but their lives—at his hands. Fra Andrea, the prisoner of the Inquisition, was buried openly, with everyrite befitting his Christian and priestly character, and the benediction over his grave was given—without a hand raised to resist their right to do so—by Catholic priests who have dared to take their stand in Rome in brave and open protest for the faith once delivered unto the saints.

It is true the "Society for the Promotion of Catholic Interests," which represents everything that is most papal in Rome, has already set itself to prepare the apotheosis of Pius IX. The plain sarcophagus, in which after the loss of the temporal power he directed his body to be placed, is to be enshrined in a special chapel of rarest marbles, enriched with a great wealth of mosaic. And besides this material glorification, it is understood that his early canonization has been fully determined upon. Rumors of miracles worked at his tomb are already in the air. The "Pray for him," now written in it, will be changed presently, by the authority of the Church which he did so much to corrupt, to "Pray to him." But what might, suppose you, will the decree of the Vatican recognizing him as a saint have when the "witness" Fra Andrea d'Altagna is called before the throne of God?

RITUAL CASE REVERSED.—A case in which the ordinary proceedings in ritual cases have been completely reversed, has been decided in the Diocese of Gloucester and Bristol, and this time it is the evangelical rector who is made to feel the smart. In the Parish of Tisbury, the vicar, appointed in 1881, removed in February last, just after the death of one of the vicars, a cross, which stood over the altar, and candlesticks and flower vases from the altar itself. When the removal of the ornaments became known, a memorial was sent, signed by about one hundred and eighty persons, to the bishop (Dr. Elliott), protesting against it, and the bishop wrote to the vicar pointing out that the removal of the ornaments without a faculty was illegal, and advising him to apply for a confirmatory faculty, evidently highly approving of the vicar's action. The application was made, but a consent was entered by a member of the parish, who is magistrate and land owner, and the matter went before the chancellor of the diocese for decision, whether the faculty applied for should be granted. The case resolved itself into the legality of the removal of the cross and candlesticks, and whether the structure on which the cross stood was attached to the altar. After hearing evidence on both sides the chancellor gave judgment not only that the faculty should not issue to the vicar confirming what he had done, but that a faculty should issue to him to replace both cross and candlesticks within a fortnight, failing the performance of which, the same faculty should issue to the protesting parishioners. The chancellor, while expressing his sorrow for the vicar, decided that he must pay all the cost incurred.

THE BISHOPRIC OF SALISBURY.—The rumor is mentioned in some of the English papers that the Bishopric of Salisbury, before being offered to the Rev. John Wordsworth, was offered to Canon Liddon, and that he asked for time to consider before giving his final answer, and finally declined it. Prior to the appointment of Mr. Wordsworth, the clergy and others in the diocese were complaining of the long vacancy.

THE OLD CHURCHES OF YORK.—The Archbishop of York has written to the Daily Telegraph, stating that, as far as he knows, "there is no intention whatever on the part of any one to destroy several of the old churches of York." He also says that three schemes for the consolidation of York benefices have been put forward by himself, and in none of them is any favor asked or taken to remove any church.

IRELAND.

DIOCESAN SYNODS.—The diocesan synods of the Dioceses of Ferns, Ardferd, and Killaloe, were held in their respective cathedral cities, on August 6 and 7. There was not much of general interest transacted at either of them. The Bishop of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin, in his address repudiated the implication that had been made by certain liberalists, protesting a speech of his in England, that he was an advocate of disestablishment; and stated that his argument was that the Diocese of Ferns had prospered, not because of disestablishment, but in spite of it, and that the prosperous condition was owing to the warm, generous, and self-denying efforts of the people who had, even beyond their means, "maintained the interests and finances of their robbed and plundered Church." A resolution protesting against the dismissal of a government inspector because of remarks made in the general synod "as an unwarrantable interference with freedom of debate, and a direct blow against liberty of speech," was carried by a large majority. In the synod of Killaloe the bishop in his address repudiated the idea that they should change the title of their Church at the bidding of any government. He hoped "no matter what others might chose to call them, they would always call themselves by that title."

MEMORIAL OF BISHOP BERKELEY.—A commission has been issued for the erection of a memorial of Bishop Berkeley in Cloyne Cathedral. The memorial will be a recumbent figure of the bishop. The work has been subscribed for both in England and Ireland.

DEATH OF CANON MCLWAIN.—The Rev. William McLwaine, D.D., Canon of St. Patrick's, and rector of St. George's, Belfast, died on Wednesday, August 12th. Canon McLwaine was ordained in 1833, and was one of the oldest clergy of the Irish Church. He was well known and highly respected in Ireland. He was an enthusiastic antiquarian, and possessed until within a year one of the most perfect collections of editions of the Holy Bible extant.

OLD CATHOLIC CLERGY.—The present number of the Old Catholic Clergy in the German Empire is officially stated to be fifty-three. There are six students for the priesthood under the Old Catholic faculty at Bonn University, three of whom are from Austria.

MAINE.

BAR HARBOR.—St. Saviour's Church.—The season at Mount Desert this year, far surpasses that of any other in its brilliance, its gaiety, and in the number of people present. Especially has it been unusually interesting as regards church matters. St. Saviour's Church, (the Rev. C. S. Leffingwell, rector) a little stone edifice, unplastered in the interior, and giving seating capacity for perhaps three hundred people, has been, on Sundays, the center of attraction to large congregations. Especially at the 11:00 A.M., service has the church been crowded. Since the second week in July, that service has found it literally so packed that every seat was taken, three rows of chairs up the aisle were entirely filled, the platform outside of the chancel was almost filled with chairs, the vestry-room was thronged, as were the porches, and many persons stood outside the windows to listen. This is generally the case, until, perhaps, the first or second Sunday in September, when a marked change is observed. The Rev. C. S. Leffingwell, rector for the past seven years of St. Saviour's, is obliged to hold five services a day to accommodate the number and wishes of the worshippers. Early Communion, at 7:30 A.M.; Morning Prayer, at 9:30 A.M.; full morning service, at 11:00 A.M.; Evening Prayer, at 5:00 P.M.; full evening service, at 8:00 P.M. In addition to these a Sunday School session is held at 3:00 P.M., and every other Sunday Mr. Leffingwell holds a service at Hull's Cove, distant about four miles. Of course, if there were no visiting clergy, the task would be too great for the rector. But as there are always many of these, the latter is very much relieved by their kind assistance, although he himself is always present at each and every service.

The offerings have been quite up to the average. The church is entirely dependant upon the liberality of summer guests; the rector's salary, the cost of fuel, lights, etc., all being paid from the offerings of the previous summer.

At no other resort are the responses, the singing, and the general interest in the services so hearty, so genuine, and so inspiring as at this little stone church. It seems to be a general pet and favorite of all visitors, and everybody is, and always has been, ready and eager to assist in every possible way.

The only drawback is its small size. However, a building fund has been started, and has now reached the sum of at least $5,000. The plan proposed to and accepted by the building committee, composed of Boston, New York and Philadelphia gentlemen, is such that the old church will furnish wings to a large addition that will be built toward the west, thus placing the chancel almost due eastward. It is hoped that work will be begun upon this addition in the coming fall. Owing to some slight misunderstanding, the work was unavoidably postponed from the spring.

The summer choir is composed of visitors to the island. The organ, a one-banked instrument, of the Hook & Hastings make, is the gift of Mr. Montgomery Sears of Boston.

St. Saviour's and St. Margaret's-by-the-Sea, Bishop Doane's delightful little chapel, at Northeast Harbor, are the only church edifices upon the island, and are both, especially the former, in the most flourishing condition.

NEW LONDON.—St. James's Church.—This parish has extended an invitation to the rectorship to the Rev. Alanson Douglas Miller. He has not yet signified his acceptance of the election.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK.—American Church Building Fund Commission.—At the last meeting of the Board of Trustees of this commission the following loans were voted to aid in the building of churches: Mission at Clifton, California, $300; mission at Waycross, Georgia, $250; St. John's church, Butte, Montana, for a rector, $3,000; mission at Perham, Minnesota, $500; mission at Norwood, Virginia, $800; mission at Sierra Madre, California, $500; Trinity parish, Scotland Neck, North Carolina, $1,000; North Branch Mission, Lapeer, Michigan, $300; St. James's church, Greenville, Mississippi, $1,000.

NEW YORK.—Grace Church, West Farms.—Ground was broken for a new church at this place in the latter part of July. It is to be a frame building of a very tasteful design, and will cost about $8,200. Mr. William A. Potter is the architect. It will be about eighty-five feet long and thirty-two feet wide, and when completed will seat two hundred and fifty people (250). The chancel will be twenty-three feet long and twelve feet wide, the windows of which will be given by Mr. John Simpson, Jr., in memoriam of his father, who was connected with this parish as vestryman for a long time. The parish is largely indebted to Mr. Simpson, not only for his gifts, but also for the earnest and kindly interest which he is taking in this work. Too much cannot be said of the hearty sympathy and help which the assistant bishop has extended to the parish, and also of Miss C. L. Wolfe, who has been remembered the parish by a munificent gift.

The corner-stone will be laid (D. V.) by the assistant-bishop on the afternoon of September 21st, (St. Matthew's Day).

It is very gratifying to note the interest which the people have taken in the new church, the more so because of the discouragements which they have had in the past; and it is earnestly hoped that this interest is indicative of more earnest and loving work in the future. The lots upon which the new church is being built are paid for, and about $3,200 has been raised towards the building fund. But much has yet to be done, and we trust that God's blessing will rest upon the work.

NEW ROCHELLE—The Huguenot Society.—On Monday, August 24th, St. Bartholomew's Day, the Huguenot Society of America celebrated the anniversary of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in Trinity church, New Rochelle (the Rev. C. F. Canedy, rector). There were representatives of the society present from South Carolina, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and from various parts of New York, and the citizens of New Rochelle made ample arrangements to entertain them while there. Services were conducted by the rector, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. John Bolton, C. W. Bolton, W. S. Coffey, E. O. Flagg, and A. V. Wittmeyer. The rector made a brief address of welcome to the large company of those whose kindred founded the parish. The Rev. C. W. Bolton then delivered an address.

After the morning service a collation was served in the Presbyterian parlors, at which none but descendants of Huguenots waited on the guests. The guests were then conveyed to points of interest in the vicinity, including Davenport's Neck, where the Huguenots first landed. This is now called Bancroft's Point, and nearby a rough stone slab marks what is said to be the burial place of the first child that died in the Huguenot colony.

In the afternoon a meeting was held, at which the Hon. John Jay presided. A cable despatch was read from the newly-formed Huguenot Society of London, of which Sir Austin Layard is president. A suitable answer was returned. In the opening address the president said that in no part of the country could the descendants of the Huguenots more fitly recall the solemn memories of the day in connection with the wrongs and sufferings of their ancestors. He spoke of the refugees from La Rochelle, who brought with them the dauntless courage and spirit that marked the history of that city, and who gave its historic name to their new home in another continent. A brief account of the massacre of the Huguenots and their flight to this country, concluding with a detailed account of the causes and result of the movement against the Huguenots in France was given by Mr. Charles M. Du Puy. Addresses were made by the Hon. P. B. Olney and the Rev. C. S. Vedder, (of the French Protestant church in Charleston, S. C.) An address, prepared by the Rev. Dr. C. E. Lindsay, was omitted, on account of the extreme heat of the weather, and given to the society for publication.

Trinity church contains memorial windows of three of its early pastors. These were Daniel Boulet, Pierre Stoupe, and Michel Hardin, all of whom were buried where their church formerly stood. In the rear of the church an old grave-yard contains the remains of many of the early Huguenots. The church has some interesting relics shown to the visitors, among which were a heavy silver communion plate presented by Queen Anne, a heavy brass-bound Bible brought over from France in 1690, a communion-table given to "y^e old stone church" by a Mr. Guion in 1710, and a bell manufactured in 1706. This bell Sir Henry Ashurst gave to the French church, Saint Du Esprit in this city, and this church gave it in turn to the church in New Rochelle.

LONG ISLAND

BROOKLYN—Christ Church.—This church (the Rev. Dr. L. W. Bancroft, rector.) has been closed for the summer, and meanwhile, has been greatly improved in appearance at the hands of painters, decorators, upholsterers, etc. The diaper work about the chancel is done in dead colors below and on the sides, and in gold color above. Still higher up above the large triple window, the wall has been oxidized to imitate oxidized metal. Order has been given for a costly and handsome stained-glass window to occupy the triple window spoken of, the rector having taken a trip abroad more especially for this purpose. The window, however, is yet to be made and may not be ready for some months to come. Hand-some double windows representing the vine with leaves and clusters, and ornamented with jeweled edges, have been placed above the sides of the chancel. Hitherto, these spaces, giving an outlook from the little rooms at the ends of the galleries down into the chancel and which are used for Bible classes, have been open. These newly added windows are a very great improvement. The panels back of the chancel have been relettered, but without changing the passages of Scripture. In the two panels on either side of these are figures of the rose and lily done in gilt.

The large panels in the roof, of which there are twenty-eight, were first covered with canvas and then done in peacock blue with medallions. The effect is exceedingly pleasing and satisfactory. The sides of the clerestory above the large pillars are done in diaper. The panels above the galleries are done in the same color as the roof, but ornamented with discs. The color of the walls back of the galleries is also on the sides of the church below is of a yellow tint. In the jambs of the fine lancet windows on either side are figures of the vine and of the pomegranate. The spaces between the lacets above is done with figures of the vine springing out of discs. The border of the wainscoting is a lily pattern with ground-work of peacock blue. The large columns are done in bronze mixed, giving a metallic effect.

The vestibule and ceiling are done in olive and orange, with sides of eider color. Above the entrance from the outer vestibule are the words, in raised letters, "Intrauitibus pax. Erenantibus Salus." The decorative work was done by E. J. N. Stent & Co., New York. The prevailing colors are soft and mild, while the general effect is bright and pleasing, and highly successful.

The church is also recarpeted with Brussels carpet of a reddish color and cushions to match. It will be opened for divine service on the first Sunday in September. The rector, who after returning from abroad has been spending some time at the White Mountains, will officiate.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Good Shepherd.—This church (the Rev. Dr. H. B. Cornwall, rector.) is undergoing extensive alterations and improvements. The roof is to be replaced with a patent tin covering, the exterior is to be repainted, and the interior is to be newly painted, frescoed, and decorated. The organ is to be removed to the west side of the chancel, choir stalls are in process of erection for a surplined choir, and a choir is in training. A pair of handsomely-burnished chandeliers has been presented to the church by the senior warden, Mr. Charles Robins. The church will be reopened on the third Sunday in September.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BUFFALO—St. Mary's Church.—This church (the Rev. C. F. J. Wrigley, rector.) has been undergoing extensive alterations, which are now completed. Within the last two years the attendance has doubled, and it has been found necessary to enlarge the church. The nave has been extended so as to accommodate one hundred more persons, and to make the seating capacity five hundred.

In the added space are seven new stained glass windows in memory of Mrs. Amelia Louisa Pickering, Perry G. and Mary M. Parker, Frank C. Judd, Mrs. Mary Wells Scheffer, Mrs. J. Townsend Hington, and the Sunday school. Every window is now a handsome memorial, and there are some twenty in all. This very artistic part of the work has been well executed by Mr. Gerlack. The handsome organ has been enlarged and improved by Mr. House, and the wall decoration, by the Messrs. Birge & Sons, is in beautiful harmony with the arched roof work and seating in finished pine. The building work was by Jacob Haselbeck. The total cost is estimated at about $2,600.

GENEVA—Trinity Church.—In this church, (the Rev. H. W. Nelson, rector.) on Sunday, August 23d, the Bishop of Iowa advanced to the priesthood the Rev. M. L. Kellner. There were present, besides the bishop and the rector of the parish, the Rev. Drs. W. D'Orville Doty, A. Schuyler, and C. F. Kellner, and the Rev. Messrs. Peyton Gallagher and J. W. Van Ingen. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. D'Orville Doty, who, in his address to the candidate, referred feelingly to Mr. Kellner's early years, youth, confirmation, and ordination to the diaconate within the walls of Trinity church, and charged him by the memories of these past years, by his love for the Church, that in all his searching after truth he should never lose sight of the Church's creed.

Mr. Kellner has been assistant at the Church of the Messiah, Boston. He will spend another year at Harvard University in special work in the Semitic languages, after which he will engage in ministerial work.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE—Church of the Epiphany.—At a meeting of the vestry of the Church of the Epiphany on Monday evening there were some interesting doings. The legacy of the late Thomas Vedder, of $500, was received from his executor, James Vedder. The proposition of Mrs. W. H. Wallace to sell the lot adjoining the church property for $750 was accepted, and a committee was appointed to look after the matter, receive the deed, and pay over the money. Mr. H. E. Woodford announced that the venerable Mrs. Griffin, who has already done much for the church, proposed to build a tower in front of the church, and place in it a bell, and also to have erected around the old and new church property a suitable fence. The bell will be a memorial one to the lamented Mrs. J. A. Roebling, who during her life-time was a regular and liberal contributor to the parish. The tower will be Mrs. Griffin's lasting memorial to the church, which she aided in founding, and to which she has been a regular attendant, when her health permitted, and always a liberal contributor.—Suspension Bridge Journal.

NEW JERSEY.

FAIR HAVEN—Chapel of the Holy Communion.—This chapel (the Rev. W. O. Embury, in charge), was formally opened for divine service, on Thursday, August 20th. There were present of the clergy, besides the first in charge, the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and the Rev. Messrs. R. H. Newton, W. H. Dannel, F. M. McAllister, M. Boyd and H. McKim. Morning Prayer having been said, the Holy Eucharist was celebrated, the Rev. Dr. Franklin being celebrant, and the sermon being preached by the Rev. R. H. Newton, from Rev. xxi., 22.

The chapel is in Queen Anne style, designed by Mr. C. E. Jaques, and very beautiful. The timbers of Georgia pine, are exposed, giving the effect of panel work to the shingled sides. The finishing of the ceiling is in black ash and red oak. The sides of the interior are colored, the last coat of plaster having been colored in the mortar bed. The seats are of oak.

The corner stone of the chapel was laid in November, 1884, by the Rev. Henry Mottet, rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York. The size of the chapel is 50x25, while that of the guild room is 14x30. From the latter a passage leads to the belfry, which is supplied with a bell weighing 1,300 pounds, the gift of Mrs. Edward Kemp, of Rumson. The Misses S. and H. Embury, Mrs. L. O. Chandler and sisters, and the Church of the Holy Communion, New York, presented each a double window in the body of the church. Of the handsome chancel windows, L. B. Batin presented a single window, the children of the Rev. E. Embury a triplet window over the altar, and two windows were presented by the Sunday school children.

In the centre of the church hangs a brass corona presented by Dr. John H. Hinton. The altar rail is from All Saints church, New York, and the brass uprights supporting it are the gift of the children of St. John's chapel, Little Silver, N. J. The altar and font were given by St. Chrysostom's chapel, New York. The Bible was from the Church of the Holy Communion, while the other chancel books were a memorial gift by Mr. Thomas Whitaker, New York. Mr. Embury is deserving of much credit for his earnest and successful efforts in raising the means with which this building has been erected.

The bishop of the diocese has appointed Tuesday, the 8th of September, for the consecration of the chapel.

TOM'S RIVER—Consecration of Christ Church.—This church (the Rev. H. C. Rush, rector), was consecrated on Tuesday, August 25th, by the bishop of the diocese. There were present besides the bishop and the rector, the Rev. Dns. O. M. Hills and H. H. Wells, and the Rev. Messrs. T. H. Cullen, E. K. Smith, J. D. Hills, G. H. Hills, W. N. Dannel, T. A. Spooner, H. McKim, J. T. Jowitz and H. S. Widmeyer. The instrument of donation was read and presented by the senior warden, Mr. Gifford, and the sentence of consecration read by the Rev. Dr. G. M. Hills. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Hills and the Rev. Mr. Cullen; the Rev. E. K. Smith reading the lessons. The bishop then proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the sermon being preached by the Rev. W. N. Dannel, who, thirty years ago held the first mission services in this place.

KEY EAST—CHAURV Services.—During the summer, services have been regularly held at this interesting seaside resort. The Rev. R. F. Innes, who has been spending the summer here, has erected a tent not far from the Avon Beach Hotel, where he holds service daily, at 9:30 A.M. and on Sunday there is an early celebration of the Holy Communion at 7:30 A.M., Morning Prayer and sermon at 11 A.M., and Evening Prayer at 4:30 P.M. This work is wholly gratuitous, and done by Mr. Innes to ensure that the summer visitors shall not be deprived of opportunities of worship.

Cape May Point—St. Peter's by the Sea.—On the morning of Sunday, August 23d, the Rev. W. H. Graff, rector of St. Jude's, Philadelphia, to whom, as much as any one else, this church owes its existence, officiated and preached. In the afternoon the service and sermon were by the Rev. George M. Bond of Newark Delaware.

PENNSYLVANIA.

CHURCH GROWTH IN THE DIOCESE.—In the minds of many the thought is that the Church in the Diocese of Pennsylvania is not holding her own, that the denominations are fast outstripping her, and that the Romish communion is vastly stronger than she. The facts of the case are that no body calling itself religious has near so many places of worship, while she has in Philadelphia double that Romanism has, which so many look upon as the great and strong religious body. In the city alone there are ninety-five places of worship which Bishop Stevens declared at the last convention that he recognized as such. Instead of "one new parish being organized and two or three unorganized founded," during the last ten years, the following facts are brought to light by a perusal of the journals of the convention:

St. Barnabas's, Kensington, was organized October 24th, 1875. On October 15th, 1876, services commenced in the new church. It reports in 1885, 346 communicants, 29 teachers and officers in the Sunday school, with 482 scholars; 4 Bible class teachers and 314 scholars under them. It proposes to erect a parish building at a cost of not less than $20,000, and the report says "that there is no doubt that the much-needed parish building will soon be a reality."

St. Stephen's, Clifton Heights. The cornerstone for the church was laid October 15th, 1878, and consecrated March 15th, 1879. It has now 53 communicants, a church seating 300, and a fine parish building and rectory. The parish is now self supporting.

St. Ambrose began on September 1, 1880, in two second-story rooms, at Twenty-sixth and Poplar streets, by the Rev. J. J. Joyce Moore; was admitted into union with the convention in 1881. It has 89 communicants, and has entirely paid for its church, seating 400. This had existed for two or three years previous as St. David's mission, but in a very feeble condition.

Christ church, Ridley Park. Occasional services were held in the railroad station during 1878 and 1879 to a mere handful of people, much to the discouragement of those who officiated. It now has a neat stone church, and it is expected that a rectory will soon be built.

St. Peter's, Weldon. Services were held occasionally at this point by various clergymen before the present incumbent took charge, on March 21, 1880. Ground was given, and a frame church was erected in 1881, the first service being on Christmas Day of that year. The report for the present year says: "During the past year the frame church has been enclosed with dressed stone, and now we have a stone church with a tower sixty-three feet high; the chancel window, one of the finest in the diocese, and all the windows of stained glass. The building was erected by a lady as a memorial of her deceased husband. The same lady has purchased the hall and lot adjoining the church, and donated it to the church for a Sunday school and parish building. The whole property is held by the trustees of the diocese. It is also endowed.

About ten months ago the Rev. A. George

Baker began St. Ann's mission. Services are held in a hall, Twelfth street, above Somerset. There are fifty communicants, and an average attendance on Sundays of 150.

During the autumn of 1882 the Italian mission was established, and the Rev. Michele Zara placed in charge. This has become the Church of L'Emmanuel, with 76 communicants. It has its own chapel, and rooms for its schools and other work. The mission is prospering greatly. An Italian hymnal has been published, as well as a monthly paper, L'Emmanuel. A night-school is kept up, and is taught by the rector and three assistant teachers. Thirty-one were confirmed during the past year. The rector is anxious to establish a sanitarium in connection with the mission, which is very much needed in the section of the city in which it is located, and it is hoped that the liberally disposed will aid in this as well as in the many other good works he is doing.

In the fall of 1881 a Spanish mission was begun, and services have been kept up without intermission up to the present time. Señor Farmenat Anaya was placed in charge, and soon after ordered deacon. His death, on May 5, 1884, prevented him from carrying out the work which he had so earnestly begun. He was succeeded by Don Pedro Duarte, who had gone from the mission to Matanzas, his native city, and there held the first Spanish Protestant services, which led to the King of Spain's decree of religious toleration for Cuba and Porto Rico and the mission to Cuba. Mr. Duarte was ordered deacon January 25, 1885. He returns to Cuba in a few months to labor there under the Board of Missions. There are among the evidences that the mission is doing a good work, and has great influence among those for whom it was organized.

For some years a service for deaf-mutes was held in St. Stephen's church of this city. It was in 1878 placed under the care of a commission appointed by the bishop. The Rev. H. W. Syle, A.M., presbyter, a deaf-mute, is missionary in charge of this All Soul's Mission to the Deaf. He is particularly suited to the work, and has been most successful in his labors in this and other dioceses. There are 104 communicants connected with the mission.

Church of the Atouement, Morton. This parish is the outcome of services held by the Rev. Dr. Spear about 1878 in a private house. They were soon transferred to a hall. The corner-stone of the church was laid May 24th, 1880. The church was consecrated April 23th, 1881.

The Church of the Good Samaritan, Paoli, was started in 1876, by renting a hall and holding therein services and a Sunday-school. On October 31st, 1876, the corner stone was laid for a church, which was consecrated September 28th, 1878. It has lately been placed in charge of its own rector.

The Rev. R. T. B. Winkill, deacon in charge of Church of the Messiah, Gwynedd, has for a few months passed been holding services at Lansdale, four miles distant.

For five years the Rev. C. S. Daniel has maintained the services of the Church in St. Chrysostom's chapel, 28th street and Susquehanna Avenue, which he began and has since kept up amid many discouragements; but the value of his work is great among a class of people who greatly need spiritual care.

The Mission Chapel of St. David's, Manayunk, was opened in 1876. It is now practically a separated parish under its own minister, the Rev. Henry P. Chapman, though the statistics are incorporated in the report of the mother-church. These are all new enterprises since the convention of 1875. Several chapels and parishes which were then scarcely more than such in name have grown, and some of them are very strong.

Christ church chapel was then holding services in the French church, it has now 150 communicants, and its congregations are only limited by the capacity of its chapel, which seats 400. If it was as large again it would probably be filled. Great need of a larger building is felt.

Christ church, Eddington, was then under the fostering care of All Saints, Lower Dublin. It has become an independent and prosperous self-supporting parish in the last two years under its efficient rector, the Rev. Edwin J. Humes.

Christ church mission, Franklyville, had in 1875 a bare existence. It has now 60 communicants and property to the value of $7,000.

Trinity church, Maylandville, was weak, and the congregation worshipped in a frame building. Now it has a fine large stone church and parish buildings.

In 1878 large and fine churches and parish buildings were built for the Memorial Church of the Holy Comforter and Holy Trinity chapel. The former seating 400, the latter 750.

A fine large church at Bryn Mawr has taken the place of the old Church of Redeemer, Lower Merion.

Other examples of growth in this diocese since the convention of 1875 might be cited, but enough have been shown to remove all doubts that the diocese has taken rapid and firm strides, far in excess of the increase of population.

PHILADELPHIA—Moro Phillips's Will.—The will of the late Moro Phillips has been admitted to probate. Most of the bequests are of a private character. $25,000 is left in trust for the Church of St. James the Less, Falls of Schuylkill, the net income to be applied to the support of the parish. $10,000 is bequeathed in trust for St. Mark's church, the net income to be paid towards the maintenance of the choir.

PHILADELPHIA—Home of the Merciful Saviour for Crippled Children.—This institution has been in existence about three years, and is now about to erect a new building for the accommodation of its inmates. It is to be on Baltimore avenue, between 44th and 45th streets. It will be 39 feet front and 42 feet deep, three stories in height with a basement. Its wards and rooms will be furnished with all the best appliances for carrying on its special work.

There will be a neat stone Gothic chapel built in connection with the home, 23x42 feet. It will have a chancel, roving, organ rooms, etc. It is expected that both will be completed by the first of March, 1886.

Mrs. Clarence H. Clark has given the ground, the stone for the foundation, and $500 in money. Another lady furnishes the funds for the building of the chapel.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Luke's Memorial Church, Buxton.—Mrs. Pauline E. Henry, the foundress of this church (the Rev. S. F. Hotchkiss, rector), has sent from Venice a beautiful candelabrum of brass, copied from one in St. Mark's in that city. It now adorns the chancel-arch of the church.

PHILADELPHIA—Christ Church.—The Rev. Dr. Foggo, rector of Christ church, has returned from his visit to Bermuda, his early home, in good health, much benefited by his vacation.

PHILADELPHIA—Home of The Merciful Saviour for Crippled Children.—This institution has been in existence about three years, and is now about to erect a new building for the accommodation of its inmates. It is to be on Baltimore avenue, between 44th and 45th streets. It will be thirty-nine feet front and forty-two feet deep, three stories in height, with a basement. Its wards and rooms will be furnished with all the best appliances for carrying on its special work.

There will be a neat stone Gothic chapel, built in connection with the home, 23x24 feet. It will have a chancel, roving, organ, rooms, etc. It is expected that both will be completed by March 1, 1886.

Mrs. Clarence H. Clark has given the ground, the stone for the foundation, and $500 in money. Another lady furnishes the funds for the building of the chapel.

UNIONTOWN—St. Peter's Church.—We are requested to correct some errors in the notice of this church (the Rev. R. S. Smith, rector), that appeared in our issue of August 15th. There is not to be a chime of bells in the tower.

The pews will be of chestnut, the chancel furniture only being of oak. It is only the tiles of the chancel and under the tower which are the gift of a gentleman of Philadelphia, the former a memorial of his mother. The parish hopes to be out of debt and have the church consecrated at its opening, but this will depend on increased subscriptions, hoped for, but not yet received.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The Lenthall Home.—In May, 1883, Mrs. E. J. Stone, a parishioner of Epiphany parish, sought the advice of the then rector (Dr. Paré), and his assistance in carrying out a long cherished design of establishing a home for poor widows, resident in Washington, and members of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The general principles of a similar institution in Hartford, Conn., were to be followed in its operation. It was suggested that the gift or trust should not be made to the vestry of the parish in its corporate capacity, but that a separate corporation should be found. Mrs. Stone therefore conveyed to the Rev. William Paré, D. D., and Messrs. Lewis J. Davis, W. D. Baldwin, M. W. Beveridge and E. J. Hutchinson, as trustees, a lot of land in the west part of the city, and placed in their hands $25,000, with instructions to expend not exceeding $15,000 in erecting a suitable house. The sum not expended was directed to be invested so as best to produce an income for the house's maintenance.

The building is on the corner of Nineteenth and G streets. It is three stories in height, with attic and basement, and is both substantial and handsome in appearance. It is known as "The Lenthall Home for Widows," being established as a memorial of the late John Lenthall. The term for which the home is organized is twenty-five years, ending June 11th, 1903. The house contains twelve apartments, each containing three rooms, well lighted and ventilated. Each apartment communicates with the basement by a lift, and has a storage room in the attic. The basement contains laundry, ranges, drying rooms, bath rooms, coal and fuel boxes, etc. The lighting of the house is free.

The rent of apartments for one person is $3 per month, to two persons $4 per month. Thus the home furnishes, at a mere nominal charge, pleasant apartments as a permanent residence for those who are able to provide the cost of living and furnishing their rooms, or to have it done for them. One apartment is occupied by the superintendent, and by two widows, one by a widow and her son, and five by one widow each. There is no regular chaplain, but the home is in St. John's parish.

GREAT CHOPTASK PARISH—Christ Church, Cambridge.—The new church in this parish, (the Rev. Dr. T. P. Barber, rector,) is expected to be finished by Thanksgiving Day, just three years from the date of the burning of the old church. A large force of workmen is now engaged on the interior of the building.

INDIANA.

TERRE HAUTE—Church Growth.—The commemoration of Bishop Kemper's consecration in Philadelphia next month emphasizes Church growth in Indiana. Fifty years ago that venerable prelate planted the standard of the Cross under the trees of the primeval forest, here on the banks of the Wabash, among a few discouraged people, where today stands the beautiful city of Terre Haute, with its long avenue of elegant residences, adorned with costly works of art; its great normal school, where twelve hundred graduates of high schools are annually prepared for teachers; its splendid "Rose Polytechnic Institute," richly endowed, where young men can learn to make anything from a file to a locomotive, and from an electric battery to a railway bridge, at merely nominal cost for education—here, in the midst of a coal and railway interest of immense value has risen this beautiful prairie city.

And in the very heart of this city stands St. Stephen's church, casting far across the valley the gleam of its lofty cross. Here the church is always open from sunrise to sunset, here arises the incense of daily Morning and Evening Prayer, and here the souls of the faithful are nourished with the wholesome food of the Lord's Supper on every Lord's day.

In the congregation are U. S. senators and State legislators, the mayor of the city, and three ex-mayors, the post-master, the judge of the highest court, the president of the board of trade, lawyers and bankers, merchants and manufacturers.

Here are special pews set apart for normal and college students. Out from this grand old parish church on every Sunday go forth earnest laymen in hands to hold services in St. Matthew's Mission near Abbott Park, in St. Mark's among the workmen of the great Vandalia system, in St. Luke's for the operatives of the nail factories, and in St. John's for the people along the wharves and tenement houses.

The music is rendered by a vested choir of men and boys, but is always hearty, simple, and such as the congregation can join in.

Services are furnished to the County Poor-House and City Hospital, and special services are held for masonic and military companies. There are brotherhoods and sisterhoods, guilds and fraternities suited to all tastes, and a printing-press at the rectory furnishes the parish printing. The grain of mustard seed planted by Bishop Kemper fifty years ago has become a full-grown tree.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

ANN ARBOR—St. Andrew's Church.—On Sunday, July 13th, the bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. Samuel Earp, rector,) and held evening service. After the service he briefly addressed his former flock, between whom and himself such strong ties still existed, commending to them their new rector, in whose ministerial integrity and ability he had much confidence. The bishop referred to the large and beautiful church, with its chapel and rectory, and dwelt upon the pastoral relations that day formed by them with Mr. Earp, speaking of the noble field opening before him, where there were so many young men during the whole year connected with the university.

WISCONSIN.

JANESVILLE—Christ Church.—This church (the Rev. C. M. Pullen, rector,) has been thoroughly repaired. It was closed on June 1st, and the rector was a committee of one to procure workmen, purchase material, and decide upon designs for interior ornamentation. In seven weeks the building was receded and painted, partly replastered, and the walls handsomely tinted and frescoed. The expenditure was $350, and all are satisfied that time and money were well expended.

MINNESOTA.

DIOCESAN NOTES.—Since June 21st the bishop has made extensive visitations in different parts of the diocese. He has preached twenty-three times, confirmed thirty-eight persons, celebrated the Holy Communion six times, and baptised six infants and one adult. On August 21 he delivered in the cathedral a very able memorial address on the death of General Grant, before a large and appreciative congregation. The bishop expects to visit the Indian missions in September.

The Rev. Charles Rollitt, missionary to various parishes and stations south of Minneapolis, died on Sunday, August 9th, of cholera morbus, at Delano, whither he had gone on the previous week to hold services. Mr. Rollitt came to Minnesota from the Diocese of Montreal, and was one of the most active missionaries in our diocese. His funeral took place from his home in Minneapolis, on Friday, August 14th, the bishop conducting the services.

Several parishes which had for some time been vacant are again supplied with regular services. Among them, and a very important one, is Albert Lea. This town, a railroad centre, is growing very rapidly, and the Rev. R. R. Goudy has assumed the rectorship of the parish under the most favorable auspices.

A very interesting mission has been commenced at Becker, under the Rev. A. D. Stowe of Anoka. The growth, both in numbers and interest, has been marvellous, and a neat little chapel, on which, however, a small debt still impends, attests the zeal of the missionary and the will of the people. Becker is a small hamlet, and the congregation is composed largely of farmers, some of whom come five miles to the week-night services.

A new mission chapel has also been recently opened in St. Paul, under the auspices of Christ church, in which services and Sunday-school are to be held regularly every Sunday.

On Monday, August 17th, St. Paul's church, Owatonna, (the Rev. G. C. Tanner, rector,) was consecrated by the bishop, assisted by the Rev. Wm. A. Pope, St. Paul; the Rev. C. H. Plummer, Red Wing; the Rev. G. B. Whipple, chaplain of St. Mary's Hall; the Rev. Prof. J. McBride Sterritt of Seabury Divinity Hall, and the Rev. E. C. Bill, presenter, and the Rev. A. A. Abbott, assistant rector of the cathedral.

This parish, for many years a mission station, under the fostering care of the clergy and divinity students in Faribault, was finally given over to the rectorship of the Rev. G. C. Tanner, who has remained in charge for the last eighteen years. The result of Mr. Tanner's persistent, patient waiting and working against hope are seen to-day in one of the neatest, and at the same time least expensive, churches in the diocese. The work was begun two years ago, amid much discouragement and lack of faith on the part of almost every one in the parish; but the rector, assisted and encouraged by his earnest and enthusiastic wife, persevered, and the work is completed. In September last, just as the finishing touches were being added, preparatory to opening the church, a telegram informed the rector and his wife that their daughter and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Perceval, with their little babe and two young Englishmen, Hugh Mair and H. A. G. Baird, had been foully murdered on their farm in Nebraska. The blow was a terrible one, and for a time stunned both pastor and people; but they rallied, and, although Mr. Tanner's attention has been much engrossed by his great affliction, yet the new church has been more fully equipped and furnished than it was last September, and is, in a very large sense, a memorial church. In April, Spencer A. Perceval, Esq., of Richmond, Surrey, England, the father of Mr. H. G. Perceval, the murdered husband, came over, and by his presence, his earnest, churchly ways, and his courteous, gentlemanly manners, has added new life to the parish and endeared himself to all classes of the citizens.

The church, cruciform in shape, is a mixture of early English gothic and Norman architecture, being high pointed, with opened roof. It stands on an elevated embankment, very handsomely terraced, and is about seventy feet by twenty-two feet, with transepts forty feet by eighteen feet. The chancel is 18x15.

All the chancel furniture and almost all the windows are memorials of the faithful departed. The font is in memory of the murdered babe of Mr. and Mrs. Perceval, and is the gift of her grandfather, S. A. Perceval, Esq. The lecturn, a carved eagle, was given in memory of H. A. G. Baird, by his mother. A beautiful brass cross for the altar, from Mrs. Mair, in memory of her son Hugh, arrived just after the consecration services had closed. The services were participated in by all the clergy present, the rector reading the instrument of donation, and the Rev. G. B. Whipple the sentence of consecration. The address by the bishop was exceedingly appropriate and touching. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the bishop, assisted by the Rev. Wm. A. Pope.

The little parish has every reason to take heart and be thankful for God's special blessings in thus enabling it to possess such a neat, churchly building—one which shall be a constant educator to the people at large and a comfort to the flock.

IOWA.

MAQUOKETA—St. Mark's Church.—St. Mark's, Maquoketa, has its rector once more. The Rev. H. E. Somerville, on returning from the East with his bride, found a warm reception awaiting him. This was participated in not only by his own Church-people, but one and all of his many friends he has made during all his life in Maquoketa were present to welcome home their rector and their rector's wife. A pleasant surprise was in store for the bride and groom. On reaching their rooms they found new tokens of regard in the wedding-presents awaiting them. Here, again, was noticeable how general this regard is from the fact that one of the gifts, a handsome set of chamber furniture, was from six gentlemen of the city who had no Church connection whatever. These gifts will doubtless soon find their place in the rectory, which will be completed in September. A rector with whom his people are evidently so well pleased, and a people who appreciate his efforts to help them live better, more Christian lives, may both be congratulated in the same breath in which we wish the Rev. and Mrs. Somerville Godspeed in their new life.—Diocesan Paper.

LOUISIANA.

LAKE CHARLES—Mission Work.—The Diocesan Missionary of Lake Charles, Louisiana, the Rev. E. W. Hunter, held the first Church service in that town on Sunday, July 19th. A large congregation was present. This is one of the best business towns in Louisiana. It is situated on Lake Charles, a beautiful clear water lake, is on the line of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad, and within about eight hours run to New Orleans, Louisiana, and Houston, Texas. It is a great lumber country, has a population of some 4,000, and is growing larger every day. A large London syndicate, of which Mr. J. B. Waters is president, lately bought over one million acres of land here, is stock raising partly, and partly cultivating. The Church people are very anxious to have a resident clergyman and can promise an energetic man a salary of $800 per year at present, with every prospect for an increase. The Sunday-school just organized, consists of over thirty children, and seven teachers. A good man could build up a fine parish here, as the people are willing to work with a vim. The climate is healthy, the town prosperous, and the people are in earnest. The bishop of the diocese would be glad to have an active, faithful priest in charge of the work, and the diocesan missionary would be glad to communicate with such a man on the subject. His address is P. O. drawer 1,042, New Orleans, La.—The Church News.

CALIFORNIA.

SIERRA MADRE—San Gabriel Valley Missions.—The Rev. A. G. L. Trew, the dean of Southern California has issued the foregoing appeal for the building of a church at Sierra Madre:

About three years ago a new settlement was formed near the base of the Sierra Madre Mountains on the north side of the San Gabriel Valley, about eight miles from the "historic mission" of San Gabriel, and some from Los Angeles. It is already the home of about forty families, of whom somewhat more than one-fourth belong to the Church. It has as yet no place of worship of any kind.

A movement however has been set on foot for the building of a church in which services shall be held by me, or by my assistant at Pasadena. The starting of this movement is due to an instance of rare Christian zeal and generosity. A lady who had spent the best years of her life as a teacher in Wisconsin found her health gone, and came to Sierra Madre when the settlement was first formed. She brought with her her widowed mother, and the savings of her teacher's salary. The money was all put into the purchase of twenty acres of land, and the building of a cottage home. They have nothing whatever but what their land brings in, and their vines are not yet bearing. This lady it is who came to me recently to say that she was resolved to have a church built, and to consult with me as to the steps to be taken. She expressed her intention of donating a half-acre of her land as a site.

I wish that I could transfer to the breast of some of our wealthy and generous people, who already have at their doors all the privileges of the Church, the feeling with which, when this offer was made, I hung my head for shame at the paltriness of my sacrifice for the Church. The rich of their abundance cast into the treasury. She of her penury gives more than they all.

Her spirit and example are infectious. Others have taken it up, and an effort is now being made to raise enough to put up a church, holding about one hundred and twenty-five, and costing about $1,000 or $1,300. Of this amount I do not think it will be possible to raise more than half in the settlement; and I shall have to look to the Churchmen elsewhere for help.

I have never before asked for outside help for the work of these San Gabriel Valley Missions. Since I came here, four years ago, the congregation in San Gabriel has grown into a self-supporting parish; and the mission at Pasadena has gone down deep into its own pocket for the $2,700 which it has raised this winter. When therefore I appeal for aid for Sierra Madre, I do so with a hearty confidence that the response will prove to the donor of the land that her generous gift draws to her object the sympathy of the Church.

I am done for the present; but I shall not drop this subject until, by the help of God, the Sierra Madre church is built and paid for.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

AMERICAN CHURCH BUILDING FUND.—At the convocation of this jurisdiction, held on August 19th, resolutions were unanimously adopted requesting every missionary station in the jurisdiction to make an annual offering, as liberal in amount as possible, to the American Church Building Fund Commission, and, as workers in the missionary field, where the need of aid in church erection is specially felt, appealing to their brethren in the older and richer dioceses to hasten the completion of the building fund to the full million dollars with the least possible delay.

PARAGRAPHC.

ONE of the great difficulties missionaries has had to contend with in Eastern lands has been the almost impossibility of penetrating to the homes of the people. It is now being largely done away by sending out medically educated female missionaries.

THE fastest cruiser afloat is said to be an English vessel, the Mercury. She will average 18½ knots an hour, while the Emerald, the Chilian, and the Milan, a French cruiser, averages but 18 knots. This country would seem to have lost its reputation for fast ships.

THE historical house at Woodbury, Conn., where Bishop Seabury was elected, has been renovated and restored without being modernized. It is about two hundred years old, but so substantial with timbers of oak as to be good for a century or more. The secret door to the hole in the ground where Tories were hid during the Revolution is yet to be curried. The house belongs to the Hon. Horace Curtiss.

An engineer on one of our important railways, and in other respects thoroughly complement, was found to be color-blind to such a degree that he could not distinguish one color from another. He had been long on the road, and those who travelled with him ran great though unconscious risks. Sometimes paintings are seen with such incongruities of color as to suggest a partial color-blindness in the artist.

It is reported that Canon Farrar has a special lecture for Boston on Browning, that city being supposed to have more admirers of the poet than all the rest of the country. There is also a rumor that Browning himself is coming to this country especially to see Boston, Harvard College, Niagara and the Yosemite. The city will hardly be able to contain itself and must annex the rest of the State.

In the memoirs of the Father of Black Letter Collectors, John Moore, Bishop of Ely, it seemed necessary to make some explanation of the large number of other people's books that were found in his library at his death. It is charitably supposed that in the matter of returning borrowed books he had a memory very convenient for himself, if not for the lenders. "A book's a book although there's nothing in't," and possibly a black letter volume is a treasure no matter how obtained.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN wrote, "Since Providence in great mercy has protracted my age to the finishing of the Cathedral Church, St. Paul, I shall briefly communicate my sentiments after long experience. A church should not be so filled with pews but that the poor may have room enough to stand and sit in the aisles, for to them equally is the Gospel preached. It were to be wished that there were no pews but benches, but there is no stemming the tide of profit and the advantage of pew-keepers."

It was customary in England to applaud the preachers in the pulpit two hundred years ago. Of Bishop Burnet, Macaulay says: "He was often interrupted by the deep hum of his audience, and when after preaching out the hour glass, which in those days was part of the furniture of the pulpit, he held it up in his hand, the congregation clamorously encouraged him to go on till the sand had run off once more." A parish in New Jersey now has a clock upon the little desk on which the sermon is placed, but it is to remind the preacher to cut it short and not to go on.

THE King and Queen of Belgium, with Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe Coburg, witnessed at the Antwerp Exhibition a procession of the nations. The representatives of them were seen loading and unloading vessels and carrying goods of all kinds. There were about 6,000 in the procession, in thirty-nine divisions, and there were wagons innumerable filled with goods. The splendid Flemish horses upon which, so large were they, men were obliged to ride sideways, were a chief attraction. The chiefs of the corporations were in carriages, and a chariot, bearing busts of the king and burgo-master, terminated the show.

It has been thought to be hyperbole to say that "in the lowest deep there is a still lower deep." We spoke recently of a minister in North Carolina, whose salary without any missionary stipend was $365.57, and on it he, his wife and five children were expected to live a starveling life. In the same State three missions grouped together pay $15.60, and three other stations pay $41.65, or a total local salary of $57.35, to which are to be added the missionary stipend of $100, and as much more from the Board of Missions, or a grand total of $257.35. Out of this is to come housekeeping and travelling expenses, say $140, and the minister, wife and five children exist upon the remainder. Such facts are gruesome.

LITERATURE.

PASTIME PAPERS, a volume of essays, by Frederick Saunders, author of "Salad for the Solitary and the Social," will be issued early this month by Mr. Whittaker.

THE Church Portrait Journal, an ecclesiastical art magazine, is published monthly in London, and every number contains photographs of clergymen and prominent persons.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR'S Eulogy on Grant is published by E. P. Dutton & Co. in paper covers, with a good portrait of the General upon the cover. It is quite equal to the cabled report of it.

"THE Colonial Church of Virginia," an address by the Rev. P. Slaughter, D.D., is elegantly printed in a pamphlet on good paper and clear type. It has no imprint, but is understood to come from the press of Mr. Whittaker.

THE Rev. Dr. C. S. Percival's poem on the death of General Grant, entitled "The Two Conquerors," which was read at the commemorative services at Cresco, Iowa, is published. Dr. Percival has a good reputation as a poet as well as a scholarly divine.

THE eighteen articles of the September Eclectic are from twelve foreign periodicals, and furnish a large amount of valuable reading. The final article is on Becket, from Blackwood. The literary notes and notices and the miscellany are always attractive in the Eclectic.

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING, issued every other week at 111 Broadway, treats of the most important subjects and in a very able way. Of the fifteen writers in the number for September 5, fourteen are women, and they write understandingly upon all departments of housekeeping.

THE September Magazine of American History has a steel portrait of General Grant, with a paper by the editor on his last resting place at Riverside, illustrated. There is also a fine portrait of General Meredith Read. The papers upon the Civil War are continued and are full of interest.

THE August Port Folio contains Hastings, etched by Stephen Parish; Milking Time, etched by E. O. Murray, after Cuyper; and Windsor Castle from the Berkshire bank of the river, by H. Raitton; all full page. There are some seventeen other illustrations. W. M. Conway gives an interesting paper on the Influence of the Mendicant Orders upon the Revival of Art, and the series of articles upon Windsor is continued.

THE supplement designs, eight plates, in the Art Amateur for September are of unusual value. Plate 465 contains designs for altar-cloth borders. The frontispiece is the Duet, a pen sketch by James Symington. The more important illustrations are pen and pencil drawings by F. A. Bridgman, D. R. Knight, Leon Moran, Geo. H. Boughton and E. de Liphart. Decoration, furniture and needlework are handsomely illustrated. The artists sketched are Eleanor and Kathleen Greatorex.

THE first paper in the September Andover Review is in continuation of the series on the "Religious Problem of the Country Town," by the Rev. S. W. Dike, a subject of deep and widespread interest. The Rev. R. J. Nevins, D. D., gives a sketch of Paolo Paradisi, reprinted in this issue of THE CHURCHMAN, under the title of "A Roman Martyr." The two other papers are "Private Aid to Public Charities," by D. McG. Means, and "James Madison," by Henry Cabot Lodge. The editorial series on "Progressive Orthodoxy" is continued, the subject for the month being "The Work of the Holy Spirit," and there are two other editorials.

ART.

The amateur will not overlook the invaluable service of photography in the preservation of choice and unique engravings. An artist's proof of Raphael Menges, Culanotta, Toschi, Mandel, and other masters of first-rate reputation, while it is constantly enhancing in commercial value, is actually yet steadily losing its intrinsic artistic charm, and is, at best, perishable and extra-hazardous art property, at mercy of dampness, weather-stain, mildew and the depredations of insects. These treasures may be revitalized on fresh, attractive paper by the skillful photographer, and multiplied without serious expenditure. There are etchings and artist's proofs from Rembrandt, Raphael and the other classic masters already bearing almost fabulous valuations and often reduced to two or three existing copies, and these in a crumbling condition. Generous precautions can rescue these master-works of an art not likely to be resuscitated, and secure for important collections and galleries invaluable tokens of the engraver's earlier achievements.

The plate of The Hannelschacht, one of Kaullach's most spirited and poetical frescoes, has for years been worn almost to hazy indistinctness—the thin method of the engraver, having accelerated the destruction of the press-work in multiplying copies. A dozen negatives from an artist's proof would secure this splendid epic, and other equally important productions, almost an unlimited preservation. While proofs of important plates are yet accessible, art dealers would do well to utilize these suggestions, unless they apprehend a shrinkage in prices for rare copies under such a process of multiplication. Collectors and amateurs who live on something better than a purely mercenary plane, may find themselves roving art an inestimable service in thus forestalling the ravages of time.

There is now little question of the rapid multiplication of the great gallery and "collection" treasures sooner or later, for the movement gathers vigor as it advances, and only churlishness can here and there obstruct or hinder. The early and medieval art, therefore, is certain of rapid and popular distribution. But what is to be said of important modern proprietary pictures? Here the question of "copyright," legitimately invites attention. At present there is no such thing. The artist may dispose of his creations, rerearing if he will the right of replication. Either the artist or the purchaser may further dispose of the right of copying to the print dealer or the photographer. But what can protect the copy, or engraving, or photograph from spoliation or seizure? In literature, even in trade marks, the laws of civilized nations impose legislative enactment; not for the restriction of literary production, but for its tonic and judicious encouragement. Why should not the same spirit provide similar safeguard for the creations of the artist? Why not copyright a picture as well as a poem? Neither may possess intrinsic value in most cases; yet the existence and recognition of art property as well as literary property would serve artist and purchaser, just as they serve artist and publisher.

Let the artist work under legislative recognition, choosing the manner in which he will serve the people. He shall be at liberty to "publish" his work under prescribed limitations, or he may reserve and retain all copyright. The current agencies of thrift and business would in most cases bring within popular reach such works as are most likely to serve and edify the people. The artist would justly earn the usufruct of a wide circulation copyright, in addition to the original value of his production. Just as the novelist adds his royalty on each printed copy to the purchase money paid for his manuscript. Under such prescription the photographer becomes publisher, and his gain lies not only in the quality of his work, but in the fascination of the subject. A trivial copyright would have secured the legitimate independence of scores of artists, whose works are multiplied many thousand fold while they themselves are penniless beyond the amount of the cost of the original. Copyright on the other hand would adjust such inequalities, and make the artist partner in the printer's venture precisely as the author is sharer of the publisher's fortunes.

Besides, there is crying demand for protection from some quarter against the desecrations of the caricaturist on the one hand, and the unscrupulous advertiser on the other. The charlatan who prostitutes the winged cherub looking up into the face of the Dresden "Madonna" for a bill-board poster, is guilty of constructive sacrilege. The shopman who seizes a delicate, dainty, idyllic picture and claps a glaring trademark upon it in the service of whiskey, tobacco or quackery, deserves boycotting from the refined, conscientious, art-loving community. Copyright would cure all these gross violations of aesthetic proprieties and properties.

IN MEMORIAM.

HON. JACOB THOMPSON.

Memphis, Tenn., departed March 9th, 1885. Being the report, as approved and adopted, of a special committee appointed by the Board of Trustees of the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., during their session of August, 1885, with reference to the death of Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, a trustee to the University from the Diocese of Tennessee:

"This Board has learned with profound regret of the death of the Hon. Jacob Thompson, a devoted man to whom the University was largely indebted. He was a man of fine scholarship, broad sympathies, and enlarged heart. He devoted himself very heartily to the building up of this University, and both by generous counsel and liberal contributions helped forward the work. From the time he became a member of the Board of Trustees he was seldom or never absent from its sessions. He took a deep and leading part in the deliberations of this board, and spared no exertions or labors to promote the welfare of the University. In his last days he did not forget its material needs. He was a devout member of the Church during all the best years of his life, and after a career of great usefulness to the Church and to his country, in both of which he occupied high positions of honor and trust, he entered into that rest which remaineth for the people of God.

Resolved, That a copy of this report be sent to Mrs. Jacob Thompson.

Resolved, That a copy of this report be sent to the Church papers.

APPEALS.

A CARD.

Appeal is made for the work of the Church Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, (Auxiliary to the Board of Missions). Though Good Friday is customarily and specially recommended as a time for contribution, there is always need of constant and enlarged receipt of offerings, and this is especially true in the present season of business depression, when returns of giving are relatively slow and smaller than in other years.

The work embraces the circulation of the Scriptures and a Missionary literature, the maintenance of Missionaries and Missionary Schools, and the organized co-operation of parish clergy, reaching the Jews with encouraging results in 31 cities and towns of the United States. No temporal aid is given believers.

Missionary pledges must be met. Parish, Sunday-school, and individual offerings are earnestly requested.

Printed information concerning Jewish Missions and the growth of the work freely supplied on application to

The Rev. C. ELLIS STEVENS, P. R. S., Secretary, 37 Bible House, New York.

Offerings should be sent direct to WILLIAM G. DAVIES, Esq., Treasurer, 37 Bible House, New York.

THE PROCESS OF THE RAIN-CYCLE NOT PORTRAYED IN THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In my commentary on the Apocalypse of St. John there is this unequivocal passage :
"St. John knew nothing of the origin of rain by the process of evaporation of water from the ocean; nothing of the formation of clouds, and the precipitation of their contents to the earth." p. 356.

In reference to this statement, the honored president of one of the New England universities raises most courteously this very proper inquiry :

"Would not an examination of what even the Old Testament says about 'clouds,' 'vapors,' 'rain,' etc., demonstrate a prevalent popular knowledge of the cycle of evaporation and precipitation?"

I desire that my answer to this question may be animated by the same frank and courteous spirit. The answer is the result of a careful investigation of all the passages in both Testaments where either vapor, cloud or rain is mentioned.

Everywhere without exception the changes of the elements, the rising of the vapors and the fall of the rain-drops are described as they appear to the eyes of the beholder. But with this visual appearance there is, in no instance, even an intimation of the hidden processes by which water is turned into ascending vapor, vapor forms compact clouds, and clouds become descending rain. In no place does the Bible give these explanations. Vapor rises because it is light; cloud is upheld by the stronger air; rain is precipitated by gravitation.

Object-vision, the only scriptural knowledge of the operations of nature, cannot discern the inner motions of the storm-king. The absence of science in the books with which St. John was familiar, fully authorizes the language respecting him in my commentary, as well as the character of the title at the head of this brief response.

PARISH RECORDS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

A committee was appointed at the last Council of the Diocese of Wisconsin concerning "parish records," in order to secure better means for their keeping and preservation.

It is well known that there are serious defects and omissions in parish records. Besides this, as parish registers are ordinarily kept—there being only one copy in a parish—the entire records of a parish are liable to be irrevocably lost in case of fire. Two methods have been suggested to the committee: One, to require a duplicate of each register to be kept in every parish and mission, and to be placed for safety in the hands of some other than the minister or warden having the original register; the other method, to require a diocesan register to be kept by the registrar of the diocese, into which the records of all baptisms, marriages, and burials shall be entered, the entries to be made from reports to be required by canon from every clergyman of the diocese. This requirement could scarcely be burdensome in a diocese where each clergyman during the year officiates, on the average, at twelve baptisms, four marriages, and five funerals.

This latter method seems to the committee more practicable. If in any other diocese any method has been adopted for the preservation of parish records, besides the usual parish register, the committee would be glad to learn of it and of its practical workings. They would also be pleased to receive any suggestions on the subject.

AGAINST A FRAUD.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

Please warn clergymen to beware of a swindler now going about the country and obtaining money on checks purporting to have been drawn by Charles Morton Sills of Portland. The man is about forty years old. In height he is about five feet two or three inches, complexion light. He is solidly built, has full cheeks, smooth face, ruddy countenance; one eye is defective, or very peculiar in its expression. He wears a brownish suit, and is quick and animated in talking. Here he called himself Charles Graham. JOSEPH CAREY.

AN ENGLISH OPINION OF THE PRAYER BOOK REVISION.

By request we reprint here, concluding next week, this comment of the leading English Church journal upon the proposed revision of the Prayer Book :

THE BOOK ANNEXED TO THE REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS PRAYER, as Modified by the Action of the General Convention of 1868. [New York: James FOLL & Co.]

HONORABLE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, by the Rev. S. Hart, M.A. [New York: T. Whitaker.]

Five years ago, the General Convention of the Church in the United States appointed a committee of seven bishops, seven clergymen, and seven laymen, "to consider and to report whether the changed conditions of the national life do not demand certain alterations in the Book of Common Prayer, in the direction of liturgical enrichment and increased flexibility of use. The committee set to work at the beginning of 1881, and the result of their labors, as modified by the resolution taken, after a debate on their proposals, in the convention of 1883, is embodied in the volume before us, which, by authority of that convention, is now submitted to the several dioceses of the American Church, with a view to final action in a future convention.

Some acquaintance with the existing American Prayer Book is of course necessary for the due appreciation of such changes as are now proposed.

An English Churchman who takes up that book for the first time and compares it with his own will probably be struck with some surprise at the number of its peculiarities, especially if he considers them in the light of a declaration in its preface, that the American Church had no intention of departing from the use of the mother Church "further than local circumstances required." Such circumstances did, indeed, in the first place require a change in the prayers for the civil government. And we must frankly admit that besides the necessary substitution of the name of the president for that of the king, it was no small gain that the element of "State Prayers" should be reduced in extent and simplified in tone. For surely no candid person who takes account of facts can deny that the prayers for the sovereign in our book would be disproportionate even under a more liberal and personal monarchical government, and that their language is in part insulting to the actual conditions of modern constitutional royalty. Our American brethren, when they pray for their civil rulers, can use words which fit the existing case. Among the other changes made in the revision of 1868, the most substantial approve themselves to Churchmen of all "schools of thought." Foremost among these is the alteration of "honorable" into "admirable," as the rendering of venerandum in the Te Deum. This alone, to our minds, would compensate for several needless deviations from the original of 1662, such as the substitution of "from Whom cometh every good and perfect gift," for "Who alone workest great marvels," of "in Christ Jesus" for "in Christ Jesu," of "prosperity" for "wealth," of "most justly" for "most righteously," of "fear" for "dread," explain themselves; and although the alteration of "which," a personal relative, into "who," may jar on some ears, it is fair to remember that it was earnestly desired by our own Bishop Wren in 1660. The permission to substitute selections of Psalms for the appointed Psalmody of the day may be blamed as a departure from ritual precedent; yet, practically, we cannot but admit that it may be helpful to less instructed Church people, who cannot well enter into certain psalms when they recite in Sunday service. "Sins," in the baptism of infants, is fitly enough altered into "sin." Another change which, for our part, we think commendable, will be found in the alteration of "in sure and certain hope of the resurrection," etc., into "looking for the general resurrection in the last day, and the life of the world to come." etc. Similarly, the alteration of the thanksgiving for the deliverance of the departed from the miseries of this world into a thanksgiving for the good examples of all God's departed servants may be deemed, on the whole, an advantage.

We are the more anxious to acknowledge the good points in the book and occasion to commend this Prayer Book, because there is much in them which is regrettable. When the first draft of American revision was carried in hot haste through the Convention of 1785, the influence of deputies from the Southern diocese, where Churchmanship was then at the lowest, appears to have dominated the proceedings. Some of the laymen expressed a hostile feeling towards Seabury, whose episcopal status was ignored; and a Virginia deputy proposed, for reasons only too obvious, to omit the first four suffrages of the Litany. The article of the Descent into Hell was erased from the Apostles' Creed, and both the other two Creeds were omitted together; and an adjourned meeting of the Convention in 1786, it was resolved, in deference to remonstrances from the English bishops, to admit an optional recitation of the article of the Descent, and to restore the Nicene Creed as an alternative to the Apostles'. But when the work of revision was resumed in 1843, the influence of Seabury, who was present, found the spirit of unorthodox innovation still too strong, on several points, for effective resistance. He persuaded the House of Bishops to allow the optional use of the Athanasian Creed, but "the other House" would have none of it. Thus, therefore, the Athanasian Creed is conspicuously absent from the Prayer Book of 1789; the article of the Descent may be omitted, or (which is a small point) "the place of departed spirits" may be substituted for "hell." No Proper Preface is of obligation on Trinity Sunday; and a less definite form may be substituted, at discretion, for "Who art one God, one Lord." The Agnes Dei and Agnes Dei are barbarously excluded from Evening Prayer, and the word "minister" is frequently substituted for "priest," there is no provision for private confession or absolution, except in the visitation of such prisoners as are under sentence of death; and even then the prayer, absolutely essential, "the priest being directed to 'declare to him the pardon and mercy of God, in the form which is used in the Communion Service';" the cross in baptism may be omitted at the request of "those who present the infant" or the adult, "although the Church knows no worthy cause of scruple concerning the same." The portion of baptismism recited in the second address "I certify you," is to some extent attenuated. In the Catechism, "spiritually" is substituted for "verily and indeed." The Burial Office may, by implication, be used over unbaptized infants, which is inconsistent with the Catechism; and the bishop, when he ordains a priest, may say, "The Holy Spirit will execute the office of a priest, in the Church of God, now committed to thee by the imposition of our hands; and be thou a faithful dispenser," &c. In the Consecration Office, however, there is no alternative form to "Receive the Holy Ghost," &c. We might say more as to the details of the book, but the chief flaws will come under notice when we examine the Book Annexed. On the other hand, as is well known, Seabury succeeded, through the aid of his old adversary, Dr. Williams Smith, and of the kindly and peace-loving Bishop White, in securing for the revised Communion Office the same form of Invocation, following on the words of Institution; and although the concluding clause of the Invocation was not all that he would have desired—for his own Communion Office of 1780 follows the Scottish words: "That they may be united in Body and Blood," etc.—yet he could hardly have expected that this Office, which goes beyond the Scottish by actually prescribing the Mixture, would be accepted by a convention composed of such heterogeneous elements; and he would think he had got what was substantial when he acquired in a former office, which had been drafted by Cosin, and is among the MS. corrections in that interesting volume called "Sanctory's Prayer Book," which is preserved in the Bodleian. We will here accord a word of thanks to Professor Hart of Trinity College, Hartford, for his timely new edition of Seabury's Communion Office, to which some elderly priests in Connecticut were found to adhere as late as 1819. It should be added that the Office of Institution of Ministers, which was added to the Prayer Book by the Conventions of 1804 and 1808, forms an additional makeshift on the Catholic side. Its author was William Smith, the younger, who had been one of Seabury's clerics, and speaks emphatically of "sacerdotal function," "sacerdotal relation," "sacerdotal connection;" repeatedly employs the term "altar;" and contains a prayer addressed to our Lord as having "promised to be with the ministers of apostolic succession to the end of the world." But we have been formed on good authority that bishops and priests of the school opposed to Seabury's have generally refused to use this Office, there being no obligation to be formally instituted, and have pleaded that it is "not included in the Prayer Book as ratified in 1789."

In estimating the changes now proposed, as contained in the "Book Annexed," we must bear in mind that the committee understood their instructions as requiring that no alterations should be made "touching either statements or standards of doctrine in the Book of Common Prayer." Such changes, therefore, in a restrictive direction, as would at present tend to strengthen controversy, they have held to be outside their province. If some disappointment is felt among Churchmen on this side of the Atlantic at the absence of any attempt to make good all the more serious losses of 1785 and 1789, let the conditions under which the "enrichment" process has been carried on be fairly estimated. The object in view was clearly good, although we think a higher good is still desirable. It may, indeed, be thought that an opportunity for more complete emendation has been neglected; but it will appear, on further reflection, that no such opportunity was really readily given by the committee which called the committee into existence; and moreover, that Churches, like individuals, have to do the work which the time makes possible, instead of adjourning it until the time has come for other work of still more moment.

NEW BOOKS.

MUSICAL HISTORY BRIEFLY NARRATED AND TERMINATED DISCUSSED, WITH A ROLL OF THE NAMES OF MUSICIANS, AND THE TIME, AND PLACES OF THEIR BIRTH AND DEATHS. By G. A. Macfarren. (Edinburgh: Charles Black, 1883. Imported by John Ireland, 117 Broadway, New York.

The title of this volume is a singularly trustworthy characterization of its contents. It is in substance a reprint with amplifications of an article in the current edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. For the production of such an article, the object of which is primarily to exhibit the necessary knowledge of the subject, Mr. Macfarren shows himself admirably qualified.

At the same time there is little of the constraint and visible condensation of this species of literary work. The writer is thoroughly informed, scrupulously exact, not given to accepting second hand information, sufficiently watchful to scrutinize authorities and traditions in a conservative spirit; and yet philosophical and adroit in the application of inductive reasonings in the pursuit of his subject.

Mr. Macfarren is an accomplished musician, and unfolds the scientific elements of his treatise without pedantry, yet with keen intelligence. For professional readers the book is a wholesome tonic; while for amateurs it abounds with admirable suggestions and helps for a satisfactory apprehension of abstruse and recalcitrant topics which the general reader is tempted to skip. For example, the archaic modes with the Greek analysis of scales, the Ambrosian and Gregorian modes, the relation between the theoretic and natural development of the science, the functions and limitations of musical instruments; and, more than all, the aesthetic and logical sequence which explain and account for the successive schools and forms of composition, are elucidated with unexampled clearness and intelligence. For the author steers well clear of the Scylla and Charybdis of musical literature—that is mysticism and technical pedantry—and writes in a transparent, well chastened vernacular.

The limitations of the work, as might be apprehended, are found in Mr. Macfarren's critical analyses of the moderns, beginning with Dr. Spohr and winding up with Wagner.

Here we trace a sturdy provincialism, with a certain unappreciative, unsympathetic temper. The writer clearly does not understand the subjective and idealistic impressiveness of the moderns. His vision is blurred the moment he leaves the confines of the contrapuntal, or strictly scientific forms of the early masters. Besides he unconsciously magnifies the English school sometimes at the prejudice of great continental groups of composers. But as these are conclusions, every thoughtful reader prefers to work out independently, they do not materially lessen the value of the book. By the way, the writer's views concerning sacred music are singularly crude. The list of composers and artists fill 70 out of 220 pages, and is likely to prove a general inconvenience.

Take it all in all, it is the most valuable synopsis of musical history and literature for the general reader we are acquainted with.

SAMUEL ADAMS. (AMERICAN STATESMEN.) By James K. Hosmer. Professor in Washington University, St. Louis, Mo. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) pp. 442. Price $1.25.

THE MEN WHO NOW are growing old can remember the almost boundless veneration for the heroes of the Revolution which was taught in their boyhood. All that unqualified worship has passed away. Men and affairs are discussed according to the general principles of history. Professor Hosmer has striven to do this for Samuel Adams. He has, indeed, the somewhat dangerous temptation of a theory to serve, but in this case the theory appears to be a correct one and to square with the facts. It is that Boston took the lead in the American Revolution, and that Boston embodied in itself the representative principle of the English folk-mote or New England town meeting. Sam Adams managed the Boston town meeting, Boston managed the other Massachusetts towns, and Massachusetts led the other colonies. This is the theory on which the book is constructed; but the remarkable and yet praiseworthy point is that Mr. Hosmer can go beneath these facts and consider the antecedent propriety of the Revolution itself. This he has done in a broad and fair manner, but it is a little startling to those who pinned their faith on the "Independence Day" orations of half a century ago to learn that the ways of the Whigs were not all saintly, and the ways of the Tories were not all abominable. We welcome this work as a contribution to American history of no small value because of this, its impartial justice. Samuel Adams was a man of mark, and his share in the Revolution is probably not exaggerated; but it is now time for the Revolution itself, with all its unquestionable advantages, should be fairly studied. Mr. Hosmer has shown that he is possessed of the ability to do this in a very acceptable fashion.

CAMP FIRE, MEMORIAL DAY, AND OTHER POEMS. By Kate Browning Sherwood. (Chicago: Jansen, McClurg & Co.) pp. 212. Price $1.

We have, with reason, spoken of the dreamy vagueness of the modern "impressionist" school of poetry. Here is a little volume thoroughly free from any such fault. These vigorous ringing lines are perfectly clear in meaning, and are so because they have a definite purpose and feeling behind them. Mrs. Sherwood has put her heart into her poetry. She has not forgotten her womanhood in the earnestness of her patriotism. And one very charming trait in these poems is that by the Union she means the Union, to-wit, the whole country reunited and one under the old flag—a South equally loyal and loving with the North. It is a difficult thing to express this without being weakly sentimental or pointlessly vague, and she has solved the difficulty in her poetry to an extent we should hardly have supposed possible. The "Other Poems," which are added to the "Camp Fire" and "Memorial Day" verses, are less marked in character, but are pleasant and graceful, and always distinct enough in their utterance of the writer's thoughts. We do not care to particularize, but we should say that "The Drummer Boy of Mission Ridge," "Thomas at Chickamauga," and "Charge of the Maine Regiments," are as good as anything in the volume. "Watching for Me at the Window," in the second portion, is also very graceful and touching.

LIVES OF POOR BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS. By Sarah K. Bolton. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.) pp. 367.

There is considerable range of character and circumstance in this collection. To give the names of the biographies will demonstrate this. George Peabody begins the list, followed by Bayard Taylor, Capt. Eads, Watt, (the steam-engine man), Sir Josiah Mason, Bernard Palissy, Thorwaldsen, Mozart, Samuel Johnson, Oliver Goldsmith, Faraday, Bessemer, Sir Titus Salt, Jacquard, (the loom man), Greeley, Garrison, Garibaldi, Gambetta, Richter, Admiral Farragut, Ezra Cornell, Gen. Sheridan, Thos. Cole, O. Bull, Meissonier, Geo. W. Childs, Moody, (Moody and Sankey), and President Lincoln. Of course these are mere outline histories, but all directed to the point that a start from poverty is no bar to the attainment of fame and fortune. Now, will the clever authoress kindly write another series about rich boys who became famous in spite of their riches!

WALL STREET AND THE WOODS: OR, WOMAN THE STRONGER. By W. J. Flagg. Author of "A Good Investment," "Three Seasons in European Vineyards," etc. (New York: Baker & Taylor.) pp. 428.

So far as this novel is directed against stock-gambling, it is a praiseworthy attempt. Nominally the scene of the first part is laid in Wall Street, but unless in the recent changes Wall Street has been moved "uptown," and got above Madison Square, the reader will have to take "Wall Street" as a sort of conventional title for the operations supposed to be carried on in that thoroughfare. This is not a particularly life-like novel. The best part of it is the "Woods" part, which looks as if roughly drawn from real characters. At least we do not think that it would be easy to invent anything like "Miss Yerks" or "Tom Hooper."

THE LONGFELLOW COLLECTION'S HAND-BOOK. A Bibliography of First Editions. [New York: William Evans Benjamin, 741 Broadway.] pp. 56.

The title-page tells its own story. This hand-book simply tells what were the first editions, when, where, and by whom published, etc., of Longfellow's works. It is limited to two hundred and fifty copies, and is just the thing which a book-fancier wants. We suggest to Mr. Benjamin to follow this up with other like works, especially in as dainty a style of typography.

ADMONITIONS.

BY RICHARD E. BURTON.

Dim deeds long-gone and seeming dead
 Are flashed before us at some word
 Unwitting: the magician dead
 Called Memory, as swift as bird
 In arrow-flight, some sense has stirred,
 Till we behold as yesterday
 Each act, from baby-lip to grey
 Of honored hairs. So, one may see
 What awful penance souls must pay
 When storing shames for Memory.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHEFFE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A Message from the Sea.

- "I watch the clouds flit over the moon
 And wonder if it can be,
 That her tremulous eye looks tenderly down
 On those graves in the deep lone sea.
 "Are they safe from thy furious blast, O Wind,
 In the haven where they would be?
 Hast thou watched them on to the stormy shore,
 Where there shall be 'no more sea?'
 "Was there prayer on their lips when the Master's voice
 Rang over the deep that day,
 And the gallant ship with its freight of souls Sailed into the 'far away?'"
 —Helen Marion Burnside.
- "Hold it up before me, Father, Father!
 Hold it up before my closing eyes;
 Dimly o'er my sight the death mist gather,
 And my way may look lonely through the skies.
 Loose the silver cord,
 "In hoc spero, Lord,
 Only this can lend me wings to rise." —Ibid.

Rotha had not failed in her errand of mercy, and although at one time Robert had been very near it, he was saved from an attack of brain fever.

But for some time his nerves seemed completely shattered. He could make no pretence at cheerfulness now as he sat by Belle's side; nay, more, he could hardly rouse himself sufficiently to talk to her. He was ill himself—irritable and restless. The whole atmosphere of the place was oppressive to him; and, seeing how things were with him, he was almost feverishly anxious that there should be no unnecessary delay in the Torquay plans, and that Belle should be removed as soon as possible from the saddening influences that surrounded her.

Rotha was of the same opinion—Rotha, who had long ago taken up her old duties at the Vicarage, and was fulfilling them as heartily and unselfishly as ever.

Save that she was graver and paler, that her words were few, and her smiles sweeter and sadder than of old, no one would have guessed that she had gone through a great trouble. Even Mary marvelled at her sometimes, and wondered what Austin meant by saying that Rotha was growing older. Perhaps the vicar knew that the brief summer beauty of freshness and color had died out of the girl's face, never to return. It was a careworn young face now, too grave by half, when she came in wearily of an evening, and there was no need to force her cheerfulness any longer. Too grave, oh! far, far too sorrowful, when she crept to her window in the winter's night to look up at the stars and wonder what Gar was doing; and to tell him, as though she felt him very near her, that she was doing all she could for Robert and for them all; but that she was so tired, so very, very tired.

Nobly as she had worked for them all, she had never so denied herself, so forgotten everything but their interest, as she had done now. It was almost heroic, the way in which she put aside her own grief to bear with Belle, to cheer Belle in what seemed to the others a tedious convalescence; for she was better now, wonderfully better, as Robert said, and the doctors had given permission for her to be removed at once. The weather had become unusually mild; there was no time to be lost, and Rotha, acting by her friend's advice, had sent Meg, with little more than a day's delay, off to Torquay to secure the most commodious lodgings that could be found, so that everything might be ready for an immediate start, while Mary, with many secret tears, set about the preparations for her sister's journey.

It was decided between Robert and the vicar that the leave-takings were to be made as brief as possible—the doctors had laid a great stress on that; anything like agitation or excitement was to be warded off as much as possible, and, after many consultations, it was arranged that Belle was not to know of it till the day before that appointed to start. It was no use prolonging her misery, and she had promised him to go whenever he wanted her, as Robert very justly remarked; and as soon as Rotha could tell him that her arrangements were completed, he would break it to Belle as quietly as possible.

So one morning Rotha came round to the Vicarage very early. There was no time to talk it over, for Robert had to leave by the next train to Thornborough, but he promised to be back in time to tell Belle that same afternoon.

It so happened that Belle was unusually well and cheerful that day; she had conged very little, and walked up and down the room frequently on Guy's arm without seeming tired. Poor Mary—who knew she was so soon to lose her—hardly dared to come near her all day for fear her tell-tale face should betray her, and yet could hardly bear her out of her sight a moment.

"She looks so pretty and so good, and she has got her old lovely smile," cried poor Mary, coming as usual for consolation to her husband; "and she has actually laughed once at something Guy said. Oh, Austin, it does seem so hard that I cannot go with her!"

"My darling Mary, you know Rotha has offered you over and over again to go."

"Yes, I know; but how could I leave you and the boys? I could not do it, Austin; and then there is Robert looking so ill, and Deb laid by, and Arty, and the parish!" And Mary put down her tired head on the vicar's shoulder as though it were her only resting-place. It was well she did not see the look of pain that crossed her husband's face as he drew her tenderly within the shelter of his strong arm and comforted her.

Robert came in presently, tired and harassed, and went up to Belle; he was with her alone for a long time, and then came down looking pale and utterly spent.

"Thank heaven that is over!" he said to Mary; "I do not think you will have any difficulty with her now. I have tried to be as gentle as I could with her, but I was obliged to be very firm, too. But I am afraid it goes very hardly with her, poor girl."

Mary was afraid so, too, when she saw Belle. Belle was lying quite still—so motionless, indeed, that Mary fancied she was asleep till she saw a tear rolling down the white sunken cheek and stooped to kiss it away, and then Belle opened her eyes.

"Is that you, Mary?" she cried; and then she suddenly stretched out her arms to her sister. "Oh, Mary, he is going to separate us; he is going to send me away, and I shall never see your dear face again!"

But Mrs. Ord could not answer her, and for a little time the sisters mingled their tears together.

"You must get well and come back to me, Belle; I shall want you so much—oh, so much, my pet," cried poor Mary, kissing Belle's fair hair, her hands—even her dress. "I cannot bear to think you are going so far from me, and that Rotha will do everything for you and not I."

Belle shook her head, and then began stroking Mary's face half dreamily.

"Do you remember, when we were little children together, Mary, when we slept in the great sloping attic that looked out on the apple trees, and how I, the younger and weaker little sister, would never go to sleep till you had put your arm round me and said, 'Good-night, God bless you, Belle? Do you remember it, Mary?'"

"Remember it, darling! too well, too well; but why do you ask?" sobbed Mary, melted by this tender recollection.

"Because I was thinking—don't cry, Mary; I can't bear to see you cry—I was thinking how, when that comes, I should like you to put your arm round me and say that over again. It would make it feel less terrible, and more like going to sleep, if you will only say 'Good-night, God bless you, Belle' as you did then." And drawing Mary's face down on the pillow, she told her not to fret; for she did not mean to make her unhappy, for if God heard her prayers she would surely come back, if only to lay her head once more on that faithful breast.

A more beautiful morning had rarely dawned than that on which Belle took her sorrowful departure from Blackscars. Robert was to go with her to the station, and Guy had also pleaded to be allowed to accompany his uncle; but the rest of the boys and Austin and Mary came no farther than the vicarage gate. Mary had hardly slept all night, and her red and swollen eyes bore witness to the tears she had shed. It went to the vicar's heart to see how the sisters clung to each other at the last moment.

"Dear Mary, let her go. Robert is waiting to lift her into the carriage."

"You hear what Austin says, Belle, darling; you must go now. Good-bye, my precious, and God Almighty bless you."

And Robert, gently disengaging Belle from her sister's arms, lifted her into the carriage and placed her by Rotha's side.

But even then, while Austin was giving her his brotherly farewell and blessing, Belle leant across him and held out her arms again to her weeping sister.

"One more kiss, Mary, darling—one more kiss, my own Mary," and hung about her neck till Austin gently, but firmly, put his arm round his wife and drew her away.

She scarcely spoke a word after that till Robert took leave of her in the railway carriage; but she was as white as death and trembling all over when he took her in his arms.

"It is not good-bye, Belle, you know. I am coming very soon."

"Yes, yes; the sooner the better, Bertie; but it will be good-bye then." And, as she stooped over and kissed her with some emotion, she only looked at him with strange, wistful eyes. "It will be good-bye then, Bertie, will it not?"

It was a long, desolate journey, and scarcely less so to Rotha than Belle, and a heavy responsibility to the young nurse; and it was a greater relief than she could have imagined to see Meg's friendly face awaiting them at the station: it seemed to give a home-look to the strange surroundings, and even Belle, though sadly exhausted, smiled faintly when she saw Mrs. Carruthers, and held out her hand with a feeble welcome.

Rotha wrote a tolerable account to Mary the next day; she said, of course Belle was suffering from the reaction of excitement and unusual exertion, but that in other ways she seemed much the same; and a few days after that she was able to give even a better report. Belle had recovered from the fatigue of her journey and was able to sit up and look about her a little. They liked what they could see of Torquay, though of course Belle had not yet gone out; but they had very pleasant apartments in the house of a widow lady. The rooms were all on the first floor, and opened into each other, and Belle's sitting-room was especially pleasant, as it looked over a lovely old garden, with a patch of sunny road beyond, planted with rows of trees. Rotha said the place where their house was situated was called "Torquay within the Hills," and she described the air as perfectly delicious. Mary had been guided in her choice by the advice of Dr. Vivian, who had recommended this locality as singularly adapted to all pulmonary complaints.

Dr. Vivian had been to call on Belle once or twice, and Rotha told Mary that he seemed to understand Belle's complaint thoroughly; he had spoken most cheerfully to his patient, and had recommended them a great many pleasant walks and drives. Belle was to see Bishopstowe, and Babbicombe Bay, and Warren Hill, and Daddy Hole Common. She was to go out every fine morning and see all the objects of interest in Torquay. Rotha wrote amusing accounts of the trawling with long nets in Torbay, the walks they had in the Torwood Road, and their visit to the quaint little fishing-town of Brixham. Belle had a little pony-carriage, Rotha added, and was greatly interested by the novelty of everything around her.

Mary used to read those letters to the vicar with tears in her eyes. "Do you think she will get better, Austin? I have heard of people living for years and years with only one lung; and perhaps the other is not so much diseased as Mr. Greenock thought." But the vicar only shook his head; he noticed how Rotha's letters were filled with descriptions of scenery, and how little she said about Belle herself. The doctor's visits were touched on very lightly; she always spoke of Belle as being happier or brighter, but never once said that she was really better. One day the vicar shut himself up in his study and wrote a long letter to Rotha, which she answered by return of post. But he never showed either the letter or the answer to Mary; but for a time afterward he was very grave, and went about as though he had something heavy in his thoughts.

Robert was in London just then on business connected with his firm, and it so happened that something strange befell him there, of which Rotha was to hear shortly. One day, when they had been about three weeks at Torquay, and Rotha, in spite of the doctor's prognostications, was beginning to cheat herself into the belief that Belle was better, she was sitting in her own room, while Belle was having her moonday rest, when a large official-looking document in Robert's handwriting and the postmark London was put into her hands.

She had not an idea what it contained, and was opening it listlessly enough, when she caught sight of a never-to-be-forgotten cramped handwriting, and a moment afterwards something lay sparkling at her feet. With a low cry she snatched it from the ground, and sank back half fainting into her seat.

What is it that she devours with such hungry tears and kisses—which she presses alternately to her bosom and her lips?

There is the ring that she placed on Garton's finger, with the diamond cross that he kissed so reverentially, and the words "In hoc spero" traced round the blue enamel; and there on her lap lies the "message from the sea."

Not for a long time—not until she has read it over and over through her blinding tears, not until she has found Robert's note and mastered its contents, is the bewildering mystery cleared up; not until Meg has come to her aid and read it slowly and patiently again and again can she understand how it has come to her—out of the very shadow and blackness of death.

And yet how clearly Robert explained it all!

"I am sending you something very precious," he wrote. "Heaven grant you may receive it safely. I am sending the very letter he was writing to you just before the terrible concussion took place—the very ink was wet, you can see, as he thrust it hurriedly into his bosom; you can tell that by the half-obliterated words at the end."

"How he gave the ring and letter with his last dying love; you must read in another man's words; I have taken it down myself from his lips, just as he told it me, and remember he was the very man who saw our Gar die. Another time, when we meet, perhaps I will tell by what strange chance I lighted on him in this great city; and how, in a lonely coffee-house under the shadow of the mighty dome of St. Paul's, I heard word for word, as you have it here, how our poor Gar perished like the hero he was."

Will she ever weary of the sweet perusal?

She spreads the crumpled paper out again—blotted, half defaced with ink, and in some parts scarcely legible. She reads once and yet once again her "message from the sea."

"My darling Rotha," it began, "I am sitting down in my cabin to write to you by the light of a very smoky lamp; the rest of the passengers are just thinking of retiring to rest, and only the watch is on deck. Just now I went up to see what chance there was of our beating down the Channel to-morrow—for you will be surprised to hear that, though it is Sunday, we are only now anchored off Dungeness—but the pilot tells me that the wind is still ahead. We have had ill luck enough already to begin with; to think we are still here on anchorage, and it is Sunday evening.

"But I have not sat down to complain, but just to let you know how things are going. I told you once that I was a bad hand at a letter, and I am afraid you will agree with me, for I do not think I have made much of a beginning, though I mean to send a little more than a message to Rube."

"It is not more than five days since I said good-bye, but I feel as heavy-hearted as though it were five months. I know now what people mean by home-sickness, for I am just sickening for the sight of one dear face that is all the world to me. It is not always easy for a man to express what he feels. I have tried over and over again to tell you how much I loved you, but I never could; and now I think that I shall die before you know what you are to me.

"That is a strange sentence, and I do not know why I have written it; but it is Sunday evening, and my heart is just as heavy as lead. I cannot help feeling as though some great grief lies between us. It may be because I have never been far away from home before that I am so low and miserable.

"I have been thinking of you so much, my darling. I do not think you are ever out of my mind for a single minute. You do not know what a man's love is when he gives it all to one woman, as I have given it to you. I have often said to myself, 'She will never understand it, but if God grant that I ever make her my wife, I think she will feel it then.'

"Do you remember, sweet heart, my telling you that I was not clever, and how indignantly you assured me that such a thing should never be mentioned in connection with you and me? I have blessed you for those words over and over again; and yet, all the same, I am rejoiced to think that you are cleverer and better and wiser than I. Do you think I would have it otherwise? Only put your little hand in mine, Rotha—the little soft hand whose touch I remember still—and I think I can follow those dear feet wherever they climb.

"Do you remember, too, my telling you that your love was not to be compared to mine, and that perhaps some day you might give me all you have in you to give? Not for worlds would I have even that otherwise; how could you misunderstand me so? The very thought of the treasures that yet are unwon only nerves me to yet stronger efforts. How could you, being what you are, Rotha, give all at once to such a one as I? No; dearly as you love me, you could not give me all. One day you shall tell me your thoughts, and I will try and understand them, and then perhaps I shall be able to tell you what I mean.

"There is a little deaf-and-dumb boy on board, Rotha, that somehow reminds me of you. I suppose the eyes of most mutes are eloquent, but I have never seen any like this boy's. They are brown and soft, and have strange appealing looks in them, like a dumb animal's in pain.

"You know my fancy for boys. This one has taken my fancy strongly. He is such an afflicted little creature, and without parents, and he and his mulatto nurse are bound like myself for Buenos Ayres; on such a long journey we are sure to become well acquainted" (Ah, Gar! on such a long journey; ay, along the Valley of the Shadow of Death).

"He takes to me already. You must tell Rube not to be jealous. Dear old Rube! he must not have a boyish rival in my heart. To-day he sat beside me on the poop for hours, holding the lapel of my coat, and looking quite contented. Tell Rube his name is David; but he will not be like the first David to me—who was, as one may say, the captive of my own bow and spear, for I suppose, humanly speaking, I saved his life. Dear lad! he has rewarded me for it over and over again.

"And tell him, with my love, that I hope he has forgiven me for not bidding him good-bye, and tell him to remember me in his prayers every night. There's a word, too, I might say to my tormentors, Guy and Rufus, but it is getting late, and I suppose I must turn in.

"I shall finish this to-morrow; but now God bless you my dear low one—and—"
Then came some blurred unintelligible words, and then Death wrote Finis.

Oh, how the girl wept and smiled over her treasure, and then, hiding it in her bosom, read in Robert's handwriting, traced boldly on the thin foreign paper, the sad particulars of Garton's death!

And this is what it said, taken down from the lips of the sailor, Richard Martin:

"I was seaman on that unfortunate Phoenix, sir, and have served under Captain Murray for, I should say, nigh upon five years, and, though I say it, a finer captain never commanded a finer vessel.

"Well, the vessel that we left off Dungeness, with nothing but the masts standing up out of the water, left the London docks about nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, bound for Buenos Ayres, and with, I should say, about three hundred souls on board, some of them belonging to a gang of navvies that were going out to work some contract, the rest of them saloon passengers and the crew.

"But you don't want to put down a lot of sailor's yarn; but just to tell that lady about the unfortunate man who put the letter and the ring into my hands when we had climbed up upon the pile of boats and were holding on together for dear life. Yes, sir, I quite understand you, and I hope you'll cut me short if I spin it out; for, as sure as my name is Richard Martin, I'll tell that poor young lady all my know.

"I recollect his coming on board with you, sir, for I was just hauling that coil of rope when he stepped across the gangway—a tall dark sort of a chap, with the cut of a parson about him, but a fine figure of a man too.

"He was a civil sort of person—none of your fine gentlemen, who won't give a word to a rough seaman. He used always to say 'Good morning, mate,' and sometimes he would stop and have a bit of chat with me; it seemed to cheer him up, for at other times he looked so down-hearted that I often said to myself 'that young man has left his sweetheart,' for I kind of know how a man will carry on when he leaves a woman behind him.

"I remember, too, that I got it into my head that he was going to be a parson. I thought so when he reproved two of my chums for swearing. I recollect him sitting down and talking to them in a simple hearty sort of way, and how when Joe Greene—he who had a widowed mother—slunk away fairly ashamed of himself he followed him and shook hands with him, and told him that he would be a fine fellow if he would break himself of that evil habit. That's Joe Greene, sir, that you saw alongside of me in the bar, and a more sobered chap I never set eyes on; as he should be, when he was saved out of all those poor drowning wretches.

"There was a deaf-and-dumb child on board, under charge of a mulatto nurse, going out to some relations who lived in Buenos Ayres; and it was odd what a curious fancy that afflicted little creature seemed to take to that young gentleman. Joe Greene was pointing them both out to me that same day—it was Sunday, I remember—'That's a simple sort of chap, Martin,' he says, 'to let that child sit alongside of him for hours like that.' I remember his saying that now, though I made no sort of observation at that time.

"But I am taking up your time, you will say, and I have not told you how it came about that we were lying at anchor so snugly on Sunday evening, when we had left the London Docks early on Wednesday morning.

"Well, we ran down to Gravesend all right; and then we found the wind dead against us, and had to lay by till Friday. On Friday we had middling weather, but the wind was still rising, so we towed down the Channel; but the pilot passing word, we cast anchor off Dungeness.

"Here we were snug enough, and the watch being set, the rest of us turned into our hammocks, and I for one was soon fast asleep.

"Well, sir, all at once I was wakened by an awful crash, just as though it were the Day of Judgment, and every rock that was on the earth was rent to pieces; and immediately afterwards I heard the captain saying out, 'All hands to the boats.'

"Well, sir, I heard it afterwards from one of my mates, who saw it all from first to last, a great lubberly steamer had cut the Phoenix asunder amidships, and there was a big hole in the ship's quarter, which was letting in the English Channel on us.

"It is all in the papers, and you don't want me to go over it again; but I wish to say that nothing that the papers can say will give you an idea of the horrors of the scene. When I rushed up on deck it wasn't only the women who came swarming up the ladders shrieking fit to tear your heart to pieces, it was the men too, half-maddened by mortal terror, who crowded round the boats fighting for their very lives.

"Well, sir, you've read it all; you know how that vessel sheered off regardless of our cries; how the cannon would not go off, and we sent up rockets for no manner of good; and you know how our captain stood by the boats and tried to save the women.

"Bless your life, sir, I did what I could, but it was like fighting with savages, and in the dark too: the wrong people got into the boats and could not be made to leave them; the men, the navvies especially, were like mad, and wouldn't obey orders. I could see we were doomed, and the captain, he says to me, 'Martin, save yourself—you've got a wife and seven children ashore, but my place is here.' I wish the papers had said a little more about the captain, for if any one ever died at his post our captain did.

"Well, Joe Greene and I were struggling at the boats between the main and mizzen masts, but bless your heart it was no manner of use, for we couldn't move them, and up comes that young gentleman you say was your brother, sir. 'The ship's going down very fast,' says he, and, seeing nothing for it, we three jumped on to the pile of boats.

"Joe Greene, he splutters out, 'I wish some one would tell my poor old mother I was thinking of her now,' and the gentleman, he says, holding out his hand, 'Martin,' he says, 'if you live to get on shore, and I hope with all my heart that you will, will you send this letter and this ring to the young lady? You'll see the direction written inside!' But lor, sir, there was no direction at all. 'And tell her,' says he, with a sort of sob, 'that the thought of her is making me strong to die, and that even at this minute I am thinking of her and bidding God bless her with my latest breath.'

"And I said, 'All right, mate, but hold on if you're a man, and we may be picked up after all!' for he was a plucky sort of chap, and did not seem to be holding on at all.

"Well, sir, he might have been saved like the rest of us, and that's the hardest part I am coming to, but that negro woman I told you of began howling and screaming, as indeed most of the other poor creatures were, and begging us to save the child. So the gentleman, he says, 'I can't stand this, Martin; give me a hand my good fellow, I must go and fetch the child; and I said, 'Not for worlds, mate. Don't leave these ere boats.' But he did not hear me, and just swung himself down, and I saw him lift the boy in his arms and try to get back to us.

"You'll excuse me a moment, sir, but it makes even a rough seaman feel soft to think of a brave man caught in the net like that. 'Joe Greene,' he screamed out, and then I saw the sea rise to the level of the poop, and then the white foam seemed to sweep him away, with the child still clinging round his neck; and I can't help thinking, sir, that somehow that little child will just lead him by the hand into the kingdom of heaven.

"You don't want to know any more; or how Joe Greene and I got hold of some rigging, and how we were picked off it by the lugger Betsy Jane; or how I got up to London and saw you, sir, in this same coffee-house. But I hope you'll tell that young lady that I've done my best by her, as sure as my name is Richard Martin."

A postscript by Robert added, "I have seen Joe Greene, and he has confirmed Martin's account; but I think it needs no comment on my part, save to say that to our brave Gar the words may surely be applied, 'Inasmuch as ye did it even unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' And once more, 'And a little child shall lead them.'

CHAPTER XXXVII.

On the Dark Mountains.

"For me, my heart that erst did go,
Most like a tired child at a show
Who sees through tears the mummings leap,
Would now his wearied vision close,
Would chide like on His love repose,
Who giveth His beloved sleep."

"And, friends, dear friends, when it shall be
That this low breath is gone from me,
And round my bier ye come to weep,
Let one, most loving of you all,
Say, 'Not a tear o'er her must fall,
He giveth His beloved sleep.'"
—E. B. Browning.

Three weeks passed very quietly and smoothly with Rotha and her charge. Belle had grown more reconciled to her banishment, and seemed to take interest in her new surroundings. The delicious balmy air, the pleasant drives, could not fail to soothe the poor invalid after her long and tedious confinement to the four walls of the vicarage. There she had been afraid to pass even from one room to another; but here the sunshine and soft air tempted her to many a short stroll on Rotha's supporting arm, while the very sight of the wild flowers, which even at this season of the year nestled in sheltered hollows, the long green lanes, the enchanting views, were sources of enjoyment to the weary eyes from which they had been so long debarred.

True, her spirits were still variable, and there were times when the old sullen depression seemed to return with tenfold power, but these moods were rare. In general she was very patient, deeply grateful for any little attentions on Rotha's part, and touched sometimes almost to emotion with the unflinching kindness with which Meg and she nursed her.

But as it was with the flame of a candle as it gutters to its close before the feeble spark is extinguished, so was it with the treacherous disease to which Belle was slowly succumbing. From the first Dr. Vivian had held out no definite hopes of recovery, though he had once declared that Belle's youth and constitution were in her favor; but since his second visit he had never repeated this. He had spoken very cheerfully to his patient, and even to Rotha; but it had struck the latter that his cheerfulness was forced, and that he kept his real opinion to himself; and very soon she was strengthened in this conviction, when she was sure that he looked upon Belle's case as entirely hopeless, and that his skill was merely directed to soothe and alleviate the few short weeks or months that still remained to her. It was very difficult to realize this sometimes when she looked at Belle. Never had Belle looked more lovely than now, when her cheeks were glowing with diseased color, and her eyes brilliant with the fever that was wasting her so imperceptibly. But this condition of things could not last.

On the day after Rotha had received her precious letter a sudden and alarming change was apparent in the sick girl. All at once there was a decay of the vital powers; the deep, tight cough returned with increased violence, and emaciation set in; exertion became impossible; every moment brought on the labored breath, the rapid pant; a fainting-fit of long duration added to her nurse's anxiety. In a day or two Meg was obliged to lift her in her strong arms from her bed to her couch in the adjoining room; at night her restlessness and suffering were so great that one or other remained in close attendance by her side. After three or four days of suspense and watching Dr. Vivian told Rotha that every symptom of the most rapid decline had set in, and that it was impossible to say how long or how short a time she might linger.

Under these circumstances, Rotha wrote off to the vicar and implored him to send Mary at once to her dying sister, and to communicate the bitter tidings to Robert; but great was her consternation at receiving the vicar's reply. In it he told her—and with what grief she might imagine for herself—that his dear wife was ill with an attack of pleurisy. She had caught cold one bitter day in going about her district, and had neglected to take proper precautions, and fretting about her sister had retarded her recovery. She had been confined to her bed some days when he wrote, but they had neither of them let Rotha know for fear of adding to her anxiety. Under these circumstances, he had decided in keeping from Mary the knowledge of her sister's dangerous condition, at least for the present. He told Rotha, to her further grief, that Robert had been despatched to Glasgow on important business, which would detain him for the next four or five days, and that unless there were any immediate danger it would be extremely difficult to recall him; but he charged Rotha to telegraph if any alarming change should take place.

"It seems as though in becoming one of us," he concluded, "you have come into a larger share of trouble than of joy. We are walking among the shadows now, Rotha, or it may be in the very fire of the furnace, and that seven times heated. Ah, well for us, my child, if amid its exceeding fierceness we may discern the form of One who walked before us in the fiery way, and know it as the form of the Son of God."

The vicar's letters, always so wise and tender, were Rotha's great comforts, and just now she needed something especially bracing to nerve her to the bitter duty that lay before her—that of acquainting Belle with her hopeless condition.

She was only waiting for an opportunity, but it came soon.

"Does Dr. Vivian say I am better, Rotha?" asked Belle one day when the doctor had just been paying his morning visit.

"Why do you ask, dear Belle?" returned Rotha, quickly averting her face from the invalid.

"Because I think I feel so," replied the sick girl. "I have not coughed half so much this morning, and the pain has left me. You do not answer, Rotha; you do not look at me. Does he—does he think me worse?" And Belle raised herself on her elbow, and looked at Rotha anxiously.

"He does not think you better," returned Rotha in a low voice.

"Not better!—that means worse, of course. Come here, Rotha. Has Dr. Vivian said anything—anything that I ought to know? Oh, Rotha," with a sort of despair as she saw her face, "it is not that—it is not the saying, is it?" And, as Rotha knelt down and folded her silently in her arms, she repeated in a frightened voice: "Do not tell me—I cannot bear it—that I have got to die yet."

"Dear Belle, try and say 'His will be done.' It is the only thing that can make it easy."

"I cannot," repeated Belle in a choked voice, "I cannot—it would be a falsehood to say it. What have I done that it should all be made so hard for me? Just as I was beginning to hope too that I was getting better, and it was only those dreadful winds that were killing me."

"I thought you knew it," returned Rotha gently. "You seemed as though you did when you said good-bye to them all."

"Knew it! Of course I always knew it. Did I not always say I was doomed? But it does not make it easier when it comes. I wanted a little longer time to get used to the idea—to— Oh, Rotha, it is not the knowing of it—that was long ago; it is the terror, the awfulness of approaching dissolution—the—the—oh, I cannot talk of it." And, overwhelmed by her emotion, the unhappy girl clasped her wasted arms round Rotha and held her fast.

"Oh, Belle, this is dreadful! Heavenly Father, what am I to say to her? Help me to comfort her," prayed Rotha, with streaming eyes. Then aloud, "Oh, if the vicar were only here—if you would see a clergyman!" But Belle shook her head.

"It would be no use, Rotha; it is not that. I suppose I have gone to church oftener than most people. You forget I have lived in a clergyman's house many years, and that Austin has often talked to me, but I never would open my heart to any of them, it is not in me. You may send any one you choose, but you must not ask me to confide in a stranger." And Rotha, knowing her strange, wayward nature, dared not press the point.

"If Robert were only here," began Belle, presently, in calmer tones, "I think he would do me good. No clergyman could be better than Robert; you have no idea how beautifully he talks. Oh, Rotha, there it is—the sin and the stumbling-block. I have made Robert my idol, and now God is punishing me for it."

"Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth," returned Rotha, using unconsciously the vicar's words.

"Whom He loveth, yes; but is it not idolatry all through the Bible that He condemns? Listen to me, Rotha. You shall hear what I have never told any one before—not even him. For six years—it is nearly six, is it not, since he first saw me at the vicarage?—all that time I have never had a thought apart from him—never once—never once."

"Dear Belle, you could not help it, I suppose."

"No, I could not help it; you would have said so if you had seen him then. You can hardly judge now, he is so different, and he has shown you nothing but his faults. But if you had seen him as I have, admired, beloved, sunny-hearted and radiant with happiness, I think you would not recognize my Bertie in the careworn Robert you know."

"I can believe it; there are traces of it still. I think you will bear me witness that I have always done justice to his nobler qualities."

"Ah, he was always noble, but he is not what he was—poor Robert!—when he gave it all up for me—for me"—and for a moment a mournful smile passed over the sunken face—"when he told me he would rather have me than all his aunt's riches.

But my beauty faded, Rotha, and he grew warped and weary, and then he began to misunderstand me and doubt my love; and at last it was all doubt and wretchedness."

"My poor girl! But hush, this is doing you harm." For the hard, heavy pants interrupted her every word. But Belle persisted.

"Let me, I cannot often talk, and anything is better than thinking—even this," as the distressing cough rung its hollow knell. "I sometimes think I am not so much to blame after all; for if he had let me do what I wished—earn my own living, I mean—I should not have lived all those years dwelling on one idea, and growing morbid over my very life; and then I began to be afraid I should tire him."

"Belle, dear, it is all over now."

"Ah, it is all over for me a long time ago—what I have gone through since I knew first that I should never be his wife, never make him happy—that I was doomed—doomed—" And Belle covered her face with her hands and wept bitterly.

It was a terrible trial to Rotha, and one which the girl with her lifelong habits of submission and her simple faith could hardly understand. "Oh, Belle! it is not like that—it is like going home," she said, presently, when Belle, exhausted but unconvinced, had acquired comparative calmness; "when the Master calls, Belle, it is hard the children are not ready."

"I am not ready," returned Belle, with a shiver. "From a child I have dreaded death—and I dread it now. Oh, Rotha, what can you say to comfort me when you know you would not be in my place for worlds?"

It was the first time that she had seen Rotha break down, but she broke down utterly now. "Oh, would I not? Gar! would I not? Oh, the pain and trouble of life," she moaned; "the pain, and the loss, and the trouble." And for a little while she could only hide her face in Belle's pillow.

This was the beginning of many a sad hour, and many a terrible conflict, before the tormenting spirit had been cast out, and Belle lay upon her bed, white and weary, worn to a shadow, but peaceful as a little child; and it came to her in this wise.

One night when she was unusually restless, and her few words only testified to the sore disquietude of her mind, Rotha sat down by her side and read to her the last two chapters of Revelations, thinking the glowing descriptions of the city with its golden streets and gates of pearl might soothe the tortured imagination of the poor sufferer; but Belle only listened with contracted brow, and, when Rotha had finished, she said:

"It does me no good—it makes me worse. All the time you have been reading I have been thinking of the shining streets, and the white-robed multitude that no man can number walking up and down them. But I don't see myself there, Rotha." She paused, and then, impeded by her broken breath, went on: "That is all glory, but unattainable glory, it seems to me. There are the river and the dark mountains to pass first—and oh," panted the dying girl, "why have the greatest saints prayed so earnestly for the gift of final perseverance if there be no conflict, no terrible struggle at the last?"

"Oh, Belle," cried Rotha, with a pity that amounted almost to agony. "what is the meaning of faith if we cannot trust Him then?" For it seemed to her as though Belle's stern and mystical religion had become strongly imbued with the gloomy notions of the Calvinists. "These doubts and terrors are infirmities, not sins; nay, did not even He, the Sinless One, in His human nature, shrink from the mysterious hour of His dissolution?" And then, turning to another page, she read the story of Gethsemane, and how, under the gray olive trees, the God-Man wrestled in the bloody sweat of His most bitter passion; how He drank even to the dregs all the concentrated pain and terror that humanity could feel. "The cup that my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" Then she closed the sacred volume and laid it aside.

But long after Belle had fallen into an uneasy slumber did Rotha, on her benedict knees, pray that the dark hour might cease, and the weary heart find its true rest. Never had she prayed so passionately, so urgently; and, when she rose at last from her knees, it was with the peaceful assurance that she would be heard and answered.

Belle slept at intervals through the night, but nothing passed between them till the following afternoon. Belle was very quiet, and unusually silent, but every now and then her eyes rested on Rotha with a strange, wistful expression, and when Meg left them together once she beckoned her to come close.

"Closer, dear Rotha. I am very weak to-day, and I think the end is not so very far off. Rotha, I want to ask you something. Were you praying for me last night?"

Rotha pressed her hand, but did not answer.

"I know you were, dear—I felt it. Ah, Rotha, it is all gone."

"What is gone, dear Belle?"

"The fear of death, the trouble and the misery. I can see clearly—oh, so clearly!—and I know now that He is good. It came to me in a dream—nay, a vision rather. You do not mind my speaking so slowly and painfully, do you, dear? But I want to tell you what I saw when you were praying for me last night."

"Dear Belle, I am listening."

"I think I must have been asleep, for I woke and saw you kneeling by the bed; the candle was shining full on your hair, and I remember I tried to put out my hand and touch it, like this. And then all at once I fainted, or seemed to faint, and when I came to myself I was standing in a narrow place shut in by rocks, and before me was a deep, sullen river, black and full of hideous shadows, and lapping to my very feet; and all on the other side was hidden by a gray cloud, luminous as though the light were shining through it—like a wall of mist, only clearer. And I thought that I was obliged to cross the river, and that I was standing on the brink crying and wringing my hands, and shuddering in the icy blast that seemed to sweep over the waters; and all behind me were dark mountains and rocks that seemed to shut out the very sky, and a horror of great darkness fell upon me.

"And as I stood weeping there, the cloud suddenly became more luminous, and a voice behind it said, 'When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.' And I seemed to answer the voice, 'But what if the sullen waters sweep me away, within sight of the luminous cloud?' And it said again, 'Fear not, for I am with thee. I have hidden thee by the right hand; thou art mine.' And suddenly the scales seemed to fall from my eyes, and I could see that multitudes besides myself were crossing the river every minute, but that nearly every one had a small raft in the form of a cross. And immediately I seemed to hear the words, 'Therefore do men commit their lives unto a small piece of wood, and passing through the rough sea on a frail vessel, are saved.' And as I listened I found myself launched on the small bark with the others; and immediately the winds seemed to subside, and the waves ceased their roaring, and the light grew stronger and clearer, and my little raft floated nearer to the far-off shore. And out of the cloud I seemed to hear voices like the sound of many waters, and this is what they said: 'He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad, because they be quiet; and so He bringeth them to their desired haven.' And immediately I awoke."

"Oh, Belle, what a beautiful dream!" intervened Rotha. But Belle, looking up and pressing her wasted hands reverently together, said:

"No, not a dream; but true—all true. I know now that 'His grace is sufficient, that His strength is made perfect in weakness.'"

A few hours after this Robert was returning to his home, jaded from a long hurried journey, when he found the following telegram awaiting him—

"Sinking fast. Come at once. No time to lose if you wish to see her alive."

Half an hour afterwards he was travelling as fast as steam would carry him to Devonshire.

"Rotha, do you think he will be here in time?" murmured the dying girl. And Rotha stooped over and wiped the clammy brow. Those who were standing round her knew that it was the beginning of the end.

"I hope so. I pray to heaven that it may be so, dear Belle."

"I should like to see him again," returned Belle faintly. The breathing was growing more labored every moment, and the sharpened face was gray with approaching death.

"I do not want to die till he comes, if it be His will. Read it once again, dear Rotha." And Rotha, struggling for calmness, repeated again Keble's glorious Evening Hymn—or Hymn for the Dying, as it might be called—"Abide with me!"

"Hold Them Thy cross before my closing eyes, Shine through the mist, and guide me through the mists."

"Rotha, I can hear a step. Open the door, quick!" Ah, she has heard it. Faithful to the last, she hears Robert's footsteps, and knows it to be his. As he enters the room and falls down on his knees beside her couch, she nestles into his arms with a low cry of content—"Oh, Bertie, Bertie, I shall die happy now!"

"My darling Belle—my poor girl—my own, own Belle!"

"Dear Bertie, you must not grieve like this. It is better so. I am so tired, and He is giving me rest—rest—rest." The labored breath became more difficult, the words fainter and more broken. "Where is Rotha? I have bidden her good-bye, and bidden her long ago; but now it is getting dark.

'Hold Thou Thy cross before my closing eyes—
The cross—'

Her eyes were fast glazing now. He puts his ear to her lips that he may catch the last dying sounds. What is it that she says? "It is growing late, Mary—cold too. Put your arm closer round me. There, good-night. God bless you, dear! Who says Bertie is here?" And as he held her closer, and called her by her name, those who were near saw that she tried to kiss him with her dying lips and failed. One moment, and Rotha gently lifted her from his arms and laid her down.

"And I heard a voice say, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, for they shall rest from their labors."

It was over—the brief life, the weary restlessness, the suffering; those who loved her best said, weeping, it was better so, for the feverishness and the weariness were over, and she rested at last, and rested well.

They took the poor remains back to Kirkby; that was Rotha's doing, for they knew it was the spot where she would most love to lie.

"If it be possible, let me be taken back," she had said to Rotha some hours before the fatal change came on, "and let them carry me under the old lich-gate, where I have often walked with him." And on Rotha making her a solemn promise that her wish should be fulfilled in this, she pressed her hand gratefully and went on:

"I have always wished to be there when my time came. There is a corner by the west door where I have often stood of an evening looking over at the distant furnaces, and listening to the waves rippling low down on the shore. You will know the place; it is where Ned Blake was buried, the boy who was my favorite Sunday scholar, and who was drowned last year; it feels so high and breezy up there, and the wind sweeps so freshly over the graves, and it is just by the little path where the choir-boys go to and fro. And, Rotha, if you and the lads ever come to visit me there, don't forget to pull the nettles off Ned's grave, for I've always kept it tidy, and his poor mother is blind."

"Dear Belle, it shall be done. Is there any other wish that you have concerning that—that?" But Rotha, greatly moved, could not go on.

"No, none. All the rest must be as you and Robert like, only let it be green like the humbler graves round it, and, if Robert would not mind, just my name and 'Jesu, mercy' underneath it. Don't let them put any grand text, nothing but that, or 'Resurgam'; they put 'Resurgam' over our father's grave."

Rotha gave her word that it would be so; and when all was over she wrote to the vicar. And so they took her back, and one wild March morning, when the dust was whirling down the white roads, and the wind swept the long grasses of the churchyard, and the gray clouds scudded over the sunless skies, the vicar went down bare-headed to the gate, and under the old lich-gate they carried her, and laid her close to the dead boy's grave, and under the shadow of the west door.

And in time the green grass grew over it, and the sun shone down, and the dews and rains of heaven swept sadly over it, and the swallows that built their nests under the church eaves twittered and chirped endlessly about it; and there, in process of time, was placed a fair marble cross at the head, with but few words graven upon it:

— ISABEL FELICIA CLINTON,

Died February 29, 186—

2800, MERCY."

But the cross had not yet been erected, and the sods were hardly green, when Robert Ord went up to Bryn to wish Rotha good-bye. She was sitting alone in the sunny parlor, and put down her work hastily, as though she suspected his errand.

"You are going? You have come to say good-bye?" she said, looking in his pale face anxiously. He had been walking up and down for hours, trying to school himself to calmness, and yet he could hardly meet her eyes as he answered her.

"Yes, it is good-bye now, and for long enough, Heaven knows. I suppose it will be four or five years at least before I get a chance of seeing any of you again."

"So long as that? Oh, Robert!" "Yes, unless—" He stopped, and then completed his sentence recklessly enough. "Unless I am dead and buried, I ought to say."

She sighed heavily, then put her hand in his, as a sister might have done.

"Poor Robert! and going alone too. It seems hard, very hard, and yet it is better than staying behind and missing it all daily," she finished in the patient tired way that was habitual to her now.

His heart smote him for his selfishness. Had she not suffered too? How white her young face had grown! how thin, how anxious-looking! Some joy had passed out of her life, some hope that would never be renewed. A painful consciousness that this was so, that she would be very faithful to Gar, seized upon him as he looked at her. How could he ever ask her to come to him and comfort him for the loss of Belle, if this shadow of her dead love were to be forever between them? Even now, when he had come to wish her good-bye, that look of pain on her face was not for him, it was for Gar—always Gar.

"You will write to me sometimes, Rotha? You will not forget me?"

"Forget my brother!" answered the girl reproachfully. Oh, how often she called him that now! How innocently she clung to the conviction that Gar's brother must be hers too—that the name must be as soothing to him as it was to her!

He turned pale at that, even to his lips. Ah, the sods were not green over Belle's grave, and yet the mad infatuation for the living was blending with its sorrow for the dead. Rotha—his sister—impossible! His face was stern enough; but he had schooled himself to patience—he bore even that.

"No; I knew you would not. I ought to know your kindness of heart by this time, Rotha. When I ask you to write to me, remember that I shall be interested in anything, everything that you do."

"It is good of you to say so—" she replied gratefully. But he interrupted her:

"Never mind how trivial it is—it will be sure to please me. Sometimes you may tell me about my godson, Guy, he has grown very dear to me lately, and about Ruben—poor Ruben!—and then there is Mary; I do not like to go away and leave her looking as she does."

"She will be better soon," returned Rotha hurriedly. "You know we are all going away, and for her sake principally."

"Have you any idea where?"

"Yes; the vicar and I have been talking it over. It is to be Lucerne or Zermatt, and the boys, even Arty, are to go with us. You know who is going to take the vicar's duty for a couple of months?"

"The clergyman who came to poor Belle at the last."

"Yes, Mr. Hillyer; he has resigned his curacy, and is waiting for another. We shall be away quite two months, all June and July, and we are going to Filey for a few weeks first."

"I am glad to hear it, for your sake as well as hers. You look pale and worn, almost as though you had been ill yourself."

She smiled at that, as though the subject did not interest her.

"You must take care of yourself for—for all our sakes."

"It is nothing," she replied in a low voice; "only my nerves are out of order, and I cannot sleep—that is the excuse I am obliged to make to Mary to get her away. She has only agreed to go, because she thinks I need a change."

"Poor Mary! she never likes to leave Austin; Belle would have been just like her. Oh, Rotha, no other woman will ever love me as she did."

Rotha shook her head; she thought so too. And then her eyes fell on the glittering cross, which she wore now night and day on the same finger on which he had placed his mother's old keeper. Some one would have loved her as well, if he had lived, as ever Belle had loved Robert—faithful even in death, blessing her with his last dying breath.

"Well, I must go now," exclaimed Robert, hurriedly, as though the action moved him; "there is nothing more to say, and I have all my packing to do."

"Nothing; but God bless you, and grant you a safe voyage," said Rotha, rising; but now the tears were in her eyes. She was thinking of what had befallen his brother; she was sorry—yes, she was sorry even for him.

"If I do not say anything it is because I cannot," he said, pressing her hands hard. "The only thing I dare say is, God love you and bless you for all you have done for me and mine."

"And you, too, dear Robert." And then she put up her face and kissed him, and called him brother once more. And he went.

But that night, an hour before he was to start by the night mail to Liverpool, he left his brother and Mary, and went secretly and alone to the churchyard.

It was quite dark now: the wind was still abroad, and howled drearily round the church, and the rain splashed sullenly on the tombstones, or dripped silently into tiny pools. But Robert, as he stood bare-headed and with folded arms, heeded it not, for the fierce fever and pain that burnt in his veins.

But once, as he stooped and plucked a few blades of grass from the grave and hid them in his breast, a sudden overwhelming sense of his loneliness came over him. "Good-bye, Belle," he cried, pressing his lips to the dripping sod, and stretching out his arms over it in the darkness. "Good-bye, my darling. Never woman loved as you would have loved me." Then whispering low, as though he would hide his secret in her very grave, "You know it now, dear, do you not? But you are not angry with me? Oh, Belle, to think that my heart is broken with all this, and that you are not here to comfort me!"

Three-quarters of an hour after this Robert had bidden good-bye to Kirkby and Blackscar, and had taken his place by the night mail for Liverpool.

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXVI.

Some ten or fifteen years before the writing of that lovely letter, the Epistle to the Philippians, St. Paul and the faithful Silas had been rigorously imprisoned in the jail of Philippi. But despite the pain of many stripes and the constraint of the stocks, the midnight hour found them singing praises to Him who giveth songs in the night. And the prisoners heard them.

Then came the earthquake and the opening of the doors. We recall here the incident of the jailer. Those old Roman people, with all their faults, had grand ideas of the sanctity of a trust. When this was forfeited, they deemed life itself worthless. St. Paul's assurance, "We are all here," alone diverted the jailer from suicide.

And now St. Paul is again a prisoner. He is writing from Rome to the Philippian saints. He recalls the memory of the stocks and the dungeon and the hymns and the deliverance, and he finds it not grievous to write the same things over and over again. Rejoice, rejoice, and again I say, Rejoice. Thus are we reminded that when seemingly we are so fast bound in prison that we cannot get out, the memory of many a deliverance past should cheer us and cause us to bid others to be of good cheer.

And then, again, the prisoner Paul is sending messages to Eudias and Syntyche, whoever they were; then to the women which labored with him in the Gospel. See, Christian women, with all your weakness, how Apostles, Bishops, Priests, in all the ages, find in you co-workers as efficient as well-beloved! They had helped not only himself, but other his fellow-laborers, specifying Clement, afterward Bishop of Rome, and one of the five Apostolic Fathers, whose writings carry on the story of the Acts of the Apostles. And of these he says, comprehensively, "whose names are in the book of life."

Now mark the suggestiveness of this last word!

The Seventy once returned to our Lord with joy, saying, "Lord, even the Devils are subject unto us through Thy name." And He said unto them, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. . . . Notwithstanding in this rejoice not that the spirits are subject unto you, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven."

So, then, recalling the old prison and the old deliverance, rehearsing the names of the old associates, and assuring himself that those names were all inscribed in the Lamb's book of life, Rejoice, cries the Apostle, and again I say, Rejoice.

A word of caution he adds. The inscription in that book is not ineffaceable; there must be a scrutiny before it is fixed indelibly. "Let your moderation"—i.e., your fairness, your equitableness of judging and acting, "be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand."

"Be careful for nothing," he adds, "but in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving"—forget not the thanksgiving, ye prisoners of hope: in the midst of prayers, Rejoice always, and again I say, Rejoice—"let your requests be made known unto God."

And how lovingly he crowns all this with that promise which the Church, converting it into a benediction, is never weary to utter nor to hear. "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds, through Christ Jesus."

These words, Rejoice, Rejoice, are as apples of gold, but the history and the associations of them are as pictures of silver.

But one may say, What occasion hath thou, O venerable man of God, to rejoice? This very letter tells me of bonds. I see thee in Caesar's palace, ever on thy sacred errands, but ever chained by the wrist to a rough soldier. By thine own acknowledgment, but for the alms sent from Philippi by the hand of Epaphroditus thou wouldst be in actual need. As for thine associates, this very letter tells that some are selfish, seeking their own; some contentious, adding affliction to thy bonds; and many walk, thou dost tell us—and just here the letter is blotted with thy tears—who are enemies of the Cross, earthly-minded. Is it not in the unreality of an enthusiast that thou dost so rejoice?

Perchance the Philippians might say, or we, to whom this exhortation equally belongs, may say, How can we rejoice, not once, but again—not sometimes, but always?

Look at us as we are. See the scars which life's experience has left upon our hearts or the fresh wounds which open and bleed anew in the night season, as we try to enfold in our arms that which is now but memory and shadow. Behold our burdens daily increasing, while the bodily strength and the spiritual alacrity which should endure them are steadily diminishing. See how straightened some of us are in our circumstances, and how cumbered with much serving. Some, while they have many acquaintances, have few friends and are often lonely in this great world. The life of some is full of worries and trials and contradictions not easy to catalogue.

And in the spiritual life, how can so much defeat and shortcoming, so much infirmity and sin and coldness and deadness—how can these leave room for joy?

And yet again, how can the Church and we her members rejoice, when the coming of the Kingdom is so far off? When congregations are so small, and so few are won into the fold; and when so many who are saints by profession seem to bear no cross? How can we in our captivity take the harp down from the willows and sing the songs of Zion?

Even the good John Keble said to a friend, "For such as we fast-days suit us best."

Thus it is that we excuse ourselves from rejoicing in God. Thus do we assume that joy in God is not to be reconciled with the consciousness of distress and pain, with self-reproach and self-discontent. Thus do we abdicate the highest office of humanity, the priestliness of the race.

We are in the midst of a rejoicing universe; stars and planets, trees and waving corn, all living things, and even frost and cold rejoice in the Lord. But their joy is inarticulate. Man, the intelligent, the work-maker; man, the priest of nature; man, rich in the union of the Holy One, was created, aye, and redeemed partly for this end; that to the accompaniment of nature he might add what musicians call the libretto, the coherent song of praise, the articulated words of blessing.

From the tabernacle in the wilderness down to the visions of Patmos we have an unvarying representation of an Almighty One upon a throne high and lifted up, praised and adored of Angels and yet looking benignantly upon a fallen world, where struggling saints swing the censers of rejoicing and send up heavenwards the incense of their praise.

If proof or illustration were needed that such is the Church's office, and ours, we need only rehearse the words which so often inaugurate our holy services, "From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, incense shall be offered unto my name and a pure offering, for my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the Lord of hosts."

May the element of adoration enter more constantly unto our private prayers, and into our family and our public devotions!

AN EXCELLENT EXAMPLE.

A few years since a young man who was studying at "Seabury Hall" was called upon to return East and take a mission field near his parents, who were needing his attention. He finished his studies, was ordained, and hastened to this abandoned field.

There had been a pretty stone church built there in years gone by, but church life was nearly extinct. He went to work, and mostly with his own hands built a rectory and barn, turned the vestry-room of the church into a library and study-room, arranging it so that he could ring and toll the bell for services himself, as he was the only sexton.

He went to the mountains and cut and hauled wood for fuel for both church and rectory, planted potatoes "upon shares," went out at day's work in haying, joinering, etc.

In addition to this field he started another mission four miles distant, where he held services every Sunday, and also had services in another place where the last spark of church life was dying and revived it. In all these places his labors were abundant.

After laboring in these missions with great success a few years, the Master called him away from this field to one in the far West—to Southern California—and he has been there between two and three years, has already built two churches almost exclusively with his own hands. They are not completed, but they are in constant use for worship, and every week he is at work on one or the other of them finishing them by degrees, and he has the building of another in contemplation. He literally "hews his way."

It is very hard for him to keep up courage sometimes, for he has but little help, except ing his faithful wife, who shares with him, cheerfully, all his hardships and toil.

He has not a single male communicant in his first mission, and no active one in the second. It is all hard, "up-hill work," the hardest field, he says, for missionary work he has ever had. "The population in both missions is fluctuating—people are here to-day and somewhere else to-morrow;" but as the Master bids him stay, he toils bravely on.

The "support" question seems not to enter his mind, but his faith is, "Trust in the Lord and do good, so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."

GOD'S SUNNY WAY.

BY G. E. HEATH.

God's care is over us;

His gracious hand

Points out a way

We cannot understand.

It may be that the road

Is rough, O sweet

To know there is a rest

For weary feet!

To know that for it all

We shall have strength,

And hear the welcome home

Of God, at length,

God's hand is in it all.

O heart, lie still!

What is, is best for thee;

Then trust His will.

His wings o'er-shadow thee;

And, every day,

He walks, faint heart, with thee

The thorny way.

His feet have pressed the briars

Before thee own;

Then never say, sad heart,

Thou art alone.

O love of God! Too deep,

Too sweet for me:

I blindly walk the way

I cannot see.

God's sunshine blinds me;

I can only say,

I thank Thee, O my God,

For this, Thy way!

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH TRAVEL.

BY M. MEDLICOTT.

Accomb and Whitby.

York lies in the heart of lovely country, and it takes but a short time to find one's self in the midst of lovely suburban residences and green fields. One day, after exploring the old town, and wandering here and there as fancy willed, we resolved upon a trip outside the city—one we should not have known or thought of unless it had been suggested to us. This trip was to Accomb, one of the suburbs of York, where are some fine green-houses and ferneries. And well worthy of a visit they are. About a mile and a half only from the city, in large grounds, and, on giving the name of the gentleman who had told us of them, we were courteously taken through range after range of green-houses. All sorts of ferns and palms grew here luxuriantly, from the most delicate "maiden-hair" fern, with the leaves hardly larger than the head of a small pin, feathery in its lightness, to the giant Australian-Brazilian fern, with its bare and scaly trunk, like that of a palm-tree, rising up as high as our heads, and the huge fronds towering up twenty feet or more. One room or house opened out of another, with carefully closed doors between, so as to preserve the heat at the different degrees of temperature required. One could not imagine so many varieties of the family of ferns, or some such exquisite specimens; growing, too, in all sorts of ways and places; some carefully potted, ready for removal, as in great beds, some growing as in their wild state, on the edge of water or among rocks. Now our way led through a path thickly arched overhead with the mighty growth, anon down rocky steps winding this way and that in picturesque confusion. I asked my guide how many different kinds of ferns they had here, but he could not tell me, saying there were hundreds of varieties, and over a hundred and fifty of the "maiden-hair" species alone.

Next through the orchid-houses we went, where these curious plants were growing in a variety of ways, some of them in blossom, with such odd-shaped, peculiarly-tinted flowers, some growing on pieces of wood like branches of trees, others in graceful baskets, some hanging down from the roofs. Outside again, through the gardens, not so different from other nursery-gardens, to some beautifully-arranged ferneries in the open air. Altogether, a lovely afternoon was thus spent. Then a pleasant walk back to the city, first through the country road, with scattered houses here and there, these gradually drawing nearer and nearer together, pretty villas and more pretentious mansions standing side by side. Striking at length the old wall of the city, and mounting this, we followed it for half a mile or more, getting thus quite a different view of the city from any previous one, till we reached the gate nearest our hotel, weary, but well pleased with our afternoon's trip, and one we can recommend to others.

Next day was even more enjoyable. Following the rule laid down for myself, of selecting places that appealed most strongly to fancy or natural taste, rather than the ordinary route of tourists, my destination now was Whitby, on the east coast of Yorkshire. Leaving York early in the morning, the railway journey of two or three hours was one never to be forgotten, the road winding in and out between the hills, upward and upward, now a sharp curve to this side or to that, and even a series of curves, so that looking from the carriage-window one could see the track ahead of us like a letter S, or a snake twisting its tortuous black length over the way. Then the heather. Does my reader know what it is to see the heather for the first time growing in profusion? To see the hills on either hand, red or purple with the lovely blossoms, here a thick clump merely, there a whole field of it, now close to the road we were following, such a tempting bed of it, that instinctively we were ready to cry out for the train to stop till we could gather our fill. Whoever knows this can understand the perfect delight of such a ride as the one of this day.

Whitby is full of association and interest, full of—what shall I say? History poorly expresses it. For ten persons, nay, for a hundred, who think of Whitby chiefly in connection with the manufacture of the jet ornaments for which the place is so famous,

Whitby jet being known the world over, one has an interest in the place for other and stronger reasons. We recall how Scott immortalizes the name and the legends of Whitby, and of its first abbess, St. Hilda, in his poem of "Marmion," as he describes in the evening talk of the nuns:

—how of thousand makes each one
Was changed into a coil of stone
When holy Hilda prayed;
Themselves within their holy bound
Their story folds had often found,
They told how sea-fowls' pinions fall,
As over Whitby's towers they sail,
And singing down, with butterfles' faint,
They do their homage to the saint."

All this is legendary, even the occasion of this repeating of legends is imaginative, for at the time of which the poet writes there were no nuns at the abbey, it having been changed and fallen under other rule. But the name and history of St. Hilda, as we know, are not legendary, and the deepest interest attaches to her. Not only or not chiefly because the "Lady Hilda," as she was called, who founded this abbey in 637, and presided over it till her death in 680, was of the royal Northumbrian family, and was baptized by Paulinus at the same time (Easter Day, 627), as King Edwin, being indeed the daughter of his nephew Hereric, and then thirteen years old. In every way she was a remarkable woman, early dedicating herself to a religious life, the pupil of St. Aidan of Iona, afterward at Lindisfarne, who, in his turn, was one of the disciples of St. Columba, the apostle of Scotland. By Aidan she was set over a small monastery at Hartlepool, and afterward, acquiring possession of some land at Streameshale, as it was then called, said by Bede to mean the "Bay of the Lighthouse," now better known as Whitby, she removed thither and founded an abbey. As was usual in those days, the abbey was for men and women both, all of whom were under the care of Abbess Hilda. And now comes our own deepest interest in the place, as associating it not merely with Hilda, the good and wise, but with one who little thought, how his name was to be remembered and revered for twelve centuries, nay, long as the English language shall be spoken. Caedmon, we know, did not write in the present form of our English tongue, nevertheless his poem seems to us the first-fruits of what some writers now describe as First-English, instead of Anglo-Saxon. Does not his story read like a poem in itself? How he was a poor, uneducated man, in menial service of some sort about the abbey, perhaps, as some writers suggest, the ferry-man, and also employed about the horses. At all events, the story is told by Bede, how, as he was sleeping one night in the stables, he heard a voice bidding him sing, and on replying that he knew not how, but at the continued command, asking what he should sing, the voice said: "Sing the beginning of created things." How in his dream he sang, and next morning, remembering the verses, and repeating them, they came at length to the ears of the Abbess Hilda, who recognized his genius, and gave him a place among her monks. Here, being taught the sacred history, his own poem grew, as the plants grow, methinks, from the watering of divine grace and the nourishment of mental food, till the very name of the poor "ceorl" has become immortalized to us.

With all this in our minds we approach the town, and alighting at the station amid a Saturday (or market-day) crowd, we find our way into the narrow, crooked streets. Quaint looking everything is—even the men and women look more primitive than those we meet in the streets of York. The river Eak winds through the town, dividing it into two parts, and the sides of the river rise steep and high, forming bluffs overlooking the sea. A handsome bridge connects the two parts of the town, and the streets are, many of them, steep, here and there a flight of steps leading from one street to another. The market-place was a busy spot, as we looked into it, wares of every kind scattered about in what looked like wild confusion. Some splendid gooseberries we bought here, and carried off to enjoy on the cliffs. Crossing the bridge, which, being the only one, presented a scene of constant passing and repassing, the abbey ruins soon rose before us, high above, crowning the cliff. The street or road leading up to the top of the bluff was very steep, so that much of the way it was cut in a flight of steps, and ascending these, below us on one side lay a narrow dark street, with jet manufactories or buildings where the work was carried on. Up on the bluff how different! High and breezy, though such a warm day, with the old ruins presently claiming our attention; and a little nearer the sea, the old parish church, in its setting of green, thickly sprinkled with graves. We first spent some time on the edge of the cliff, looking out over the North Sea. On this side it descends steeply and sharply down to the water. A narrow foot-path leads along the summit, and it needs a tolerably steady head, we find, to walk there and look down into the sea below, perpetually dashing and fretting itself against the rocks, and then, in its anger, spending itself in the white foam that overleaps its own fury. There is always something fascinating in watching Old Ocean, even on such a calm day as this, when far off in the distance there is only the tremulous glitter and sheen upon the sea-glass mirror, dotted here and there with passing sails, and nearer to us the waves are one after another rolling over and over, as in sport, each trying to catch his fellow before him, and each in turn breaking, foiled and crest-fallen upon the beach, or tumbling in a snowy mass over a huge rock. We could spend the day here without wearying, but we must not forget the more special purpose for which we came, so we wend our way across the summit of the bluff, and round by the other side, only to find the entrance to the abbey grounds is gained on one side nearer to the town.

Passing through the entrance-gate, and paying at the lodge the sixpence demanded for admission to the grounds, we are led up a flight of steps, and another gate is unlocked to let us through. Here rise the ruins directly before us, beautiful in their picturesque, yet giving one the tinge of sadness always felt in witnessing the ravages of time and man, for both have had a share in this work of destruction. These ruins are of the Abbey Church, which dates from the twelfth century, all buildings of St. Hilda's time having been destroyed during the inroads of the Danes, from which this eastern coast suffered more severely than any other part of England. The greater part of the north wall, with the transept, the east end of the choir, and part of the west end, including a portion of the tower and two doorways, are all that remain of the building, save a few portions of columns inside. The arches of windows and doorways are very beautiful, as are the pillars of grouped columns, looking almost variegated in coloring even now. We sit down on some of the stones inside the sacred limits, for so they seem. Over yonder is a young woman sketching a ruined window; would that we possessed her skilful brush! Then we climb the broken steps leading up above the doorway, and seat ourselves to gaze over the old town and across the river to the bluff beyond, crowded with buildings, the newer and more fashionable part of the town. Far off to the east and north sparkle the waters of the North Sea, and to the south and west stretch green, undulating fields, dotted with houses here and there, the river Eak winding down between, to lose itself in the ocean. Then, outside the walls again, seating ourselves in their shadow on the grass, to muse over the history and legends of the place. Listen to the summer sounds filling the air! the hum of insects, the twitter of birds, far off the crowing and cackling of cocks and hens! These all are features unchanged since the day of the poet, on whom our fancy dwells, who walked these hills and listened to these sounds; looking out upon the same expanse of water, both in its summer calm and beauty, and in its winter storms and fierceness; plying, perchance, the boat back and forth upon the river down here below the hill. Then, worshipping God upon the site of this old ruined church, though not within these veritable walls, till all this grew into his heart and life, and while he was musing thus in his heart, the fire burned within and he spake those words of glowing imagery that have come down to us through the ages. Do we realize, too, what his "paraphrase" of Holy Scripture meant in those far-off days? How in the scarcity of copies of Holy Writ, and those in a tongue known only to the learned or monks, this history in the familiar language of the common people, repeated from mouth to mouth, would grow so well known to them, and be to many almost the only knowledge they possessed of sacred history. What wonder, then, that we should love to recall and dwell upon this portion of our early history!

At length, for time is passing, we retrace our steps, carrying away a few photographs to recall the place, down again through the steep, quaint old streets, across the river, where we have to pause in the centre of the draw-bridge, amid a motley crowd of fishermen and sailors, women and children, while a boat passes down the stream. Along the wharf on the opposite side, looking into some of the jet shops, and making a few purchases, then up the steep road, one cannot call it street, ending in a flight of steps, to the bluff above. How different this from the one just across the river! Fine hotels and pleasure grounds stand here on the very edge, well kept roads leading down to the beach below, crowded with pleasure-seekers. It is pretty to sit and watch them as we do for a long time, from a little pavilion half-way down the beach, the children playing in the sand, and the waves just as full of life and motion here as on the further side of the river. Back from the bluff rise the modern houses, pleasant and attractive, but not half as interesting as the quaint, older portion. What a scene of sharp contrast all this is, to Caedmon's day, and the wild, uninhabited land his eyes rested on. Could he have foreseen all this that we look on now, would he have believed it possible?

But time urges us to hasten our meditations, as our train will not wait, and we slowly pursue our way to the station, and through the gathering dusk and between the darkening hills, speed back to York.

NOTE.—By a slip of the pen, or through carelessness, and not discovered till too late, a mistake was made in the paper on Ely. Instead of saying the Abbey at Holy Island or Lindisfarne was "presided over by the revered and saintly Hilda," the writer should have said "the revered and saintly Cuthbert."

THE PRINCESS BEATRICE.—HER WEDDING.

On the Tuesday before her wedding, Princess Beatrice received a very special present.

It consisted of a massive silver tea and coffee service, with tray, with the monogram, "H.B.," beautifully engraved on each article, the tray bearing the following inscription in Hebrew:

"Many daughters have acted virtuously, but thou excellest them all. May He Who dwelleth on high cause His light radiantly to shine on thy head. May joy and gladness meet thee; the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride. May there be peace within thy walls and tranquility within thy palaces, for now and forevermore, is the fervent prayer of him who reverentially bows down himself."

MORIS MONTEFIORE, 5645 A.M."

The Laureate also contributed the following Epithalamium:

TO H.R.H. PRINCESS BEATRICE.

Two suns of love make day of human life,
Which else with all its pains and griefs and deaths
Were utter darkness—the one the sun of dawn
That brightens thro' the mother's tender eyes,
And warms the child's awakening world—and one
The latter rising sun of spousal love
Which from her household orbit draws the child
To move in other spheres. The mother weeps
At that white funeral of the single life.
Her maiden daughter's marriage; and her tears
Are half of pleasure, half of pain—the child
Is happy—'s'n in leaving her! But thou,
True daughter, whose all-faithful, filial eyes
Have seen the loneliness of earthly thrones, Wilt neither quit the widow'd Crown, nor let
This latter light of love have risen in vain,
But moving thro' the mother's home, between
The two that love thee, lead a summer life,
Sway'd by each love, and swaying to each love
Like some conjectured planet in mid-heaven
Between two suns, and drawing down from both
The light and genial warmth of double day.
July, 1885.

TENNIS.

At the end of the wedding service, instead of the usual homily read on such occasions, the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered the following address to the royal couple:

"Oh well is thee and happy shalt thou be" is the promise of the marriage psalm. Happy may ye be is the meaning which gleams under every symbol, color, and wreath, and peals and ripples in the voices of the organ and of the bells. Gift after gift, every blessing of earth and heaven is named in our marriage service. It is a very charter of happiness. All these gifts come earliest and stay longest for those to whom wedded life is the perfection of friendship. All friendship is nearness in thought and taste and feelings and habits; married happiness is friendship in perfection. God would rather lead by joy than by sorrow. He often reunites by sorrow hearts which have carelessly allowed some bitterness to come between them. By sorrow he purifies still more the purest and tenderest hearts. Yet the service proclaims to us from first to last how much he loves to work by joy for those who take joy aright. At first it is only by constant sacrifice that each becomes the devoted friend of the other; but when such mutual sacrifice grows perfect it is no sacrifice. Then both hearts are free and able to dedicate all their spirit and wealth to the service of all high purpose. One there is—One only—Who can be the third in this perfect friendship. He, the Confidant, Counsellor, Comforter for each, make them all in all to each other by being all in all to both. He it is Whose first act of kindness above humanity was to stand in the marriage hall in Cana of Galilee silently working as a bridegroom's friend, and making earthly joyousness complete just as it was on the point of breaking down, yet in the same act teaching how the weak elements of earthly gladness can be transformed into the strength and joy of Heaven.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD.

TO H. N.

Little white robed curly head,
Knelling down by snowy bed,
Nightly prayers had softly said,
Asking for his "daily bread,"
While he prayed, "Thy will be done
By all dwellers 'neath the sun,
As by those in Heaven above,
Bound to each with bands of love."
Thinking then, with knitted brow,
Of some puzzling "why or how,"
Turning to me, gravely said:—
"Papa, tell me, why for bread
Should I ask at even prayer,
Or for food have any care,
When I lay me down to sleep
Asking God my soul to keep?
For I say, 'Give us this day'
When 'tis night I kneel to pray.
Seems to me, I'd better ask
Help to do the morrow's task
Than to pray for bread to eat
'Ere another sun we greet."
Smiled I at the puzzled brow,
Thinking of this "why and how:"
Gently stroked the sunny hair
With its golden color rare,
Shading dreamy, thoughtful eyes,
Catching shadows from the skies,
"Little white robed, curly head
When you ask for daily bread,
'Tis no selfish prayer you say
And 'tis always somewhere day.
When you pray 'Give us this day'
Daily bread, you mean to pray
'Give thy children, everywhere;
Food in answer to my prayer.'
When you lay down to sleep
Asking God your soul to keep,
It is day in heathen lands—
China's shores and Afric's sands.
So you ask for God to give Heathen children bread to live;
Bread that cometh down from Heaven,
Food that Christ Himself hath given.
Day by day you ask this food,
Heavenly Manna, pure and good,
Give to us this daily bread
Morn and Eve, let it be said:
For 'tis always somewhere day
And you therefore humbly pray
For God's children everywhere
When you say your evening prayer.

"Our Mission Work" of the Diocese of Albany.

A PHILANTHROPIST.

BY H. E. GEORGE.

"What are you doing, Stephen? Is the Squire going to let this charming residence to summer-boarders?"

An indolent looking boy had been leaning against a post for several minutes watching the proceedings of a lively young carpenter, who was knocking the cleats off a bundle of shingles, and making other preparations for repairing the roof of a small and dilapidated house.

"Is that you, Snaily?" asked the young man addressed. "You scared me some. Ain't you got nothing to do but ask questions this fine day?"

"Plenty to do, when the time comes," answered the boy, kicking a bundle of books which he had thrown on the grass, "but there's half-an-hour yet to find out what you're about before school-time."

"Well, I ain't got half-an-hour to answer you in, but if you want to know what I'm mending this roof for, it's to make it fit for Mis' Ruggles to live in."

"Whew! is that so?" said the boy with a bright look of interest which greatly changed his dull, but good-natured face. "I'm glad that, though it isn't much of a place. Why I heard she had to go on to the Farm. Does the Squire give her the rent of it?"

"I'll tell you how 'tis," replied Stephen Manners, suddenly confidential. "The Squire wouldn't own up to it, but he's got a big insurance on his barn, that was struck by lightning, and 'long as it was that set Mis' Ruggles's house on fire he felt kinder streaked about it, mean as he is. The barn was filled with second crop meddar hay, not half cured, and that gets heated sometimes and draws the lightning you know. I found out by one of them insurance men that the Squire was going to make quite a speck on his barn burning up, and it riled me awful to think of that poor widdler loosing everything by what put money in his pockets. So I walked right up to him and told him, I'd give the work on this place to make it decent if he'd pay for the materials and give her the rent of it for a year. So agreed. I'm sort of a cousin of hers, you know, so it's no more than right I should do something."

"You're a real brick, Stephen, that you are, a regular philan—what's the word?"

"You're the one that's philandering now," said Stephen, abashed by the praise, "and I guess I'd better be about my business and stop wasting time."

"Philanthropist, I mean, I had it in my spelling-lesson and it means one who loves his fellow-men. You know Peter Cooper, he was one, spent his whole time doing some good thing. I wish I was one, and had lots of money, as he had."

"Oh get out!" cried Stephen good-naturedly, "as if a fellow couldn't do a little tinkering for a neighbor without tacking such a long word on to it," and he mounted his ladder whistling "Down in the Coal-Mine."

"But Stephen, see here! Can't I help?"

"Be off to school!"

"But I mean it! Can't I do something?"

"Why yes, if you like," answered Stephen turning around. "Get around here after school, and I'll keep you busy until sundown."

"Does she know what you're doing?—Mrs. Ruggles?"

"No," replied Stephen with a grin. "So you keep dark. It's to be a surprise."

So Oliver Green, usually called "Snaily" by his comrades, turned and crept like his name-sake, "unwillingly to school." He would never have gone of his own free will; it was there that he had earned his nickname, for though not remarkably quick in his motions, he had very good natural abilities, and if anything interested him, was as wide-awake as most boys. But nothing which came along every day seemed "worth while." He was always dreaming about great things, but he could see nothing great in his daily tasks. Perhaps if he had been able to stand at the head of his class he would have enjoyed school. But he was not satisfied with an average standing, so he fell far below it, and began to be called a dunce.

It was one of Oliver's good points that he always felt for any one in trouble; and Mrs. Ruggles, burnt out of house and home, had been very much on his mind. The people in the village were not hard-hearted; they were sorry for her, but they were not very liberal, and it was no one's business in particular. The "town" would help her, and nobody seemed to realize that a woman who had always owned her little home and been independent would rather die than be "thrown on the town."

Oliver studied over it all day, and had several good plans in his head. One was to ask his mother for her old cooking-stove, just replaced by a new range; and to beg from his aunt a superfluous table; and to mend some chairs which had been put up in the garret.

But all these good plans did not help his lessons, and when three o'clock came he acknowledged to himself that he had but narrowly escaped being kept in.

It was great fun helping Stephen, who was good-nature itself, and first-rate company, and who was besides hopeful of getting others interested in his unfortunate relative. So he assented gladly to all Oliver's plans.

"I declare you're a good fellow, Oliver," he cried, when he heard of the cooking stove. "I've been trying to figure on it how she'd keep-house without her things, for she didn't save much beside her bedding and such like. I don't see how you come to take such an interest though."

"Oh, didn't I tell you I wanted to be a philanthropist," cried Oliver gaily. "But really don't you think everybody ought to turn to and help her? She's always lived here, and been a good neighbor."

"Well, so they ought, that's a fact," replied Stephen. "Folks are awful

"Hallo! who's going to address the meeting? Don't be backward about coming forward!"

Oliver mounted the stone.

"Give us your philanthropy, with two ls!"

"Philanthropy's good. We'll take two plates of philanthropy."

Manners is shingling that little house of Squire Morris's, and she's to have the rent of it for one year, and I just want to know why we fellows can't do something to help her!"

"Sartin!" cried one of the noisy big boys, Bob Martin. "I'll write a check in a minute!"

slow about thinking of it, that's what's the matter. If anybody could give it a shore now! But you see I'm just near enough kin, so I can't."

"Suppose I try to get the boys started?" said Oliver. "They could all tell their folks and get them interested, and if we have good luck we'll give her a house-warming with a vengeance!"

"Try it on!" said Stephen.

"We can't do less than give folks a chance to do something."

After studying the subject all night, Oliver got up this poster, which he fastened on the tree near the school-house gate and just inside the yard:

NOTICE!!

"All the fellows in the upper room are invited to meet after school by the big stone, to discuss a philanthropic plan."

Oliver could not resist bringing in his favorite word. He thought it was exactly the thing, but he unfortunately had not time to look it up. The notice had the effect desired, and at three o'clock he saw the whole room move in a body toward the appointed spot. He began to feel a little tremulous and uneasy.

"HE HEARD WILL GAY'S 'FOR SHAME, MARTIN!' AS HE DREW BOB OFF."

"Shut up!" began Oliver. "How am I to speak?"

"Silence in the court!" cried one of the disturbers.

"Oh, be done, fellows! Let's hear what he's got to say," interrupted a pleasant-looking fellow, Will Gay by name. "Go on, Oliver."

"I wanted to remind you about the fire last week. You know how Mrs. Ruggles was burnt out? Well, Stephen going to have a game of ball?"

"I!" was heard on all sides, and Oliver found himself deserted by all but Will Gay and one or two of the smaller boys.

"Never mind; don't be dumpish, O!" said Will, as he saw how crestfallen Oliver was. "It is a good idea, and we can do something about it. Let's go to all the people who ought to be interested and see what we can do."

"Make it a good big one, Bob; it won't be any harder to get five hundred cashed than ten."

"No; but what do you mean, O!" asked Will Gay. "How can we do anything?"

"I don't know just what you can do, but I'm going to do something," and he told about the cooking-stove.

"That's good; I've got some chickens. How would it do to give her a pair of them?" asked Will.

"First-rate! And you can all get your folks to help. It's a shame not to do something for a good woman like that, who has had such misfortunes!"

"Hear! hear!" cried Bob. "Listen to the great philanthropist with two ls! Who's

This plan was agreed upon and succeeded very well indeed. Barrels of apples and potatoes, and other stores were promised, and smaller contributions of money furnished various groceries. The boys built a nice warm hen house near a stable which stood on the grounds, and chopped a goodly pile of wood which one farmer contributed.

It was very exciting as time went on and the repairs of the house approached completion. This took some time, for Stephen had other work engaged and could not work steadily; but he often reported to the boys with a suppressed chuckle which a stranger might have thought heartless, that Mrs. Ruggles, who with her children had taken refuge with his mother, was getting "awful uneasy."

If the other boys heard rumors of all these doings they showed no signs of repentance, but amused themselves every day with tormenting Oliver all they could; in fun of course, but it was exasperating enough too. Bob Martin especially exerted himself in this way.

At last the day of the intended surprise came. There was everything to do, and the time from three until six would be needed, every moment of it, to get all in readiness for evening, when it was agreed that Stephen should bring Mrs. Ruggles to her new home.

Bob Martin was Oliver's seat mate, and he seemed determined to be as tormenting as possible that day. He led Oliver on a wild goose chase by pretending to help him with his sums and telling him an entirely wrong method. He hid his geography, which ought to have been learned the night before, and in the spelling class, he prompted him wrongly and got him so confused that poor Oliver was kept in—this day of all days, to learn his lessons over again.

"Spell it with two Is, Snailly dear! It will come all right!" was Bob's parting injunction, as he left the room.

Oh dear! how provoking it was. Oliver was fairly boiling over with wrath. He had meant to study so hard, and now it seemed almost impossible to think of anything, he was so completely upset. He heard Will Gay's "For shame, Martin!" as he drew Bob off, and wished that he could thank him. Yes, Will was a good fellow! And then he began to wonder how much of their plan could be accomplished without him; the stove was to be set up and blacked, and various odds and ends collected.

Distracted with these ideas, he was nearly an hour over the postponed tasks; but they were done at last, and he shoved his books into his desk with impatience, when he noticed on the floor a letter. It was addressed to Mr. Martin, and registered; evidently it contained money, and Bob had dropped it.

"What a wax he must be in!" thought Oliver; and then: "I'm glad of it! He deserves to be bothered a little after the dance he led me to-day."

"One who loves his fellow-men," whispered Conscience, "would carry this letter to him."

"It's a mile up there," answered Oliver to this inward suggestion.

"No matter," answered Conscience; "he may think he has lost it on the road. If it were Will Gay you would!"

"Will Gay hasn't made life a burden to me for two weeks!" retorted Oliver.

"If ye forgive not men," began Conscience.

"I'll go!" answered Oliver, and no one would have called him "Snailly" as he sped away.

Bob was starting out from home, and Oliver met him. "Oh!" he cried, with a gasp of relief as he saw the letter. "Where did you find it? I have just remembered it, and was awfully frightened!"

Oliver told him how he had picked it up on the floor, and Bob thanked him overwhelmingly, but without any embarrassment.

"He didn't mean anything by his teasing. I'm glad I didn't notice it!" was Oliver's inward comment.

"Just wait until I hand it to father, and then I've something to show you," and Bob rushed off, and rushed back again before Oliver could speak. "Now come on; I meant to keep it till evening; but since you are here—" and Bob led the way to the barn, where was tied up the prettiest little Jersey heifer ever seen.

"It's from us other fellows, and our folks," he explained. "We didn't mean to let you do all the philanthropy and the philandering—not a bit! We've got lots of other stuff, too; and here comes the procession—thanks to you, I can go with an easy mind!"

Here did come the procession—big boys and little boys, with all kinds of funny packages, and Bob led off with the cow, and they moved on down to the little house. Will had managed to put the stove up, and everything was ready, with the help of the "women folks," who were interested in the good cause.

Such a jolly house warming as it was! The table was set full of goodies, by the aid of the boys' mothers; and all the neighbors were there to show their good will.

Perhaps Mrs. Ruggles had thought them unsympathizing, but she was deceived now. She could not say much— who could, with fifteen or twenty noisy boys around? But the happy tears which filled her eyes, and the smiles on her lips were thanks enough. And she will never forget it, or let her children forget it, she says, as long as she lives.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1885.

THE Bishop of Rochester has written a letter on Disestablishment to his diocesan conference, which will be likely to weigh with the laity. Taking his own diocese, Dr. Thorold specifies three districts, in which, he says, "forty of the churches could not be maintained in case of disestablishment." He names nine or ten localities in South London where in such an event, pew-rents would be simply impossible. He says the stipends of fifty-six curates are supplied, and he is confident that in case of disestablishment their support would not be forthcoming.

The Bishop of Rochester is not unacquainted with the workings of the voluntary system in this country, and is well aware that its greatest defect is its failure to provide for the poor in large cities. The few chapels that are carried on are maintained at much expense by the laity, while the burden would be great, not to say unbearable, if the poor were adequately provided for. Under the voluntary system, public worship must be maintained whether among rich or poor, by that portion of the community which is sufficiently interested in religion to make the needed sacrifices. That is to say, it falls upon a part to provide public worship for the whole, and this in the larger towns and cities is very inadequately done, and is likely to be, under the voluntary system.

ADJECTIVES AND TITLES.

The Church of Ireland is emphasizing its Protestantism, as appears from this astonishing canon, recently adopted: "There shall not be any cross, ornamental or otherwise, on the communion-table, or on the covering thereof, nor shall a cross be erected or depicted on the wall or other structure, behind the communion-table, in any of the churches or other places of worship of the Church of Ireland."

In connection with this it is curious to note its constant protest against being called "Protestant Episcopal." The primate is very earnest in his assertion that its true and only title is the "Church of Ireland," and the Archbishop of Canterbury has apologized to him for calling it "Protestant Episcopal."

This apparent contradiction is, after all, entirely correct. It is not necessary to insert in a title all the qualities of the thing named. And this applies to all qualities equally. In the creeds the Church is called one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. But these are qualities, not names.

This is an important distinction. Adjectives are descriptive, not distinctive. Names are distinctive, and only by intimation descriptive. If description enters into a title, it implies that there may be another thing of the same kind without that quality.

To illustrate: The Church is catholic or universal. She has the quality, that is, of catholicity, universality. It is necessarily her quality. She cannot exist without it. So, too, she is protestant against error, always and everywhere. She is episcopal, she is one, she is holy, she is apostolic. All these qualities are her essential qualities. The terms are descriptive of her. But they do not distinguish her from any other Church, as they would do, by implication at least, if they were put in her name. If, for instance, the Church is given the title of the "Catholic Church," or the "Episcopal Church," by all rules of language, the implication follows that there is, or may be, an Un-Catholic Church, or a Non-Episcopal Church.

The simple fact therefore is that the only possible distinctive name of the Church, which is called kuriaké, Church, after her Lord, is that which comes from her existence in, and association with, different political entities. This is the Scriptural use. Thus the Church of Thyatira, for instance, is named. So the primate of the Irish Church is right in claiming that her only title is and must be the Church of Ireland.

"A VAGUE CHRISTIANITY."

Wonderful are the ways of the popular preacher. One accounted among the greatest—in Chicago—has for a decade or more been on a long quest of the fair haven of peace, and, as he thinks, not in vain. The discovery which he thinks so good for him he hopes will be found as good for other men, and so he eagerly urges upon them "a vague Christianity," whatever that may be. He, at least, has no doubts as to its peace-producing power, and so he says, "Only in a vague Christianity can you find peace." And this assurance we find commended with apparently no doubtfulness as to its worth and wisdom. Strange to say, in religion, that, somehow, is thought to be productive of peace which would not be in anything else. How, it might well be asked, can a man find peace in religion in that which in anything else is destructive of peace? Suppose the title to his estate is in question, and his lawyer says, "I am altogether in doubt in the matter, but that need not trouble you; only in a vague legal opinion can you find peace." Or suppose his child to be in pain and peril, and his physician should say, "I am wholly uncertain as to his case, but that need not worry you, for in a vague medical science only can you find peace."

It would surely seem that a common sense which is quite sufficient for the rejection of absurdity in ordinary matters might protect men as readily from absurdities uttered in the name of religion. Christianity, indeed, promises peace. But is it in vagueness, doubt, uncertainty? Manifestly not; certainly not, if the assurances of the first heralds of the Faith are to go for anything. The Founder of our Faith offered men peace, but certainly not in "a vague Christianity." The peace that He offered was to be found in Him. But that involved acknowledgment of His august claims, and therefore acceptance of what He did and said and was. The only peace that He had to offer was in Him. The epistles of the great Apostle to the Gentiles abound in thanksgivings for the blessings of peace, the peace of God which passeth all understanding. But whence was it? Was it in "a vague Christianity?" Only imagine the assurance of this popular preacher inserted in one of St. Paul's epistles. How utterly incongruous it would be with St. Paul's teaching and the whole cast of his thought and feeling. Who could think of him, or any other apostle, saying "Only in a vague Christianity can you find peace." It is unthinkable. And yet peace, the Christian's peace, was ever in the thought of the apostle. But wherein was it? He says: "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing." And that which he commended to others was that wherein he himself found peace. When at last he went out to die his glorious death he said, with the cry of a conqueror: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the Faith."

Manifestly then, in that day as in this, there was a Faith to keep, and that he had kept it was, in the hour of death, to St. Paul occasion of solemn yet glad thanksgiving. In saying, "Only in a vague Christianity can you find peace," the popular preacher may indeed have the plaudits of those who have lost faith or who are fast losing it, and of those who never had any to lose; but, whatever may be his belief, no intelligent man can think that a "vague Christianity" was that which Christ taught or that which His apostles preached. The fact of the matter is, that a "vague Christianity" is no Christianity at all. It exists only in the minds of the thoughtless and in the imagination of men that dream.

SINGULARITIES OF THE REVISION.

It would seem to be capable of demonstration that the Westminster company of the revisers of the New Testament were actuated by a strong Presbyterian bias. In every possible way they made their revision speak in favor of parity in the Christian ministry contrary to the judgment of history and the rules of scholarship, and by some means, still to be explained, they would seem to have effectually hoodwinked the Church of England members of this company to their subtle schemes and to the evil of them. But attention is at last roused, and on the records of the Convocation of Canterbury may now be seen a numerous signed petition against the revision on this very ground. It is easier to destroy the serpent's eggs than to strangle the serpent itself.

We have already spoken of the fondness of the revisers for the word "appoint" in reference to the Christian ministry instead of the word "ordain." It is clearly a word on which they desire to have changes rung, for they translate no less than five different Greek words by it, and one of them in Acts xiv. 23, where the word used is not only rendered "ordain" in Wickliff's, Tyndall's, Cranmer's, the Geneva and Rheims versions, but is a hellenistic Greek term, which in the early ecclesiastical writers, as in Justin Martyr and the apostolic canons, has the technical sense of "ordain" or setting apart to the ministry. But "appoint" was the favorite word with the continental reformers and John Knox, and we all know how Wesley "appointed" Dr. Coke to be Superintendent of the Methodists in this country, and so "appoint" must be the word in the revision. The revisers could hardly believe in ordination at all, not even in the "leather-mitten" ordination of their New England brethren.

We have before seen with what defiance the revisers, ignoring all rules of grammar and of Greek, eliminated an order of the ministry from the apostolic council at Jerusalem. With the same ease, when they wished, they could put "bishops" into the text in the place of "overseers," but it is done to disparage the order and to enable it to be spelled with a small "b." St. Paul, himself a Bishop, exhorts the elders of the Ephesian Church to "take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers." In an earlier verse these overseers had been called presbyters, but it would gain a point and confuse the minds of men, if they should be now called bishops, with an implication that they were the same then that modern bishops now are, and it was done. It would seem to be a characteristic of puritanism to juggle with a text and to adapt it to times and emergencies. Even Baxter, in his Saint's Rest, before 1660, in the times of usurping Cromwell, had it printed with "parliament of heaven" instead of "kingdom of heaven," and put some of the regicides in it for saints; but after the restoration the regicides were dropped out of his heaven, and the "kingdom of God" took the place of his heavenly parliament. The revisers would seem to have juggled with the New Testament in the same way, and to have rendered portions of it in a manner to bolster up a presbyterian theory scarce three hundred years old, instead of following the old lines of scholarship and Christian truth. Their object is defeated by its exposure, but no less are the shame and disgrace. The Bible alone is the religion of Protestants in their motto, but they would inject their own commentary into the Bible itself.

THE MERCERSBURG MOVEMENT AND CHURCH UNITY.

III.

The success of measures of purification in the Reformed Church in the United States has of course still further increased its vigor as a denomination. Among other things that success has promoted the revision of its constitution, with the expectation that it will thereby "add greatly to its strength, and insure its future peace and prosperity." This task cannot be completed before 1890, though a full draft is under consideration. It is therefore enough to say, at this point, that there are indications, on the one hand, of a closer conformity to the American type of presbyterianism, in the importance likely to be given to the classis, or presbytery, and, on the other hand, of the formal establishment of the Apostle's Creed as the doctrinal test of fitness for church-membership, of a general advance towards liturgical worship, and of the universal observance of the Christian year.

A very striking proof of new corporate energy is to be found in the effort of the Reformed Church to "erect her denominational standard" outside of Christendom. She had long aided other Christians, both with money and with men, in the task of carrying Christianity to the heathen, but the first step toward a mission of her own seems to have been taken in 1873, and her first missionary sailed (to Japan) in 1879, after the appointment of the Peace Commission. This enterprise is naturally expected to develop denominational life at home, and in every way lessens the probability of an early disappearance of the German Calvinistic variation of American Christianity. But if we are to have diversity in unity this matters little, and we may be thankful for every fresh sign that the great missionary impulse inherent in our religion is still powerful. And the shrewd Japanese are not likely to be amazed or amused by a new revelation of sectarianism, for the Reformed missionaries will at least be in friendly alliance with their Presbyterian brethren of several sorts, who have succeeded in organizing a united Church. The influence exerted in this country by the great German immigration on a communion of German origin, and the service which may be rendered to American Christianity by one in which both the traditions and the language of the fatherland are cherished, need only be mentioned. And while the growing interest in "practical Christian work," of which its own members are conscious, promotes its internal unity, it also brings it nearer to every other body of earnest Christians; the common "labor of love" is one of the greatest of unifying forces. Even controversy has tended to the same result, according to Dr. Gerhart, who believes that "zeal has been kindled and practical activity stimulated by christological and liturgical strides," pursued in the heat of conflict.

To the (German) Reformed Church, then, the Mercersburg movement has been a vital process, in which a living organism has vindicated its right to live, and its right to grow under its own law. Its future is more likely than before to be shaped by its past, both as to doctrine and worship. Its ministers will continue to affirm that they "honestly and truly hold the doctrines of the Keiddeberg Catechism to be scriptural," and continue to use the catechism in pastoral instruction. The liturgy which has cost them so much will have the highest claim upon them, while the historic right of free prayer, and very probably the historic right of pastoral confirmation, will long be claimed. Least of all will they risk their new-found peace and unity without the clear prospect of a firmer peace and nobler unity. But such a denominational development is not necessarily sectarian. Something like it may be found in other communions, in which there is, nevertheless, a hearty response to appeals for closer union among Christians. But the characteristic feature of the Mercersburg movement is that the historic forces which it called into action were not merely those of German Calvinism. It would not disown the Reformation, but it recognized the Middle Ages, and claimed descent equally from the Church of Hildebrand and Cyprian and St. Paul. And by virtue of its effort to possess and enjoy all true elements of the collective life of Christianity from the beginning, its aspect of denominationalism is only an incident of a general state of schism; it is itself a part of the "Catholic Revival," the more truly that it is in sympathy both with the Church of all time, and with the whole Church now. That its early leaders should have been witnesses, and even confessors for organic unity, was therefore natural. And we cannot but ask whether their representatives, and whether the movement as a whole, having done so much for a denomination, can do anything, or anything more for the Catholic Church.

Before answering this question we should try to answer another, namely, What is there to do? Most Christians have no definite answer, and our German brethren apparently have none. And there is, as there ought to be, a deep and widespread feeling that the restoration of unity must be pre-eminently God's work. But He seems to be actually doing it, through human agencies, as is His woot, and doubtless human leaders will appear to be His instrument in completing it. Now, most Episcopalians believe that the necessary leadership will be provided through an institution practically as old as Christianity, long universal, always dominant, in Christendom—the historical episcopate. And we are quite certain that no reunion can embrace Episcopalians which does not find its organic bond in episcopacy. Even those who think Presbyterian orders valid, would shrink from any step which must divide them from those who think otherwise, in a new schism, and must indefinitely postpone the wider reconciliation which shall unite all Christendom. It should, however, be remembered that our conviction primarily concerns orders rather than government, and that our own government (by conventions, or synods,) is quite as much Presbyterian as episcopal. For us, therefore, the solution of the problem turns first of all on the question whether other Christians are likely, on a large scale, to accept episcopal ordination on any terms. And the problem is simplified by the fact that, having security for the faith and sacraments, by which the Church exists, a majority of Episcopalians would probably consent that other Christians should make their own terms. Uniformity in worship, at all events, is not now, as it sometimes (not always) has been, thought essential to unity. Many proofs of this might be given; it is enough to cite a few of the generous words uttered at the "Jubilee Services" held in New York in October, 1882, by Dr. John Henry Hopkins: "We must recognize the equal validity, and permit the equal use, of a variety of liturgies." And for the "Protestant denominations" his single liturgical requirement seems to be, "the use of only valid forms in the administration of" Baptism and the Eucharist. If this means the use of the Lord's own ritual (which must be valid), nobody can think the requirement unreasonable. It was certainly as fit that at the recent congress Dr. Hopkins should close with words from the Book of Common Prayer, a series of devotions embracing forms from nine different sources, together with free prayer, and not embracing the Prayer Book, "as it is," as that he and Bishop Cox should resume on that platform the joint labors which did them such honor in the Christian Unity Society twenty years ago.

But the problem becomes still simpler if, for reasons already indicated, relating to the security of the Prayer Book, it be understood that congregations which do not take our liturgy shall neither owe subjection to, nor have representation in, the General Convention. As this would be safer for us, at present, it would also be more acceptable to others. For then denominations which, like the Reformed Church in the United States, are conscious of an intense denominational life, need not be asked to sacrifice it by disbanding. If any would consent to this in the certain prospect of a general reunion, none would consent to it for the sake of representation in the lower branch of our ecclesiastical legislature. Denominations may and should ultimately disappear, by a gradual assimilating process, but we may well be satisfied, now, with the disappearance of sects. The question is thus reduced to this form: Is there any denomination which is likely to permit its ministers to be ordained by bishops?

But as the problem itself grows simpler, the process of solution is simplified still more rapidly because the settlement of terms may be left to the two parties immediately concerned, the bishops and the candidates for a Catholic ordination. The internal interest of Protestant Episcopalianism being unaffected, the General Convention, which exists to protect those interests, would have no duty beyond acquiescence, silent or formal. This would be a great gain, for that body, very useful to us, has for at least thirty years done much more to hinder than to help the cause of Catholic unity. If it should consent to keep within its own province in the matter, the bishops would act, of course, not as a house, a co-ordinate branch of the General Convention, but in council, "as bishops in the Church of God." And they would not be bound to seek from other ecclesiastical legislatures a help which they did not seek from their own. Neither attempting nor desiring to withdraw any man from his denominational allegiance, simply making known to whom it might concern their willingness to give, on Catholic terms, a commission current everywhere, to be used anywhere, they could reasonably offend nobody. And it would be a very great gain to avoid interminable and probably useless negotiations with bodies which, in diplomacy, must be before all things take care of their own dignity. Our General Convention and the Methodist General Conference have each been waiting since the year 1868 for the other to speak first, the advantage in point of courtesy being on the side of the Conference, which assumed a listening posture at the instance of some of our clergy.

WM. G. ANDREWS.

CHURCH OF IRELAND "NOT" PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL,

On laying the foundation-stone of a parochial hall at Bray, the Archbishop of Dublin made the following observations on the title of the Church of Ireland:

"The minds of many Irish Churchmen were agitated at the present moment because of a question which had arisen with reference to the official designation of the Church of Ireland—as to whether in the future it should be called by the functionaries of the State the Episcopal Protestant Church, or, as in the past, the Church of Ireland. He was not surprised that much feeling should have been exhibited with regard to this matter, for it touched very closely all their hearts; but this he would say, that whatever the reasons might be—either of State expediency or State necessity—for this action, he trusted that every faithful member of the Church would never for a moment cease to regard and describe the Church as the Church of Ireland. In saying this he did not wish to speak in any tone of arrogance or offensiveness toward their fellow-countrymen of other denominations. The last thing he would wish to do would be to unchurch their brethren who did not follow them. He should be very sorry to place the members of the Roman Catholic Church outside the pale of Christianity—God forbid—or leave their brethren of the Presbyterian or other denominations who might not have bishops to what might be called the unconvocated mercies of God. But it would be admitted, he thought, by every student of history, whatever his position might be, that there existed, for seven hundred years after the advent of St. Patrick to these shores, a national independent Church in Ireland, which was not in any way subject to the authority of Rome. It would also be admitted by all that this Church was an Episcopal Church. He asked this simple question—was there any other body of Christians in Ireland, calling themselves a Church, that could claim at the present time to be free from any allegiance to Rome, and at the same time an episcopal Church? Again, it was admitted by all, he thought, whatever their views on the subject of episcopacy might be, that the bishops of the Irish Church by direct lineage are descended from the bishops of the ancient Church of Ireland. He would not enter into any question as regards what is called Apostolic Succession. He spoke now of historical continuity, and he asserted that as a matter of historical continuity it could not be denied that the bishops of our Church are descended by direct lineage from the ancient, independent bishops of the Church of Ireland. He believed it was the duty of every Churchman belonging to the Anglican communion to call our Church by its old title. Some time ago there appeared an address, signed by some of the Anglican bishops, in which our Church was called the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland. He was very much grieved when he saw it, and he took the opportunity of remonstrating, through the present Archbishop of Canterbury, who told him that it was an entire inadvertence on his part; that none of the bishops would wish for a moment to describe our Church by that name, and that, so far as he was concerned, and those with whom he was associated, the mistake would never occur again. If they took their stand on the grounds he had mentioned, he thought it concerned them comparatively little what the State might think right to call them. Irish Churchmen had already in the synod protested against being described by any other name than that of the Church of Ireland. But they could not tell what might be the nature of the State necessities. It might be that some eminent functionaries of the State who sympathised with them, and who wished to describe them by their right name, might find themselves in a difficulty with regard to the title which they were to use when speaking of them in their official capacity. He did not believe it would be consistent with the dignity of the Irish Church to be over-agitated or over-indignant if it were found necessary in consequence of State difficulties for the State to term it by such a name as the Protestant Episcopal Church. They must not allow it to be thought for a moment that their claim to the title of Church of Ireland depended on what the State might say, or how the State regarded them. The State merely looked at Churches as established or not. The Presbyterian Church in Scotland was called the Church of Scotland, because it was established, and the episcopal Church of England was called the Church of England because it was established. These are the terms officially given to them; but each Church claimed the right of describing itself and regarding itself as that which it felt was most in accordance with its righteous claims. If they maintained in their consciences and convictions their claims to be called the Church of Ireland, and made it evident before the world that they were not merely depending on such arguments as he had used, but were also showing themselves practically able to meet the needs of the people of this land in which it had pleased God to cast their lot; then it mattered little what the State might call them."

THE AMERICAN CHURCH AND THE LAITY.

Dr. Richard F. Littledale thus pays his respects to the American Church and her regulations as to the laity :

"Unless and until a fresh revelation from heaven is vouchsafed, remodeling and relaxing the actual charter of the Church, the clergy have absolutely no power to grant, and the laity no capacity to accept, the right of lay voting in synods on doctrinal or disciplinary questions ; though the whole range of finance, education, territorial distribution, patronage, and the like, covering a vast practical area, is fairly open to laymen.

"The question is thus, for Churchmen, not one of expediency at all (though even on that ground the case for the lay vote seems to me very weak, notably as there is no warrant, and no great likelihood, that the learned lay theologians would be the choice of the electors), but one of first principles, which cannot be violated without mischievous results in the long run.

"And it is not to be forgotten that the first precedent the other way was set a century ago by the American Church, at a time of great excitement, great temptation to follow seeming expediency and the analogy of Parliamentary government, and great unfamiliarity with theology, canon law, and Church history ; while the imitation of the American example in some of the colonial churches, and more recently in Ireland, has not furnished hopeful auguries in favor of the plan."

THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

This institution is to open on the 15th of September, the number of applicants having been unusually large. During the summer work has been going on in the dormitory buildings, which are now drawing near completion. The walls, the wood-work, etc., have been finished, and it is expected that the rooms will be in readiness for the students on the opening of the seminary.

During vacation the books have been removed from the old library to the new, the work being superintended by the assistant-librarian. The number of books is about 18,000, and that of the pamphlets from 8,000 to 10,000. The books and pamphlets have been placed for the time being in a room at the northeast corner of the new library building until the new alcoves are ready to receive them. This, it is expected, will be the case by the end of the month.

The work of cataloguing the books and pamphlets has been going on for about a year, and it will take about two years before the work is completed. The system now being pursued at Columbia College, viz. : of giving both titles and subjects, so as to get at the contents of a book on any given subject, is being largely followed. For instance, in cataloguing "The Fathers," what any or all may say on the subject of baptism will be so presented as to come at once under the eye of the student. It is intended that the work shall be thorough and exhaustive. By the first of October it is expected that 5,000 volumes will have been so catalogued and placed in the new alcoves ready for use. The shelves will receive the others as fast as the work goes forward.

It is much to be desired that the Library Fund may be increased. The fund at present barely yields $300 a year, and ought to be increased to at least $500. It is thought that the friends of the seminary can hardly do less than see a matter of such moment to the institution and to the Church at large carefully attended to and brought to pass. It should have been added that the shelves have been removed from the old library, which is now receiving a coat of paint, and is going to be made a refectory for the students. It is expected that the room will be in readiness by the time the seminary opens.

Ground has been broken on the southeast corner of the seminary grounds for a house to be occupied by the dean. It appears that in 1881 "The Samuel Verplanck Hoffman Foundation" was created by Mrs. Glorvina R. Hoffman, the Rev. Drs. Eugene A. Hoffman, and Charles F. Hoffman, of New York, with an endowment of $50,000, since increased to $100,000. Out of the interest "The Hoffman Fund" was created, to be used for the erection of a house for the dean, or a house for the "Eugene A. Hoffman" Professor of Pastoral Theology, or added to the endowment of the said professorship, to increase it to $75,000, as shall hereafter be directed by the donors. The sum of this fund some time since amounted to nearly $6,000, and now amounts, probably, to $8,000 or $10,000, and by the time the house is completed will have reached the two or three thousand dollars additional and necessary to complete the building.

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOPRIC OF SALISBURY.—The English Guardian, in speaking of the appointment of Mr. Wordsworth, uses very favorable language and welcomes the appointment. It says, however, with regard to the non-appointment of Canon Liddon : "For years past the exclusion of the foremost English Churchman from the episcopate has been a growing scandal, but it has been commonly explained, or explained away, on the supposition that he was reserved for this particular see. It is possible, no doubt, that the bishopric was offered to Dr. Liddon before it was offered to Mr. Wordsworth, but it is in the highest degree unlikely. The reasons which move a minister to do a popular act do not ordinarily consist with his hiding it under a bushel. If, as is most probably the case, it has not been so offered, the omission—with whomsoever the responsibility rests, a point on which we have no knowledge, and consequently no opinion—deserves very grave censure." The Church Times, in a comment on the above, says : "We are enabled to state, with every confidence, that Dr. Liddon did not receive any communication from the Marquis of Salisbury, and that, had there been no change of ministers, the learned canon would have been nominated to the See of Salisbury."

THE COMING CHURCH CONGRESS.—The Church Congress is to be held at Portsmouth on October 6, 7, 8 and 9, and the programme has been completed. The chief subjects of discussion will be : "Evangelizing Agencies Supplementary to the Parochial System." "The Bearing of Christianity upon the Mutual Relations of the Rich and Poor, Employers and Employed." "The Attitude of the Church with respect to Movements in Foreign Churches." "The Doctrine of Holy Scripture and the Attitude of the Church in respect to War." and "The Social and Philanthropic Work of the National Church as a line of Church Defence." Among the readers and speakers are the Dean of Manchester and the Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale. Dr. Hale will speak on the Foreign Church Movements. The Bishop of Carlisle, the Deans of Manchester and Gloucester, and the Attorney-General are expected to address the workingmen's meeting, and the opening sermons will be preached by the Bishops of Carlisle, Ripon, and Derry.

There will be a special service in connection with the Congress in Chichester cathedral on October 10.

PROMINENT PERSONS ON DISESTABLISHMENT.—The question of disestablishment is becoming decidedly an agitating one in England. It will evidently play an important part in the coming elections. Prominent persons are making reference to the question in their public speeches and addresses.

The Bishop of Manchester, in the course of his remarks at the Anniversary Luncheon in connection with the Warrington Local Institution, said that he hoped the kindly feelings which existed between the bishops and clergy and the clergy and laity of all denominations in the three great dioceses of Manchester, Liverpool and Chester, would always be cordially maintained. There were, perhaps, dark and difficult days before the Church—to which, he supposed, they all, more or less faithfully, belonged—and he thought there was no other way of meeting those times than by promoting, so far as they could, the spirit of real and hearty unity between the clergy and laity, and by endeavoring to make the Church strong in the best sense of the word by rendering her most useful to the nation which it was her mission to serve. He had no other theory of Church defence than that. He had been asked recently to join a Church Defence Association. Up to the present he had kept aloof from them, thinking that the best defence of the Church was to be found in doing one's duty ; and although he still retained that belief, he was told that it was necessary to meet the charges brought against the clergy and the Church itself by persons who were only imperfectly informed, or who did not seem to care particularly to inform themselves much more accurately. He still, however, went back to his old principle that the bishops and clergy, whether dignified or undignified, had better be found at their posts, doing their duty where God in His providence had placed them. He confessed that there was a good deal too much running to and fro from place to place at the present time, and there was a danger that while they were running from one end of England to the other to congresses, and conferences, and central councils, and he need not say what besides, the special duties which God had given them to do in their own dioceses and amongst their own people might be neglected and left undone.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of a speech at Bristol made the following allusion to the question of disestablishment : "Some of us may be old-fashioned enough to think to-day that of all the wants of our common humanity there is nothing more important than some provision for religious instruction ; and yet, although Mr. Chamberlain suggests that the State shall provide almost everything for its members, he couples that proposal with the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England. The poorest classes throughout our land, in our great cities, in our country towns, in our rural villages, are to lose that spiritual and temporal help by which they have profited for so many generations, and all this on the ground of some fancied inequality between the Church of England and other religions congregations of the country. I think it will be some time to come before our great and grand Church is destroyed by such attacks as these. Let her but continue to do her duty—let her not continue to support herself as she is now supporting herself through the length and breadth of the land, and she will sustain safely and without harm these attacks of the Birmingham causers, all the more certainly because the sound of these attacks will but serve to rally defenders round about her."

The retired Bishop of Tasmania (Dr. Bromly) at the laying of the foundation stone of a church at Bicton, said: "We hear much of these days of an organized effort to spoil the Church of its possessions, its sacred buildings, and its endowments. It can never be too strongly urged that, with but a small exception in Queen Anne's reign and that of George III., these possessions were the voluntary gifts of her own sons, and are only national property so far as all property is national property. Two considerations only can justify the right of confiscation—either the consideration that they are used for the public injury, or that the trust held by the Church has been abused. The two millions of our agricultural population entrusted with the franchise for the first time, there surely can be no doubt, know what their loss would be if they were deprived of the gentle influences of the village parsonage and of the assured ministrations of the Church; but when I observe the parish church parcelled out for the benefit and comfort of the rich, to the exclusion of their poorer brethren, I can see where our most vulnerable part is to be found. It is the duty of the churchwardens of this new church will see, that all the parishioners are all accommodated. If there is room for all there is no law that I know of which prevents appropriation; but in such appropriation there should be no undue favoritism, for the church is the property of all alike, and if we rob our poorer brethren of their property we must not be surprised that the tenure of all other property will come to be disputed."

The Duke of Cleveland, in a letter to the London Times, says: "The disestablishment, meaning thereby the disendowment, would completely change the whole aspect of the English rural parishes, and it is difficult beforehand to predict what would be the effect wrought by such a change. I have no doubt that rural residences would be very much diminished in number, and residence in towns, especially in the metropolis and on the continent, must increase. There is little doubt that the English Church tends very much to bring together the English scattered over the continent. In every supposition the change in many respects would be disastrous. The Church exercises a most religious, civilizing and refining influence, and is most beneficial to the poorer and humbler classes. Its influence is derived from centuries of existence, and its destruction would be far-extending in its baneful effects."

SCOTLAND.

CONFIRMATION OF BISHOP KELLY'S ELECTION.—On Wednesday, August 19th, the College of Bishops unanimously confirmed the appointment of Bishop Kelly to be Coadjutor-Bishop of Moray, Ross and Caithness.

IRELAND.

THE NEW BISHOP OF MEATH.—The Bench of Bishops met at the Synod Hall, Dublin, on Wednesday, August 19th, to elect a Bishop of Meath, the diocesan synod having failed to elect. The diocesan synod sent up two names, the Rev. Dr. J. S. Bell, who received the largest number of votes, but not the requisite majority, and the Very Rev. Charles P. Reichel, Dean of Clonmacnois and Canon of St. Patrick's. On the bishops' voting, Dean Reichel was declared elected.

The bishop-elect of Meath was born in Yorkshire, and was graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1843. He is a member of the Senate of the University. He holds a prominent position in the Irish Church both for character and abilities. He has been Archdeacon of Meath, as well as Canon of St. Patrick's and Dean of Clonmacnois. He has published sermons on the Lord's Prayer, on the Prayer Book, and on the Origin of Christianity, besides several other works.

GERMANY.

BADEN-BADEN—All Saints' Church.—At this British Chaplaincy (the Rev. T. A. S. Whitte, chaplain), a solemn memorial service for the late General Grant was held on Wednesday, August 13th. The service opened with the hymn, "When our heads are bowed with woe," followed by the Litany, with special suffrages for the occasion. After the hymn, "Now the laborer's task is o'er," the chaplain proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion according to the American use, preaching from St. John, xi. 35. The church was appropriately draped and wreathed, and the congregation exhibited a great degree of solemn feeling.

A mission is at present in progress in the chaplaincy, conducted by the Rev. Sir James Erasmus Phillips and the Rev. Frederick Alexander Ormsby. In preparation for the mission a form of prayer was issued by the chaplain to be used occasionally at the intercessory services in the church, and recommended for daily private use by the members of the congregation at their homes.

The ordinary Church services of the chaplaincy are: Sundays, Early Celebration at 8:30; Morning Prayer, Litany and Celebration at 11 A.M.; Evening Prayer at 7:30 P.M.; Holy Days: Celebration at 8:30 A.M.; Morning Prayer at 11 A.M.; Daily Prayer at 11 A.M. Classes for religious instruction on Sundays, at 10 A.M.

CANADA.

LENNOXVILLE—Bishop's College.—The Rev. Thomas Adams, M.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge, has been appointed principal of this college, and rector of the college school. After graduating as a wrangler in 1873, at Cambridge, Mr. Adams was appointed senior mathematical master in St. Peter's School, York, a well-known English public school. After nine years' work at York, Mr. Adams was appointed, in 1882, first head-master of the High School for Boys, at Gateshead. This office he recently resigned to accept the principalship of Bishop's College.

Mr. and Mrs. Adams came out from England by the "Parisian," and landed in Quebec on August 29d, and were the guests of the Bishop of Quebec. On Sunday, August 29d, he preached in Quebec Cathedral. Mr. Adams is now settled at Lennoxville, with the view of preparing for the coming autumn term.

LOWELL—St. Anne's Church.—Some private members of this parish (the Rev. Dr. A. S. J. Chambré, rector), have employed Mr. Fred W. Stickney to prepare plans for an extension to the tower of the church. It is believed that the chimneys are not set at a sufficient altitude, and that if they could be raised twenty or thirty feet their melodies could be heard at a greater distance, while at the same time their reverberations would not be so loud in the street below. Accordingly, the plans in the hands of the architect contemplate an addition of over twenty feet to the tower.

RHODE ISLAND.

NEWPORT—St. George's Chapel.—On August 24th the bishop of the diocese laid the cornerstone of this chapel (the Rev. C. G. Gilliat, rector). When completed, the work of the chapel will be the continuation of the old parish of Zion church. Some time since it was determined to dispose of the land and building of Zion church, and the result was that a lot was selected on Rhode Island avenue for the erection of a chapel, which it is hoped will answer the purpose of the former one, which stood for fifty years on the old lot on Washington Square. The name of Zion church was dropped, and the chapel is to be named St. George's chapel, in memory of Bishop Berkeley. All the former rectors of Zion church were invited to the service, but only the Rev. E. H. Kettell was able to attend. There were present besides the bishop of the diocese and the rector, the Assistant-Bishop of New York, the Rev. Drs. R. J. Nevin, W. R. Huntington, D. J. Greer, and E. A. Bradley, and the Rev. Messrs. E. H. Kettell, G. H. Patterson, G. J. Magill, S. W. Moran, W. R. Trolter, R. B. Peet, S. S. Chevers, and G. P. Huntington. The clergy robed at the residence of Mr. Augustus Goffe, and, preceded by a choir of thirty men and boys, proceeded to the building site where the service of the laying of the cornerstone was held, the bishop conducting the service, assisted by the rector. The bishop made a brief address, referring to the work that Zion church had done, and hoping that St. George's might have a full measure of prosperity. The Assistant-Bishop of New York then made an address. He began by expressing the pleasure it gave him to have a share in services of such interest and importance, and congratulated the bishop of the diocese, and the rector and vestry of the parish on the wisdom and timeliness of the step they had taken. He called attention to the remarkable growth of the neighborhood in which the proposed church was to be erected, and then urged its importance to the permanent welfare of Newport. Referring to the early history of the town, he reminded his listeners how soon it was that its people sought the ministrations of the mother-Church of England, and how large an influence the first missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts had upon the subsequent prosperity of this city. "We can imagine," he said, "that instead of being here to lay the foundations of a church, we were here to lay the corner-stone of a college or a university. What interest such an event would awaken! What thoughts it could gather! What hopes it would awaken! And yet the work which we are doing to-day is of far mightier import and of far more lasting influence. Culture may do much for men, but at best it is the training of the mind, or the hand, in a cleverness which may as easily be exerted on the side of evil as of good. Mightier than education is the force that not merely educates, but regenerates and transforms, which involves motives and purifies character and lifts up society. And that force is the religion of Jesus Christ, incarnated in the Christian Church. It is to make here a new home and centre for that which alone can keep our social life pure and simple and make men honest and self-forgetful and believing that we have come to lay this stone to-day."

Letters were read from the old rectors of Zion church and other clergy, among them one beautiful letter of good wishes from the Rev. Dr. W. F. Morgan. The Bishop of Georgia was invited to be present, but was unable to do so.

A few hundred dollars are still needed to finish the building, after which, seating, furnishing, windows and heating will require the liberal aid of friends. Any donations sent to the rector, the Rev. Dr. C. G. Gilliat, will be acknowledged in THE CHURCHMAN.

ALBANY.

ALBANY—All Saints' Cathedral.—About half the work on the provisional portion of the new cathedral has been done. It is proposed to complete the provisional church, and the construction of the entire cathedral will be a question of the future. The work on the walls of the provisional building has been carried along about one hundred and thirty feet, half the length of the proposed structure. The walls of the eastern section, which includes the sanctuary, choir, choir aisles, choir vestry, and portions of the crossing and transepts, have already been raised to two thirds of their intended height. Pillars weighing sixty tons each and showing rich carving have been placed in position. A spiral staircase, composed of blocks of concrete, has been partially completed in one of the towers. The work of completing the provisional church, which will accommodate 2,000 persons, will be continued until present subscriptions of $100,000 have been exhausted. Ninety workmen are employed.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Receipts of the Domestic Missionary Committee.—According to the treasurer's books, the aggregate offerings (in all cases excluding specials which form no part of the revenue) for Domestic Missions was $218,888.27. This is largely in excess of any previous year, the largest amount in any previous year reaching $197,000. Not counting legacies, this sum has been exceeded only three times. Excluding every thing but offerings credited to the various dioceses and missionary jurisdictions, those for this year have been exceeded but once before. Last year over five hundred parishes contributed that did not contribute the year previous. Half of the dioceses and three-fourths of the jurisdictions have given more than last year. Of the remainder, about half are but slightly behind, and the great falling off is in two or three wealthy dioceses—New York and Pennsylvania being $7,000 behind last year. There is no debt, and the treasury is not collapsed through the deficiency. The receipts are about $15,000 less than the appropriation. When the secretary of the Domestic Committee assumed his duties there was a deficiency of over $17,000.

NEW YORK—Death of Miss A. U. Jones.—Miss Anna Uphur Jones died at her residence in this city on Saturday, September 5th, in the ninetieth year of her age. She was the daughter of the Rev. Clave Jones, many years ago rector of Trinity church, and the history of whose life she published after his death. Miss Jones left her entire fortune to the Theological Seminary at Fairfax, Va. The burial services were held in Calvary chapel on Monday, September 7th.

IRVINGTON—Death of the Rev. Dr. Tyng.—The death of the Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng occurred at this place about midnight, September 3d. The venerable clergyman had lived at Irvington ever since his retirement from the rectorship of St. George's church, in this city, in 1878. For a long time his faculties had been much impaired, and from this cause, together with the infirmities of old age, there was at last an inevitable and easy sliding away of life.

Dr. Tyng was born in Newburyport, Mass., in 1800, graduated at Harvard in 1817, engaged in business for a short time, when he entered upon the study of theology, and was ordained in 1821. For two years he was located at Georgetown, D. C., and afterwards in Queen Anne's parish, Prince George's County, Md. From thence he went to Philadelphia in 1829, and became rector of St. Paul's church. Four years later he assumed the rectorship of the Church of the Epiphany in this city, which he retained for twelve years. In 1845 he became rector of St. George's church, Stuyvesant Square, where he continued until his retirement. Dr. Tyng was one of the most eloquent and impressive preachers of his time, and he succeeded in building up one of the strongest and most influential parishes in this city. Under his rectorship the present magnificent edifice was erected and filled with perhaps the largest congregation in New York. The church carried on several important missions, while the Sunday-schools at one time numbered about 2,000 scholars. Dr. Tyng published several volumes, mostly of a devotional character. After thirty-two years of constant labor he resigned, and ever since has lived at his cottage in Irvington.

GARRISON'S—Clerical Retreat.—In accordance with the intimation contained in the letter addressed by the Assistant-Bishop of New York to the Advent Mission Committee, a Retreat will be held at Garrison's, N. Y., on October 13th, 14th, and 15th, 1885. The Retreat will be conducted by the Rev. W. Hay Aitken of England. It is justly regarded as an important feature in the spiritual preparation of the clergy for the coming Mission. The hotel at Garrison's will be utilized in which to lodge the participants. It is expected that a large number of the clergy, especially those of New York City, will be present. The names of the Rev. Thomas McKee Brown, D. Parker Morgan, and Thomas R. Harris, acting for the Mission Committee, are attached to the invitation tendered the clergy.

LONG ISLAND

BROOKLYN—Church of the Messiah.—This church (the Rev. C. S. Baker, rector), is undergoing very extensive alterations and repairs. From being one of the plainest in the city it is rapidly being transformed into one of the most beautiful. The entire chancel is undergoing a complete transformation. There is to be a large terra cotta porch at the entrance, and two large terra cotta towers, one of which is probably the largest in Brooklyn. The following description is given in the Brooklyn Union of September 1st:

The larger tower is on the right-hand side as a visitor passes the church. It is a dome, about thirty feet in diameter, and is built entirely of terra cotta. The roof is supported by a great number of small pillars, which rest on the masonry of the old brick tower. As the church stands on the hill, this immense tower is visible from all parts of the city, and its bright color makes it stand out in bold relief. The smaller tower is similar in shape and architectural design. It is on the opposite corner of the church, and is about one-quarter the size of its companion. The windows in the front of the church are surrounded by pretty designs in terra cotta. Just below the arch of the roof in the centre of the front wall is another very pretty design now almost completed.

Next to the large tower, the portal is the most attractive of the outside adornments. It is about twenty feet in height, and is supported by four pillars. It is reached by a short flight of steps, and has an inlaid marble floor. It is Romanesque in style, and is similar to the entrances of the old cathedrals.

As the visitor enters the vestibule of the church the scene is not very inviting. As yet very little has been done to improve the looks of this portion of the edifice. Mason's tools and other articles not at all attractive in appearance are strewn about. But as one steps within the inner doors the scene is certainly almost a transformation from what used to meet the eyes of the worshiper at the Church of the Messiah. The dingy, plain white walls have been changed by the application of tawny sombre hues lit up by plain gilt trimmings. The massive pillars have been gilded and the chancel has been completely renovated. Instead of the dingy, dark red carpet running down the centre aisle, Tennessee marble of many colors and designs, and highly polished, has been laid. About the chancel are new adornments in the way of Turcoman and Persian portières. There is a duplicate of Bouguereau's "Adoration" done upon metal, in wax colors, by Marcell. This is directly over the altar, and alone cost over $2,500. Under this is a panel by Morter, representing the Descent from the Cross. Two panels by Marcell, one on each side, complete the group, and the three are framed in mahogany.

A number of the plain windows on the side of the church have been replaced by memorial windows, which have been stained in London. The only one on the left side is at the window next to the last. Underneath is the inscription: "In memory of Lewis Morris, died October 23, 1883. He is not here, for he is risen." The first window on the right is inscribed: "I preach unto you Jesus Christ, and Him crucified. In memory of the Rev. Abijah Richardson, died April 30, 1876." The second window has for its inscription, "In memory of Luther Halsey Donaldson, died October 27, 1883. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." The third window, a particularly handsome one, is dedicated to John and Elizabeth Ann Wood, by their children: "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters." There is also a memorial window to perpetuate the memory of the Rev. W. H. Newman, the first rector of the church. Across the chancel is to be hung a silken scarf brought from Japan by Rear-Admiral Clitz, and presented to the church.

It will be a month yet before all the decorations are completed; but when finished, outside and in, the church will be one of the most beautiful in this city. Architect Robertson, of New York, who has charge of the improvements, is one of the best known artists in the country, and has been instructed to spare no expense in making the edifice a perfect artistic affair. The best workmen and the best materials only have been employed. As soon as the church is completed, the Rev. Charles E. Baker, the rector, assisted by the leading clergymen of this vicinity will formally reopen it. It is designed to build a new school building on the lot east of the church within a year.

ST. JOHN LANE.—Since the Rev. Dr. M. A. Bailey became, in February, pastor and superintendent of this institution, he has spared no pains to do what was possible to make improvements and get things in better shape. That he has accomplished much and is in fair way to bring to pass much else that he proposes, will be apparent to any one who takes the trouble to visit the community.

One of the most important and necessary things he has done thus far is to introduce water into all the cottages in the village. Hitherto the water, which was of inferior quality, was drawn from the one or more wells in the place, and at much inconvenience. By placing a frame with wind mill above the well, which was made a memorial to Dr. Muhlenberg, the water, which is of the best, is forced through iron pipes into the houses a quarter of a mile distant. A reservoir is being constructed on the hill to the west of the village, and this, if not large enough, will be followed by others. A pipe sunk to a depth of two or three feet has been taken to the top of the hill, and the supply of water is so abundant that it overflows at night and to some extent in the day. About midway between the mansion and the chapel, the superintendent proposes to place a fountain, to be covered, perhaps, by the handsome covered frame-work which stood over the memorial well. This covering had to be removed to make way for the large stones placed over the well, and forming a support for the frame of the wind-mill. The stones are in two courses, the lower course forming a hexagon twelve or fifteen feet in diameter. The entire cost of this work has been between $700 and $800.

Good work is now being done in the printing office, which is under the charge of the Rev. H. A. Fuller. About fifteen boys are employed, while there is room and work for a larger number. The printing at St. Johnland enjoys a high reputation, and the boys in due time are thoroughly qualified in the trade. They receive no wages, but at about seventeen years of age are sufficiently instructed in the business to obtain paying situations. From twenty to twenty-five of these boys could be employed were there sufficient accommodations in the way of lodgings, etc. They have been at work of late on a "Vade Mecum," prepared by the Rev. Sylvester Clarke, and to be published by Mr. T. Whittaker. They print, also, a little weekly paper called "The St. Johnland," and intended more especially to advertise the works and needs of the community.

The entire number of children connected with the community is one hundred and thirty-four, of whom seventy-six are boys and fifty-eight girls. For each of those children, except the boys engaged in type-setting, there is supposed to be paid by their guardians or someone interested in them, one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year, when they are supplied with clothing. There are not a few cases, however, in which, for one cause or another, the money is not forthcoming. The needs of the community, however, are too great to care for any of these on the grounds of benevolence merely, and the superintendent will have to insist that all who stay must be paid for.

During the summer months the children have enjoyed a vacation, but the school was to reopen the first of September. Since May the school has been in charge of the Rev. Charles M. Carr, a graduate not long since of the General Theological Seminary. The children are instructed in the common English branches, the attendance being about one hundred, and their ages ranging from five to fourteen or fifteen years. Many of the boys then go into the printing office, while several of them are now learning the trades of the carpenter and tailor. Indeed, all the boys are taught in sewing so far as to be able to mend their own clothing. The school, which formerly had two sessions, now has but one, that the children may have the more time for work. The session continues from 9:30 A.M., to 1 P.M.; the children first assembling in the chapel at 9 o'clock for prayers. Mr. A. J. Mundy takes the post of organist and assistant teacher. Miss C. Neis is to begin a Kindergarten September 1st.

In the Sunbeam Memorial Cottage, erected and carried on by Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, there are now twenty-one orphan girls, in charge of Miss Ayres, the sister of "Sister Anne." The cottage, as always, is in the best of order, the girls doing all the work, and being thoroughly instructed in all branches of housekeeping. One of the girls, seventeen years of age, is about to take a situation in Brooklyn at ten dollars per month.

In the Old Man's Inn there are thirty-four inmates. For each one of these, in all, or nearly all cases, there is a payment of one hundred and fifty dollars a year, at the hands of parties interested in them.

Morning and Evening Prayer is had in the chapel, at which all the children are required to attend. They are attended also of their own mind by the aged men, who esteem it a great pleasure. On the first Sunday in the month there is Morning Prayer at 9 A.M., and Holy Communion with sermon at 11. A children's service is held in the afternoon at 3, while there is Evening Prayer with address at 7. The superintendent and the two other clergymen make it a rule to preach and to conduct the services in turn. Dr. Bailey has made some changes in the chancel, setting back the altar against the wall, supplying an altar rail, which in due time will be replaced by a better one, placing book-racks in the pews, and a board at the side of the chancel to indicate the hymns. All of this work has been done by the carpenter and his apprentices, it being the intention of the superintendent to have persons on the premises sufficiently qualified to do whatever carpentering is called for.

St. Johnland embraces about five hundred acres, the grass and meadow land supplying sufficient pasturage and hay for the cattle, horses, etc. Fourteen acres are planted with corn, four with potatoes, while an additional four is devoted to a garden. None of the produce is sold, all being required for the needs of the community, which numbers about two hundred and fifty. The work is carried out by a farmer and two helpers, but the superintendent intends that more of farming and gardening shall be done by the boys. His aim is, in fact, to do all that may be done to reduce the expenses of carrying on the work, and increasing the revenues.

It has been not a little discouraging that when every moment is needed to superintend the work and make improvements in various directions, so much time has to be occupied in securing the means with which to meet expenses. An endowment brings an income of about $5,000 a year, but in addition to this and the resources from the aged men, boys, etc., there is required another $5,000. To secure this money is perhaps more taxing than any or all other duties. The superintendent is most anxious to increase the endowment and do whatever is possible to make the institution self-supporting.

St. Johnland confessedly labors under some disadvantages, not the least of which is its distance from the city. The trustees, however, have made it a rule to make monthly visitations, two by two, and are showing increased interest in the colony. If people cannot find time to visit the community, they will be excused in consideration of sending their gifts and donations. It should be understood that the colony has come to stay, and that whatever cloud it may have seemed to be under for a time is fast disappearing. So, also, that order, discipline and good behavior are expected to be as becoming as they ever have been.

It may be added that the pastor and superintendent will be at St. Luke's Hospital, Fifty-fourth street and Fifth avenue, every Thursday morning, from ten to twelve o'clock, to meet any who may wish to see them on business concerning St. Johnland. Letters for information should be addressed to the Rev. Dr. Bailey, Society of St. Johnland, St. Johnland, Long Island, N. Y.

GLEN COVE.—St. Paul's Church.—Too much cannot be said in praise of the improvements made in this country church. The exterior is complete, while the interior will be clear of workmen before many days have passed. The whole will combine an effect that for a village shrine will be unequalled at least on this island. The happy position, situated on a hill overlooking the road, and the style, which is so unlike anything else that we see about (it is Italian, if it has a name), combine to attract every eye. If we stopped to criticise anything, it would be the bell-tower. We think this might have been better, and more in keeping with the rest of the front, which is really beautiful. What a fine effect the arched portico has! The interior is spacious; there is no cramming effect. The chancel has the same width as the nave, which indeed is a necessity now, since chancel choirs are coming to be the accepted thing. The well-raised altar and its adornments, the richly-ornamented baptismal font, the nobly-ornamented baptistery, with its font placed at the door, as it should be—all are most pleasing and effective. The rector certainly is to be complimented for the taste and judgment which have been shown in its construction. The church has about it an individuality and character quite irresistible. —Parish Record.

HEMPSTEAD.—Death of Mr. Henry M. Onderdonk.—Henry M. Onderdonk, editor and proprietor of the Hempstead Inquirer, one of the oldest weekly publications in the State of New York, died on Wednesday morning, September 2, after a brief but painful illness. Mr. Onderdonk was the son of the late Bishop of New York, the Right Rev. Benjamin Treadwell Onderdonk, and at the time of his death was sixty years of age. He was at one time the editor of a Western newspaper and a member of the Wisconsin State Senate. Mr. Onderdonk was active in Church matters, having been for many years a vestryman and warden of St. George's parish, Hempstead. He was also one of the lay incorporators of the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City. He leaves a widow and a large family. His mother, Bishop Onderdonk's widow, is still living at the age of ninety-three.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

PALMYRA.—Zion Church.—After years of anxious care and faithful labor, the members of this parish (the Rev. C. T. Coerr, rector,) have succeeded in obtaining a new organ. The rector has made every effort to accomplish this result, and all rejoice in the success attendant upon his efforts. The new organ is from the manufactory of Hook & Hastings, Boston, Mass., and in every way sustains the splendid reputation of that well-known firm. This church is one of the handsomest in the diocese, has a seating capacity of eight hundred, and is heated, as well as the chapel, by steam throughout. Besides purchasing the organ, and paying cash for it, the parish has raised and expended some thirteen hundred dollars in beautifying the church, chapel and rectory, and in repairs on the furnaces and steam pipes.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

RUTHERFORD.—Grace Church.—At the recent visitation of this parish (the Rev. J. B. Coffman, rector,) the bishop of the diocese confirmed seven persons. In his address to the candidates, the bishop spoke warmly of the thorough and healthy work done in the parish during the administration of the present rector, through the evident unity of heart and purpose between him and his congregation.

The mortgage debt of the parish has again been largely reduced, its troublesome floating debt wholly removed, and general financial condition much improved by the judicious management of the treasurer. The number of communicants has also been considerably increased.

PENNSYLVANIA.

ARDMORE—Mission Work.—For a number of years the Church of the Redeemer, Bryn Mawr, has carried on a night service and an afternoon Sunday-school in this village. In January the mission was moved into the first floor of a hall belonging to one of the congregation, which would be entirely under the control of the Church authorities. When a new assistant minister was appointed to the church, it was decided by the rector that he should reside in the neighborhood of the mission and have especial charge of that work. The Rev. Lawrence Buckle Thomas became assistant in April, and from his report of the mission work we get the following facts: Part of the money subscribed last year has been paid in, and a lot 150x300 feet, on Ardmore avenue, has been bought for $3,000 cash. The Mission Hall has within the past month been frescoed in Prussian red, with an olive-green dado, new pews put in, the floor stained, additional lights and some minor improvements made; a handsome dosel of Turcoman cloth, given by a gentleman in the Sunday-school; pulpit and prayer-desk hangings, embroidered by one of the ladies, the materials having been given by another gentleman. The village is growing quite rapidly, and in time, no doubt, a parish will be organized there, though the number of Church-people is too small at present to warrant action, the night service being attended by twenty-five or thirty, and the Sunday-school numbering forty pupils and four teachers. The Mission Hall, as adorned and made comfortable, and seating about one hundred and twenty-five persons, will suffice for the needs of the village for some time to come, and will no doubt attract a better congregation than gathered in it when the walls were bare, unpainted rough cast, and the seats rude and uncomfortable pine benches. During the summer the missionary has baptized four children, presented four adults for baptism at the mother church, officiated at four funerals, and paid one hundred and seventy-six visits, besides his work as assistant at Bryn Mawr.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE—St. George's Church.—The Rev. Frederick Gilson has been rector here not yet a full year, the Rev. Dr. J. Pinkney Hammond, who was but so lately gathered to his fathers, being rector before. The enlargement of the church, by the addition of a number of greatly-needed pews, has added materially to the comfort of this growing congregation. Dr. Hammond, in erecting this memorial to the departed bishop, was building as his own as well, and St. George's is a witness to his own labors and zeal. Its value is $12,000; about 160 communicants, 125 pupils, and 300 sittings in the church.

BALTIMORE—Eastern Boundary Mission.—Of this widespread missionary work Bishop Whittingham once wrote, when offering it to a presbyter, "It well merits the services of a man of any amount of ability." Two chapels of the Atonement and the Holy Evangelists, under the care of the Rev. S. W. Crampton, aided to the amount of $200 per year from the Missions Committee, are sustained, seating 400 persons, and valued at $5,500. The lot on which the former was built was the gift of Mr. Glenn, trustee. A few zealous laymen have materially aided in building up and sustaining this work. The church is of brick, and is well insured, a deed being promptly executed by the generous donor. The Mothers' Meetings and the Young Girls' Friendly Society, for mutual help and religious as well as material comfort, are well attended and are of encouraging results, with increasing interest in whatever relates to the work and the good of the Church. No matter what may be the character of the weather, here and at the Chapel of the Evangelists the missionary is generally as sure to meet good congregations as they are to see him, and the annex Sunday-school indicates the full attendance of the main school. At this chapel $465 was last year raised, at the other $45—in all, $530. Over 100 communicants are enrolled.

BALTIMORE—The Rev. Dr. Rankin's Resignation.—The Rev. Dr. C. W. Rankin, whose resignation of the rectorship of St. Luke's parish took effect on September 1st, addressed under date of August 15th, a very touching letter to his congregation as a farewell pastoral. It is too long for us to quote entire, but we give a few extracts.

After mentioning his reluctant resignation and its causes, he goes on to say that he does not trust himself to preach a farewell sermon, yet, would love to leave on record some thoughts which seem to him of great importance.

"First. Those whose memory reaches back for fifty years are well aware that within that period there has been a marvellous unfolding of the Church's life both in England and this country. This renewed outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the Body of Christ has been marked by many characteristics indicative of new zeal, fervor and spiritual power. I may mention such features as the division and multiplication of the services of the Church, especially in the more frequent celebration of its highest and most solemn act of worship in the Sacrament of the Altar; the revival of community life in brotherhoods and sisterhoods; the extension of the episcopate, both missionary and diocesan; increased attention to the instruction of the young, both in Sunday and day schools; more particular attention to the preparation of candidates for confirmation; more direct, plain and dogmatic teaching, with special reference to the Catholic features of the Church, both in catechetical and pulpit instruction; the establishment of parochial missions; more marked and reverential attention to the services of the Lord's house in a stately and dignified ritual, and a closer and more practical recognition both of the pastoral and priestly offices between the clergy and the people. In this overflowing flood of life we have been called upon to take our humble share, and there are those among us who can well remember how the introduction of some of those features I have mentioned subjected us to opprobrium and suspicion; and yet most of those things that were regarded as 'novelties' when first introduced among us, has now been recognized as the Church's lawful heritage, and been very generally adopted.

"In looking back over the thirty-two years of my ministry among you, I am conscious of many imperfections and short-comings, but I have nothing to regret in the principles which have guided and influenced that ministry. I believe those principles to be the principles of the Church and Prayer Book, and I should be grieved to see any departure from them. I believe that these principles are important, not only in the inner spiritual worship of all our service, but also in the outward and visible adorning of the sanctuary with the noblest gifts that we can offer from the worlds of nature and of art; and the glorifying of the worship of Almighty God in the richest 'service of song.' For indeed everything connected with that service should be 'exceedingly magnificent, for the temple and its appointments are not for man, but for the Lord God. It was well said by one of our departed vestrymen, 'that ritualism was simply good manners in the house of God.'

"Then, too, I wish to impress upon the congregation the paramount importance of strengthening our work among the young. I have no confidence in any system of education which leaves God out of sight, and ignores the moral and spiritual elements of man. My views upon this subject have been frequently and plainly set before you, and I wish in these parting words to exhort you to renewed and continued efforts to strengthen our school work, and make Christian education a reality among us."

He then refers to his long rectorship and the importance of the election of his successor, deprecating the introduction of the machinery of canvassing, etc., and setting forth the responsibility resting on the vestry. "I exhort you, therefore, my beloved, in the name of God (for I am still your rector), to refrain from anything of this kind. Let there be no ecclesiastical gossip; let there be no attempt to form parties in the congregation. It will result in fostering party spirit, in introducing cliques, and in alienating in one way or another members of the congregation, and thereby rending the Body of Christ. No, my beloved, the proper attitude of your minds at the present time is that of patience and quiet submission to the order of the Church. The vestry are your representatives, chosen by you, and the responsibility resting upon them is very heavy. Do not let them be embarrassed in any way. They have the interests of the Church as much at heart as you have. In making their selection they should forego all favoritism, and as in the sight of God strive to choose the man who is best fitted for the position. Therefore give them your confidence. Should they fail in reaching a satisfactory decision, we have a bishop who will gladly aid them by his council and advice. In conclusion, study to be quiet, carry all your cares and perplexities to our dear Lord. Make it a part of your private personal prayers, that the vestry may be wisely guided. Especially in the Holy Communion of the Body and Blood of Christ, unite your supplications with his prevailing intercession in this behalf. I believe that constant, quiet, steadfast and earnest prayer will do more for the welfare and prosperity of the Church, and more, far more for your own peace of mind, than any amount of agitation or discussion. I would advise you to use in your families, and in private, the prayer to be appointed to be used at the meetings of the convention."

He appends the prayer to his letter, and after a touching commendation of his flock to the Lord, and a prayer that He will give them grace to rally round and strengthen his successor with their confidence and love, he concludes:

"Finally, brethren, be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, study to be quiet, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you. Amen."

BELAIR—Immanuel Church.—Here and at Grace Chapel, Hickory, the work of the Church, under the Rev. J. B. Craighill, reports progress and asks to be continued. Four white teachers instruct a school of twenty-four colored children on Sundays, while of the seventy pupils of the other schools eight or ten are colored—a feeble effort, but one which points in the right direction. During the winter suspension of some of the Sunday-school work is inevitable. There are fifty-five communicants, a church and rectory valued at $9,500. The contributions last year were $1,075.

HAGERSTOWN—St. John's Parish.—In this parish there are St. John's church and St. Anne's chapel, besides the Williamsport Mission. The value of the parish church here is not far from $56,000. A valuable parsonage, valued at $6,000, is owned by the corporation of "Rector, Wardens, and Vestry." There are nearly one hundred families, embracing five hundred souls, and contributing last year $1,572.31. There are two hundred and fifteen communicants, and about two hundred Sunday-school pupils. Three Sunday-schools are maintained, with a corps of thirty teachers. To the rectory fund and other objects within the parish were contributed during the last year $1,221.62; disabled clergy, $30; missions in diocese, nearly $50.

CLEAR SPRING—St. Andrew's Church.—The regular services of the church have been kept up at Four Locks and Indian Spring by the rector, the Rev. C. R. Page, who finds the interest and attendance at these points all that he could wish. Though for several years past inevitable causes have from time to time weakened the work at these places, yet events have tended to counterbalance them, and the church is yet holding its own, with property to the value of $5,000 and over, over forty communicants, and very substantial improvements upon the church at Clear Spring.

EASTON.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—From the journal of the seventeenth annual convention we gather the following statistics: Clergy, including the bishop, 34; incorporated parishes and congregations, 38; churches, 62; ordinations, 2; baptisms, 423; confirmations, 46; communicants, 2,653; Sunday School scholars, 1,681; contributions, $40,936.73; rectories, 26; value of church property, including indebted fund, $300,857.79. There is no table of diocesan statistics presenting them in one view. The bishop's address is devoted to diocesan affairs.

HEALTH OF THE BISHOP.—The bishop of the diocese is reported to be still at Massanetta Springs, Virginia, and in somewhat improved health. The bishop has constituted the Standing Committee the Ecclesiastical Authority during his illness.

STEPNEY PARISH—Stepney Church, Green Hill.—An interesting service was held in this parish (the Rev. F. B. Adkins, rector,) on Wednesday, August 26th. It was the reopening for divine worship of the quaint old Stepney Church at Green Hill. The site was once laid off for a city, and was known as Woodland Reach, from its being studded with magnificent oaks, of which the trunks of the two largest still remain near the church. The walls of the church are eighteen inches thick, and are made of fine old English brick, cemented with mortar that has resisted the storms and wear of one hundred and fifty-two years. The church is eighty-six feet six inches long, and forty-three feet six inches wide. The roof, door, and window-frames having decayed, have been replaced by new ones. The roof is arched and supported by three huge rafters and five iron braces extending across the walls. The underpinning of the north side has been relaid and two fues placed in the building. This addition is entirely new, there never having been any arrangements for heating except by long iron pipes. The original heart-pipe, high-back pews, resting upon a solid brick floor, are still in a good state of preservation. The pulpit, of which there was left the back part, has been built after the model of the original. The altar has been also rebuilt, nothing having remained but the railing, which is still in its place. The Rev. Alexander Adams was the first rector of this parish. He resided within a mile of Salisbury, and used to travel in a boat down the Wicomico, which was the roadway leading to this place of worship. In the church there is now to be seen the silver communion service, consisting of a flagon, chalice, and patens, which were a gift of the Rev. Alexander Adams in 1752.

At 11 a. m. the church was completely filled, many standing in the aisles. The rector celebrated in the Holy Communion, the first service held in the church for forty years, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. C. H. B. Turner and O. H. Murphy. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Turner, from Leviticus, xxvii. 2. Services were also held at 3 p. m., consisting of Evening Prayer and Holy Baptism.

NORTH CAROLINA.

RALPHIGH—St. Mary's School.—Every summer some improvement is made in the buildings of this excellent school to keep pace with modern demands. This year, warned by the disastrous fire of last January, the old heating apparatus of furnaces and hot air pipes supplemented by a small steam generator has been done away with. The buildings will now be kept at a uniform temperature of seventy degrees Fahrenheit, by direct radiation from coils supplied with steam from a low pressure engine of fifty horse power. Its safety valves open automatically at a pressure of fifteen pounds, while ducts and radiators are made to withstand one hundred and fifty pounds. The engine house is entirely separate from the buildings, and is distant over one hundred feet from the nearest one. The contract was given to Mr. Bargemin, of Richmond, whose name is a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of the work. The buildings are already amply supplied with water by two hydraulic rams, which fill a huge tank at the top of the main building, whence the water passes to the lower floors and the adjoining houses. Mr. Stevenson is now fitting up bath-rooms in each of the buildings in which there are sleeping apartments, to which hot water will be conveyed by pipes. The large cisterns have been newly fitted with filters so that pupils may drink rain water if they prefer it. The total outlay for these improvements and the new building will be between sixteen and seventeen thousand dollars. The new session will open Thursday, September 10th, with the brightest prospects.—Exchange.

MISSISSIPPI.

VICKSBURG—St. Mary's Church.—This colored church (the Rev. Nelson Ayres, vicar,) is finished, so far as the carpenters' work goes, and the painters have been over it once, leaving it of a yellowish-white color, and there the work has been compelled to stop by lack of funds.

The church is built in the form of a Greek cross, with the chancel arm slightly elongated, and made apsidal. The whole length of the nave and chancel is sixty-six feet and three inches, and the width across the transepts is sixty feet. On either side of the chancel and nave, the roof is extended over aisles ten feet in width, making the full width of the building, outside the transept, fifty feet. The roof is semi-gothic and open-timbered, and altogether the effect is quite striking and picturesque. As a gentleman of the city remarked, it is a building that will hold a large congregation, every one of whom can see and hear with ease.

This work among the negroes was begun in March last, only one of its beneficiaries having had any knowledge of, or interest in the church. It was established in response to a petition quite numerously signed, but signed, as has appeared later, by a great many who cared nothing for the Church, and by some who cordially hate her. The work has met with violent opposition from many of the negroes, and with but cold encouragement from any man's work, carried on by the priest in charge alone, without lay assistance of any kind. A small band of intelligent and devoted laymen and women, as teachers and leaders, would be of inestimable benefit. But there are none to be had so far. Yet the work has gone on and prospered. It numbers a communicant list already of twenty-five, with the prospect of a rapid increase. The congregation grows from week to week, and soon, we have reason to believe, there will be no place for them.

One great need of the work just at present is a furnace to put in the church before the cold weather sets in. A chancel rail and a bishop's chair would be also acceptable. Any offering for the work may be sent to Bishop Thompson.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

HILLSBOROUGH—St. Mary's Church.—This parish (the Rev. Edward Bradley, rector,) has been the recipient of a noble organ, the gift of Mrs. Rufus King of Cincinnati. The instrument, at the donor's request, is placed at the north side of the church, next to the east or chancel wall, and the choir of eight voices are seated in stalls in front. The organ is a two-manual instrument of great compass. The great organ contains four hundred and fifty-two pipes and eight stops. The swell organ has six stops, with three hundred and forty-eight pipes. The pedals have twenty-seven pipes. There are five additional registers, and three treadles for mechanical uses. The case is ten feet wide and nine feet deep, of oiled walnut, and incloses the lower part of the organ. The upper part shows on each front the pipes, richly ornamented in gothic arabesque. A brass plate bears the following inscription: "In memory of Edward Rives, M.D. A loving sister's tribute." The builders are Koehnen & Grimm of Cincinnati, who have furnished an organ of elegant appearance and beauty of tone.

The instrument was first used in divine service on Sunday, August 30th. The church was completely filled both morning and evening. There were new hangings on lecturn and pulpit, and a handsome dossal under the chancel window. There were floral decorations on the super-altar, the font, and the windows, and a handsome wreath around the manual plate on the organ. At 10:30 the rector entered the chancel, and before the service made a brief address, calling attention to the prevailing use of consecration services when any important acts to divine worship are first made use of. He read the donor's letter and the vestry's acceptance and promise of careful use and safe-keeping, begged the congregation to remember that this gift was placed in the church to add dignity and beauty to acts of worship, and reminded the chorists that it was their privilege to lead the spoken responses of the congregation as well as the chants and hymns. He then said the prayer of dedication and consecration of the organ, with intercessions for the donor, the chorists, the congregation, and the minister. The organ then was first heard in the harmonies of the "O Lord Hunderdth," which accompanied the singing of Hymn 289.

The regular services then followed, the rector preaching from Psalm cxvii. 1. Mr. M. B. Trott, organist of St. Paul's, Cincinnati, presided at the organ, and Mr. Davidson, of the same church, sang during the taking of the offerings Handel's "Comfort ye, My People."

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

MANISTEE—St. Paul's Church.—There was unusual interest on the three first Sundays of August in this parish, (the Rev. W. S. Hayward, rector). On August 9th the rector preached a memorial sermon for General Grant; on August 16th he preached the regular monthly sermon on the general missions of the Church, and on August 23d he preached a sermon appropriate to "Ephphatha" Sunday. In the sermon on missions the rector showed how the American Church could easily receive two million dollars for its general missionary work by learning how to give.

MINNESOTA.

HANTING—St. Luke's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this church (the Rev. G. B. Pratt, rector), on Friday, August 28th, and confirmed thirteen persons. This number, added to eighteen confirmed in May, makes a total of thirty-one confirmations for the present year, showing a healthy growth, and an encouraging sign both to rector and people.

NEBRASKA.

OMAHA—Trinity Cathedral.—This cathedral was on Tuesday, September 1st, the scene of a quiet wedding in which Mr. W. W. Montgomery of Philadelphia, Pa., and Miss Elizabeth Lewis of this city were the contracting parties. The Rev. Dr. John Vaughan Lewis, Post Chaplain at Fort Omaha, and father of the bride, officiated, assisted by the dean of the cathedral.

COLORADO.

DENVER—St. John's Cathedral.—Mr. William Worthington, late of the Diocese of Long Island, was ordained to the diaconate on Thursday, July 30th, by the missionary bishop, in the cathedral. Mr. Worthington has been appointed missionary at Villa Grove and parts adjacent.

PARAGRAPHC.

It is now claimed in England that the hymns ascribed to Addison, "When all Thy mercies, O my God," and "The spacious firmament on high," were written by Andrew Marvell.

When an old friend said to Dr. Muhlenberg, "We are both on the wrong side of seventy," the doctor replied: "The wrong side! surely the right side, for it is the side nearest heaven."

THE Parish Record in Brooklyn is one of our best monthly Church papers. It devotes a good deal of time and space to gathering up the old records and embalming them in its columns.

THE Robert A. Packer Hospital, Sayre, Pa., formerly Mr. Packer's house, is valued, with its grounds, at $200,000. In all its appointments there are few hospitals that can compare with it.

THAT is a fine and true sentiment in Rutledge, where it says, "By doing good with his money a man as it were stamps the image of God upon it, and makes it pass current for the merchandise of heaven."

In the old days before carpets, the floors of churches in England were strewn with rushes, and a special service was lately held at Ambleside to commemorate the custom, the children carrying rushes and flowers.

THE College of Cardinals at Rome now consists of sixty-two members, of whom forty-two have been appointed by the present pope. Thirty-five are Italians, and the others are divided among the nations of Europe, except one, who is American.

THE Wycliffe Society in England has begun the publication of the reformer's Latin works, and will make them as accessible as his English works are. He is called the Morning Star of the Reformation, and it is interesting to trace in his works the germs of truth of which the later reformers made use.

A NOVEL method of disposing of the dead has been suggested to the Strand Board of Guardians in England. It is to enclose the coffins in concrete blocks, and make a sea-wall of them. It was claimed that Reculvers churchyard, Herne Bay, might thus be recovered. The Board of Guardians did not consider the matter favorably.

THE restoration of the words, "He descended into hell," to the Creed after they had been stricken out in the General Convention, when the Church in this country was organized, was due to the votes of South Carolina and New Jersey; New York, Pennsylvania and Delaware being equally divided. The Nicene Creed was retained by a unanimous vote.

A STONE tablet in a church near Treveri, Germany, has upon it an inscription as follows: "When Mark shall bring us Easter, and Anthony shall sing praises at Pentecost, and John shall swing the censur at the feast of Corpus Domini, then shall the wide earth resound with weepings and wailings." Next year Easter falls on St. Mark's Day, Pentecost on that of St. Anthony of Padua, and Corpus Domini comes on St. John Baptist's Day. As to the rest, we shall see.

It would seem as if Wesley foresaw the evil days, for he says in his sermon cxv., on the Ministerial Office, "Ye yourselves were first called in the Church of England, and though ye have and will have a thousand temptations to leave it and set up for yourselves, regard them not. Be Church of England men still. Do not cast away the peculiar glory which God hath put upon you and frustrate the design of Providence, the very end for which God raised you up." Wesley seemed to believe that there is such a thing as schism, and that it was sin.

SAYS John Wesley, in a sermon which now appears in his works in a garbled form or is suppressed altogether: "In 1744 all the the Methodist preachers had their first conference. But none of them dreamed that the being called to preach gave them any right to administer sacraments. . . . For, supposing (what I utterly deny) that the receiving you as a preacher at the same time gave an authority to administer the sacraments, yet it gave you no other authority than to do it or anything else where I appoint. But where did I appoint you to do this? Nowhere at all."

ART.

AN advanced and intelligent philanthropy, nowadays, is fond of insisting upon the wholesome influences of art, especially music, among the masses of hard-working people, who have neither time nor money, and perhaps less inclination, for recreations which appeal only to the fancy and imagination.

This amiable freak of modern sociology has found a lodgement even in the cross conclusions of municipal authorities, such as the aldermen of New York and other equally recalcitrant bodies, who similarly oppress other great cities under a pretence of governing them.

So the people have, and are to have, music served gratis in public parks and places. On the Battery, among the down-town hoodlums and Castle Garden immigrants, in Washington Square, in Tompkins Square, of the great unexplored East Side, and last and chiefly in Central Park, twice each week is the feast served. The menu is dainty and costly, after its kind, the best among the great regimental bands are employed, and the quality and spirit of interpretation is unexceptionable.

Clearly enough an appetite and relish for such pastimes may be cultivated, and not a little rest and refreshment of an unwanted flavor dispensed where they will do the most good.

The outlay and investment are judicious, and at the same time humane. The manners and tastes of the sorrowful, plodding, half-hopeless under-world of toil, dirt, and wretchedness may fairly be softened and modified, and morals, it may fairly be hoped, be in some degree helped. Other things being equal, the people are better within reach of the beautiful arts than deprived of them. As a subsidiary influence, art goes with the evangelist. He has his Bible, and also his book of inspiring hymns and tunes, and, if he understands his work, his minstrels and singers bear him company.

But when the people's concert breaks in upon the sanctities of the Lord's Day, and the vast masses of earth-dwellers and tenement population make a holiday of it, and turn the Central Park into a very Vanity Fair of idling and merry-making—when the religious work of the churches is checkmated by the brilliant attractions of Signor Cappas and his accomplished musicians, and the sacred day profoundly secularized and desecrated under legislative enactment, what must the outcome be! The Sunday question seems more keenly imperilled from the art side than from the commercial or convivial. The common conscience pretty unanimously resists the convivial license, and pulls down the curtains of the drinking-saloons and bolts at least their front doors. Then the social economist blocks the wheels of toil and traffic, shuts down the brake on production and farming, chiefly because labor with no seventh-day breathing place is proved, in the long run, wasteful.

But it is not so easy or palatable to formulate prohibitive measures against music. So the public weakens here, and turns a deaf ear to what is, in fact, a most insidious infringement upon the sanctities of the Lord's Day. So compromise—that hybrid between conscience and expediency—steps in, and a "Sunday concert," or a "sacred concert" is sanctioned, at once a salve for the scandalized religious, and a concession to the philanthropist. But, as is the case with most compromises, a breach of faith is involved. The Sunday concert is nominally "sacred," but is, in fact, secular and frivolous to the very core. The great band of Mr. Cappa is splendidly equipped for the eloquent delivery of chorals, oratorio choruses with andante and adagio movements from the great symphonies—such as might rightly be used as preludes and postludes on the organ at Sunday services. The most worshipped music on earth may be had from the brass and wood-wind of a modern orchestra when devout and highly trained men supply the wind as well as the thought. Now and then it is true the mezzo is sparsely garnished with a number like the "Hallelujah Chorus," or "The Heavens are Telling," but it is in substance, secular, often frivolous, and not infrequently degrading. Think of entertaining fifteen thousand citizens of a Sunday afternoon, with vulgarities and buffoneries of the "Carnival of Venice," or the sensuous, bacchanalian rhapsodies of the great drinking song in "Lucresia Borgia"—as a piccolo solo—with perpetual relays of dances, waltzes and polkas, out of the public purse of a great Christian city! As any one might see, the bad and unwholesome music is applauded and encored, while the irreligious masses are sullen and restless under the noblest examples of a better art. If we are to have Sunday sacred concerts, it is right to demand that they be sacred.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. WILLIAM & COX.

The recent death of Mrs. WILLIAM B. COX, of Raleigh, North Carolina, has touched with grief the hearts of many beyond the circle of the family that loved her so well.

In this universal sorrow it is pleasant and consoling to record the many attractive graces that clustered round her genuine and gracious life.

Endowed with brilliancy, quickness of intellect, and natural delicacy, artistic taste, she profited by her unusual opportunities, and by periods of foreign residence and travel, to become versed and accomplished in art, literature and modern literature.

These rich endowments of nature and culture made her a delightful companion to all who knew her, while her native goodness of heart, her thoughtful consideration for others, and her refined womanly instincts made all her associates her friends, and won from many their entire confidence and affection.

Ever sedulously considerate of those subordinate to her, he was beloved by them with the greatest warmth.

Here was the illustrious Christian character; who lived in the diligent of duty, in unselfish devotion to the interest of relative and friend, and amidst all the duties and pressures that surrounded her, her Church and her obligations were never forgotten or neglected, and deft instruments, the work of her own hands, testify to her loving care.

Verily her sun went down while it was yet day; and a home is now darkened by the sudden removal of the one who was the centre of its life and light. In the joy of comfort in the past, and in the grief and time, beat the smitten hearts, and give fullest consolation to those who mourn.

G. H.

DANIEL LEROY.

At Newport, R. I., August 19th, 1885, DANIEL LEROY, late of the City of New York.

In recording the death of Daniel LeRoy, in the 57th year of his age, the sweet memory of a life well spent demands a passing notice. In every relation of life he integrity and unflinching purity, his open hand, his genial humor, his kind hospitalty, his tender and loving endearments, enriched the home circle, crowning it as with a halo of domestic purity and peace. He was a consistent member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and firm in the Christian faith. The last services were solemnly and impressively rendered in Trinity church, Newport, R. I., The Rev. G. J. Magill, rector, officiating, assisted by the Rev. A. A. Benton, rector of St. Peter's and Rev. W. M. Moran, rector of St. John's Church, Newport, R. I.

MARGARET ELIZABETH SCOTT.

At Cooperstown, August 6th, 1885, MRS. MARGARET ELIZABETH SCOTT, for many years a prominent member of Christ Church, Cooperstown, and for many years, the venerable Henry Scott, was senior ward during twenty-seven years. Her personal character was remarkable for truth, uprightness, trustfulness and more than common benevolence. During more than thirty years Mrs. Scott was very closely connected with the spiritual and musical life of her parish, to which she rendered very effective service. A large number of warmly attached neighbors and friends will unite in respectful and affectionate remembrance.

APPEALS.

CATHOLIC REFORM IN ITALY.

I venture to appeal very earnestly to all who are interested in the future of Christianity in Italy, in behalf of the movement for Reform of the Roman Church inaugurated in Rome under the lead of Monsignor Savarese, and the Count di Campello. These men have made a very brave stand for Christian truth and liberty against a exceeding great odds. They have to contend against not only the papacy, but the wide spread middle class bigotry in Italy of the papacy. Their treasury is absolutely exhausted. Funds are needed at once to continue the work already begun, and to start new centres of work in several important places, which during the past year have been making repeated calls for help. Give us the names of any prominent laymen you received by the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN, 47 Lafayette Place, or by the undersigned, at Grace Church Rectory, N. Y. City.

Rector St. Paul's Church, Rome.

ABBOTTS WISDOM.

It has not pleased the Lord to send Nathobah. The great and good work entrusted to her requires, as in times past, the offerings of His people.

Offerings are solicited:

1st. Because Nathobah is the oldest theological seminary North and west of the State of Ohio.

2d. Because it is the most healthfully situated seminary.

3d. Because it is the best located for study.

4th. Because it is the best prepared in applying itself to the work of preparing candidates for ordination.

Address, Rev. A. D. COLE, D. D., Nathobah, Waukesha County, Wisconsin.

THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY.

BENED SPALDING, Denver, Colorado, gratefully acknowledges receipt for the Rev. Sherman Coolidge's house and support, as follows: J. W. Connecticut, $1; Mrs. M. Smith, Ark., $5; St. Paul's, Mount Pleasant, W. Va., $1; Mrs. H. Geneva, $35; C. Y. St. Paul's, Massachusetts, $10; Miss Robinson and mother, $10; Geneva, N. Y., $5; E. M. Nichols, $5; Mrs. J. The plan of purchasing the Mission House, $100, failed. We hope for the Rev. Sherman Coolidge, about four miles below the agency. This is at the point where the rapids cease, where their waters meet. Here our Indian missionary will be near the school and civilization, and can conveniently co-operate with the people of the agency. The Rev. Mr. Spalding, in keeping up the service at Lander, North Fork, and Fort Washelle, it will cost probably $800 to build the house, and $200 for the furniture and other needs. We trust it will be sent me, so that I can make contract for building when at the agency the latter part of this month.

J. F. SPALDING, Missionary Bishop, Denver, Col., Sept. 7th, 1885.

THE EDITOR OF THE CHURCHMAN gladly acknowledges the receipt of $100, with the following letter: To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN: Please hand over the enclosed $100 to the authorities of the Holy Trinity church in the State if any provision be made for paying for donors to its charity. It is desired by "180."

A BIBLE QUERY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

To me there is a difficulty in the last clause of the 35th verse of the 9th chapter of the Holy Gospel according to St. John. et res seems to have been translated on the, instead of in the, or into the, more for the sake of harmonizing with kindred passages than out of regard to its literal meaning.

Although the consequences of a mere assent to our Lord's words may finally lead to salvation, it is not at first saving faith. The devil believe and tremble, yet we know of no salvation for them. A belief that saves appears to be such as identifies us with Jesus Christ, make us one with h. e., make us into Him; in other words, a perfectus, et sic totus deus. Some light from the pious scholar's lamp here may not be in vain.

BISHOP WILLIAMS ON THE SEABURY CENTENARY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I observe that Bishop Williams on page 9 of his Second Sermon on the Consecration of Dr. Seabury, remarks that "it is not easy to understand the apparent apathy" of the English bishops in the matter "of averting the dangers of the Church in the future of the American States," especially when the Act of Parliament of 1783, enabling them to ordain clergy for foreign countries is taken into consideration. One of Bishop Seabury's contemporaries, Richard Watson, Bishop of Llandaff, may throw a little light upon it, in a tract on Church Reform, published in 1783, "Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury." It will be seen that the bishop does not spare his own order:

"A suspicion exists that the prospect of being translated influences the minds of the bishops too powerfully, and induces them to pay too great an attention to the beck of a minister. I am far from saying or thinking that the bishops of the present age are more obsequious in their attention to ministers than their predecessors have been, or that the spiritual lords are the only lords who are liable to this suspicion, or that lords in general are the only persons on whom such an expectation has an influence; but the suspicion, whether well or ill founded, is irreparable to our order; and, what is a worse consequence, it hinders us from doing that good, which we otherwise might do; for the laity, whilst they entertain such a suspicion concerning us, will accuse us of avarice and ambition, of making a gain of godliness, of bartering the dignity of our office for the chance of a translation, in one word, of secularism; and against the accusation they are very backward in allowing the bishops or clergy in general, such kind of defense as they would readily allow to any other class of men, any other denomination of Christians under the similar circumstances of the same families and small fortunes. . . . I never wished one title of the king's influence in the State to be destroyed, except so far as it was extended over the deliberations of the hereditary counsellors of the Crown, or the parliamentary representatives of the people. I am only I have the greatest influence of this kind may be diminished; because I firmly believe that its diminution will eventually tend to a consecration of the genuine constitution of our country, to the honor of his majesty's government, to the stability of the Hanover succession, and to the promotion of the public good. Had the influence here spoken of been less predominant of late years, had the measures of the cabinet been canvassed by the wisdom and tempered by the moderation of men exercising their free powers of deliberation for the commonweal, the brightest jewel of his majesty's crown had not now been tarnished, the strongest limb of the British empire had not been brutally severed from its parent stock." Bishop Watson's moral weight as an advocate of reform in the spending of ecclesiastical revenues was somewhat impaired by the fact of his holding a good appointment at the University, together with his bishopric in Wales; but his testimony to the subservience of the episcopate to the cabinet is only a too correct picture of the time.

John Thomas, of Rochester, in his sermon to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in 1780, said:

"Seminaries were founded for the instruction of youth in every branch of science. From these fountains would have issued a competent supply of candidates for the sacred ministry to Protestants of every denomination, as well to those of the independent as of the Episcopal persuasion, had an equal measure been held out to both. But this was not the case—from a variety of groundless fears and apprehensions, not the most limited episcopate was allowed to be introduced among them; not, though restrained, as was intended, to the sole and exclusive confirmation of the superintending the conduct of the clergy; not, although a decent provision for its support was begun to be made, and, no doubt, would have been enlarged by the bequests and benefactions of good people, without laying any part of the burden upon the colonies. I leave others to decide on the justice and expediency of such an exclusion; but how loudly would the dissenting ministers have complained, and how justly too, had they been obliged to take the same dangerous and expensive voyages to be enabled to exercise their function as are the native, and other candidates for Holy Orders in our Church—who cannot be admitted to the same privileges without being personally examined and ordained here! Nevertheless, under all the difficulties on one side, and prejudices on the other, such was the diligence and moderation of our clergy, that their churches rapidly increased in number, so that in an extent of country where only five churches were declared in 1700, the first opening of such a door we have had the happiness to see them multiplied to fifty times that number in the space of little more than fifty years. So mightily grew the world of God, and prevailed."

In 1787, a similar protest was made by Bishop Warren: and only remedy for these great inconveniences has been often suggested, the appointment of one or more resident bishops for the exercise of the offices purely episcopal in the American Church of England. Why this appointment hath been so long postponed is a matter I shall not presume to enquire into. . . . But still I cannot help observing that such a measure is so agreeable to the true notion of religious liberty that Christians of no denomination can on this ground object to it, and least of all those Dissenters who admit of ordination. How would they complain! What an encroachment on the Toleration would this! It would oblige us to be intended to be public teachers obliged to come to Britain to be ordained! And such complaints would be just, and deserve to be immediately redressed; and yet this hath been all along the situation of the Church of England in America; and, what is rather extraordinary, our Church in the Colonies is bound by law, and yet hath stood deprived of the privilege of ministering to her own spiritual wants, a privilege which all Christian Churches in all ages and in every part of the world have freely enjoyed, and which in these countries Christians of every other denomination do not only enjoy."

These extracts may perhaps show that there were some exceptions to the prevailing apathy of those dark times. W. R. CRUTON.

"N. OR M."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Does not the Rev. Evan Daniel in his work on the Prayer Book give a very probable explanation of those letters? He says: "The N. is supposed to be the initial of Nomen (name); the M. a corruption of NN, itself an abbreviation of Nomina (names); C. SS, the abbreviation of Sancti (saints); LL. D. (Doctor of Laws)," etc. This explanation is not quite satisfactory. There is no authority so far as I know, for believing that more than one Christian name was ever given in England previous to the sixteenth century. Writing in the reign of James I., Camden says: "Two Christian names are rare in England, and I only remember his majesty and the prince with two more." Could M. or N. be a misprint for Nomen? The only letter used in the occasional offices is N., e. g., "I, N. take thee N." (Marriage Service)." Is not this more satisfactory than saying that M. is a corruption of double N., or that N. or M. is supposed to stand for Nicholas or Mary, typical male and female names? In the Baptismal Service there is only the simple N. In the Marriage Office the letters M. and N. are used as abbreviations in our Prayer Book and in modern English books, and sometimes the very far-fetched explanation is given that they represent respectively Maritus and Uxor. But a little more than a century ago the custom of giving the initials M. or N. in the Service Book, and must have been simply the abbreviation of Nomen. The Rev. Frederick Gibson writes me: "The earliest introduction of the M. I have found is in the Cambridge editions of 1757, 1763 and 1766, and an Oxford edition of 1767. We inherit the M. probably from the Scotch Bibles of the year about 1706 or later." This being the case, why should not we in "The Book Annexed" simply use the N. in the Marriage Office, as Blunt does in his "Annotated Prayer Book"? And then if in the Catechism the first answer should be simply N., there would be an agreement on this point in all the occasional offices.

ST. MARK'S, CHARLESTON.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

This city has just been visited by a cyclone, which has left desolation behind it. St. Mark's church (a colored congregation) has seen unroofed, the organ has been ruined. It will cost all of two thousand dollars to repair the building, which this congregation built and paid for. The houses of many of those who worship here have been likewise unroofed, and while they have gone to work at once to restore by borrowing the money, it will be very difficult for them to maintain services and raise this money. Only last week they sent their quota of $30 to make up the deficiency asked for by the Domestic Committee. This is the congregation which, while ranking about the seventh in the diocese, has applied in vain for admission to the convention of the diocese. In all things they commend themselves to the sympathy of the Church in this day of their misfortune. I ask aid for them from the generous. Are there not twenty persons who will give me each $100 in a hour of trial!

INCORRECT BIBLES.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

A few Sundays ago I was somewhat annoyed in one of our mission stations, by reading from a 48mo. Bible (published by Alexander Tower, also Hogan & Thompson, 1394 Market street, Philadelphia, 1832, [1829 on frontispiece] and stereotyped by L. Johnson,) which accompanies me in my missionary journeys, the following in Exodus 21: "The land before thee." From these errors we may learn at least two things: First, the very great care of the proofreaders of the Scriptures; and second, that the insertion, the omitting, or the change of one letter, even, is a matter of no little consequence in those same Scriptures.

BISHOP SEABURY'S HISTORY OF AMERICA. Reprinted in fac-simile, with an Historical Sketch and Notes by the Rev. S. Hart, M. A. [New York: T. Whitaker.]

II.

Let me now see how it is proposed to "enrich" the Daily Office. An alternative form of what the American book calls the "declaration of absolution" is adapted from the old Latin Indulgentiam; and instead of a composite anthem from Psalms xcvi. and xcvi., the whole of the Venite is given, but with leave to omit v. 8-11 (which at present are always omitted), "save on the Sundays in Lent." It would be better, we think, to withdraw this permission; the warnings of the Venite are not disconnected with its suitability as the Invitatory Psalm. The selection of Psalms are increased in number, and are rearranged. We wish that the permission to substitute Gloria in Excelsis for Gloria Patri after each selection or each daily portion of Psalms had been abolished; the great Eucharistic hymn should not be made an alternative for the ordinary Doxology. We find an increase of alternative canticles, as, "Blessed God, Lord God of our fathers," for the first morning canticle, and Psalm cxxx. for the second. But Psalms cannot, surely, serve the purpose in hand so well as canticles. The Benedictus is now put in its right place before Jubilate, and is no longer, as in the book of 1789, absurdly and unnecessarily omitted on the first morning; but leave again is given to omit the remaining eight, save on Sundays in Advent. Imagine their omission on Christmas Day! In the Apostles' Creed we are glad to see that the article of the Descent is made obligatory; but we wish that the optional substitution of the Nicene Creed in the morning prayer were increased in combination with a rubric of the Communion Office, prescribing the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene after the Gospel, "unless one of them has been used immediately before in the Morning Prayer." If American patience cannot endure two Creeds within an hour, it would be better to omit the Apostles' Creed; maintain, as in the case of the Nicene at the Holy Communion. In the evening, after the introductory texts come, "Let us humbly confess our sins unto Almighty God," as an alternative (which would often be acceptable) for "Dearly beloved brethren;" but we must observe that if the familiar Exhortation is to be read, the prefatory text or texts ought to refer to confession of sin, for otherwise the mention of "sundry places" loses its force. There is an alternative Evening Confession, drawn up by some one with an imperfect ear for rhythm; it would be difficult to render it chorally. Magnificat and Antiphona are happily supplied to their due honor; and perhaps as this step has been taken, it may have seemed too bold to withdraw either of the two fragments of Psalms, which, in the absence of the proper Canticles, now serve as alternatives for Psalm xcvi. and lxxvii. It is needless to say that the practice rule should be never to substitute a Psalm for an evangelist's canticle; and the exceptions should be really infrequent. What is the use of suggesting, by way of yet further variation, that in Lent Psalm xlii. may be used as the first canticle, and Psalm xliii. as the second? This shows a strange defect of what may be called ritual feeling. It is somewhat surprising that the Nicene at the end of the Creed at Evening Prayer is cancelled. The evening verses are also increased by borrowing from the English series, with the substitution of "our rulers" for "the King."

The Third Evening Collect altered in the existing book, retains its English form. A Prayer for the resident stranger, distinct from that in Morning Prayer, has been adapted from our first Collect for the Sovereign in Communion; and "Assist us mercifully" is substituted at Evening Prayer for the Prayer of St. Chrysostom. We wish the revisers had ventured on restoring "catholic," instead of "universal," in the Prayer for all Conditions. An office consisting of the bestitudes and three prayers may be substituted for the latter portion of Evening Prayer, but it reads like a crude piece of "fancy ritual," and is wholly devoid of intercession. We regret that, in the Litany, the rapid vagueness of "From all inordinate and sinful affections" has not been exchanged for the stern directness of the existing words. Prudential as it is always a safeguard of purity, and there is some moral difference between terms which grasp the conscience and terms which it can contrive to evade. Recent American experience, we presume, has caused the insertion of a new clause, deprecatory of "fire and flood." It is curious that more attention has not been devoted to these pleasantry in the Prayer Book which long ago provoked Bishop Wren's criticism. Not only are "acknowledge and confess," "dissemble nor cloak," allowed to stand in the daily exhortation, but "crafts of the devil" are still followed up, in the next sentence but one, by a mention of his "deceits." American prayer-books are not always so "kindly fruits of the earth." "O Saviour of the world," etc., is seasonably inserted after "O Christ, hear us." The occasional prayers and thanksgivings are increased in number. One, for persons preparing for confirmation, is deficient in reference to the grace of the Holy Spirit. There are some collects for leets for misous, and for the increase of the ministry. One "for all who are dependent on the public care" tenderly associates "prisoners" with "the poor, the sick, the children." Several prayers for spiritual grace supply a void which must have been felt in the ordinary American books, as in our own, in the Penitential Office for the Wednesday, consisting of the second part of our Communion; the Office for "Thanksgiving Day, or Harvest Home"—a sort of variation of matins, combining the topics of agricultural success and American nationality—has been enlarged and transferred to this place.

There are some alterations in the Occasional Offices. Among the collects we are glad to see provision made for alternatives on the three chief festivals, two of the collects thus added being taken from the Prayer Book of 1549. These may be serviceable at second celebrations. One of the defects in our book is the want of variety of collects for the principal seasons. "Enrichment" in this respect would be an easy task; the only difficulty would lie in selecting from the ample stores of the "Gelasian" or "Gregorian" Sacramentaries. The Book Annexed has special collects for the several days in Holy Week, and for Monday and Tuesday in Easter and Whitsun weeks. But we think that ancient Latin collects might well have been utilized for any of these days. The new collect for Maundy-Thursaday is not felicitous in its combination of the cup of the Agony with the cup of the Eucharist, and the Easter Tuesday collect is unsatisfactory as having no reference to the Resurrection. We are glad to see a correction of the strange oversight which, in 1549, turned an address to Christ as King of Glory, with an entreaty not to be left comfortless, into a prayer to God the Father. The recovery of the Festival of the Transfiguration is indeed an enrichment, and we are glad that the convention rejected the suggestion, so unobjectionable, which would have transferred the observance from the traditional 6th of August to a day in January. But the collect is not so good as, for instance, that in the Sarum Breviary.

In the Communion Service it is well suggested that the Decalogue may be omitted at the discretion of the minister, and that the same day in the same church, its place, when omitted, being taken (according to Nonjurant and Scottish usage) by the Evangelical Summary of the Law, which may also, as at present, be read after the Decalogue. It is provided that "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord," may be said or sung after the Gospel, and "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," may now or later to be repeated before it. The rubric as to the Creed has already been mentioned. The word "absolution" is still absent from the Exhortation, and from the rubric after the Confession. It is clearly provided that the people shall not join their voices with the priest's in "Therefore with angels . . . saying." A proper preface, one or the other of two, is made obligatory on Trinity Sunday. In the Collects after the Communion, "Direct us" is still retained instead of "Prevent us;" we submit that "direct" is a most inadequate representation of the ideas theologically associated with gratia prevarians. Some rubrics are added to the two which now follow the Communion Office. One of these is based on our rubric, but it allows of two as a minimum, which is a gain.

In the Baptismal Office, we wish that the articles of the Creed might be recited at length, as among ourselves, and according to ancient custom. A brief reference to them collectively is much less solemn and impressive. The signing with the cross may still, on request, be omitted; is not this weakness yet overgrown! The oversight of 1661, which makes the first "I certify you" stop short of its proper conclusion, is partly corrected. The word "priest," so carefully employed throughout our Office for Baptism of Adults, is still retained in the rubric for the Confirmation Office, as enlarged by the rubric of Acts viii. by a form of presentation borrowed from that in the Ordinal, and by a precise and full reiteration of vows preceding the question, "Do ye here," etc. But the confusing use of "confirm" is not got rid of. There is an alternative final prayer, partly taken from the explanation of the words of the Catechism. The brief Marriage Service is not altered. The Visitation Office, although still silent as to confession and absolution, is enriched by several occasional prayers, including some to be said for the dying, which are based on Bishop Cosin's "Devotions." But our Office for the Visitation of the Sick, and our Lord, we commend. . . . Acknowledge a sheep of Thine own fold. It is inappropriate to alter "Lord" into "Father." An introit, Psalm cxvii., is provided for Communion of the Sick, and an abridged form is indicated for urgent cases. In the Burial Office the rubric is altered to "I commend thy soul to God." An alternative office is proposed for the case of infants or young children. From its tone, previous baptism would seem to be implied; but this is not rubrically expressed, as in Bishop Seabury's similar Office, included in Dr. Beadley's "Life of him." We are surprised to find no shorter session given for the children in ordinary cases. No change is suggested in the Ordinal, and only slight changes in the Offices of Consecration of a Church or of Institution of Ministers; thus there is to be no mention of the dates at which they were added to the rest of the Prayer Book, the effect of which omission will be to obliterate all distinction between them and the preceding Offices. The bishop is to be ordinarily the instigator, and, with the clergy, is expressly bidden to "enter the chancel."

This is a general account of the alterations now proposed. We presume not to enter into details, but to refer to the present American canonists, as to whether the convention which is to meet in 1886 will be legally free to modify any of them without "substantial" change, and to pass them in that modified form on the ground that they are virtually the same amendments which were formulated by the convention of 1880. The question turns on the construction of a rule of 1811, that no change shall be made in the Prayer Book until it has been communicated to the several dioceses by one convention, and adopted in the next. But however this may be, we should be disposed, in all respect and brotherly goodwill, to suggest that more time should be taken for the completion of this work of liturgical enrichment. Many of the proposals now in question are excellent; but others will be improved by reconsideration in the light of fuller ritual study, such as will be sure to produce a more exact and cultured ritual et cetera—perhaps we may, without offence, add, a more solemn and impressive American. What the Book Annexed presents to us in the way of amendment is, on the whole, good; but if subjected to a deliberate recreation, it would, we predict, become still better. If thus improved by the convention of 1886, it might be finally adopted by the convention of 1889.

NEW BOOKS.

DISCOVERIES IN AMERICA. By Matthew Arnold. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co.) pp. 387.

The titles of these three lectures are "Numbers," "Literature and Science," and "Emerson." The key-note of the first is that "wisdom resides in choice minorities," of the second, that letters embody permanent thought, while science reveals only evanescent phenomena, and of the third, Mr. Arnold's judgment as a critic on Emerson. We can say in the outset that all are admirably worth reading simply as specimens of style and of lively thought. The first seems to us to be, on the whole, very admirable, in spite of some surface blemishes of geological criticism. With the second, also, we are in accord, because we wholly believe in its principle. As to the third, we take issue with Mr. Arnold. We hold that Emerson was the first of American poets, and that we could, if we had space, point out passages equalling anything written in this century on either side of the Atlantic. It is with these that Mr. Arnold gives no sign of any acquaintance, though doubtless he must have read them. It seems to us that the mere accident of popularity was wanting in Emerson's case because of the very perfection of his art, and that a century hence his great superiority will only be fully known. Mr. Arnold takes occasion to say some pleasant things about America in the course of these lectures, but he does it with that air which it seems all but impossible for an Englishman to avoid, viz., of air of intending to influence England by what he says, and therefore the air of measuring all things by the English standard. Only one in a million of Englishmen seems able to rise above this, and Mr. Arnold is not that one. Nevertheless we admit that we have enjoyed these essays greatly, and that we are ready to welcome them as belonging to that order of pure literature which is a real contribution to the world's thought. We have said that we find some traces of Mr. Arnold's neologism here and there. Notably on page 19 he treats the famous prophecy of Isaiah respecting Emmanuel "as uttered of a contemporary prince of the house of David." But we can forgive that, for what he has said concerning French literature (with the reservation that it only applies in part to the same), because it is the expression of a very full and clear temper of mind. It will apply with equal force to much of the modern English school the erotics of Swinburne, Dante, Rossetti and others. At least these lectures are a protest against Materialism, in favor of high thought and noble expression, and are at least free from the conventional snobbery of the age. They are fresh, outspoken and sincere; and if one does not agree with them in all points, one can yet take pleasure in them, as in the conversation of a friend with whom one does not always agree, but is never disposed to quarrel. It is not easy to forget that the training of Rugby in its best days has been the source, it may be of the peculiarities, but certainly of the good points in the writings of Matthew Arnold, and one much to the spirit to which is owed the writings of Tom Hughes, and the brilliant, if erratic, pages of Dean Stanley.

HOWARD, THE CHRISTIAN HERO, by Laura C. Holaday, author of "The Ladies of the White House," etc., etc. (New York: Funk & Wagnalls.) pp. 253. Price $1.00.

We understand this book to be designed as a defence of General Howard. Into the merits of the controversy concerning the Freedman's Bureau we do not care to enter. We presume that a man who was educated to the high standard of honor which is set up at West Point, and who was unquestionably moved by a strong philanthropic motive, would assuredly keep his hands clean from unlawful gain; and we can easily see that, having to deal with vast responsibilities under a very discretionary rule, he might most easily have laid himself open to unreserved censure, without the power of complete justification. But we do not feel that a lady, with the natural impulse of the sex toward vehement partisanship, would make the best counsel for the accused. It seems to us that there is a favor of panegyric about this work which will not advance the matter in hand. General Howard's life has certainly been a very noble one in its aims; and taking for granted, as we do, that it has not failed of these, we could wish him a less enthusiastic and more practised advocate. As with another Christian hero, "Chinese Gordon," the story of his life requires to be told in the most careful and conservative fashion. Men of that temperament make mistakes, and it is essential to show that the mistakes are simply errors of the head and not of the heart. This is no slight task, but one which needs the cool, discriminating, almost cynical composure of a male writer. Above all, such a work should be free from all suspicion that it is undertaken in the spirit of book manufacturing.

POEMS. Original and Translated. By Charles T. Brooks, with a Memoir by Charles W. Wendte. Selected and edited by W. P. Andrews. (Boston: Roberts Brothers.) pp. 253. Price $1.25.

It is not every reader who will fully enjoy these finished verses of Charles T. Brooks. To those who knew him, whatever came from his pen acquired a personal charm, a poetical delicacy, simply from the fact that the verse was his and reminded one of him. He transferred some portion of his rare and delicate nature into his work, so that it was felt to be poetical by reason of being the expression of his thought. It was, doubtless, for this reason that the memoir was prefixed to this little selection from his poems. That, too, is one of very pleasant memories to those who knew and never ceased to love him, but offers to the stranger very little of moment. His was the quiet, uneventful life of a New England minister, but to his many friends it was a valuable and precious life indeed. Mr. Brooks was one of the old-fashioned Unitarians who broke away from the severe bonds of New England Calvinism, but however theologically incorrect in their definitions, never lost their faith in a personal Saviour. "They believed better than they knew," and though identified somewhat with the "advanced" movement among the Unitarians, they were separated by an immeasurable gulf from the modern "free religionists." They had a real reverence and sympathy for the offices of religion, whereas the modern school have been and are conspicuous for a marked irreverence. Had the Church been present in the right way to the New England Unitarians it would have drawn in far the larger part of them. As it was, it stood as the Tory creed of the ante-Revolutionary days, and the representative of the Middle States worship, and therefore it was alien to the men of Massachusetts.

GL'ENAV'ERIL; or, the Metamorphoses. A Poem in Six Books. By the Earl of Lytton (Edwin Meredith). Books II., III., IV., V., VI. (New York: D. Appleton & Co.) Price $1.00. pp. 646.

The remaining parts of "Glenav'eri" do not incline us to vary our opinion. Earl Lytton has the double disadvantage of being the son of his father and of being by disposition an imitator. In this poem he has copied, both in style and metre, the "King Arthur" of his father, and he has not taken the pains to read the brilliant, if somewhat faulty, model he has taken. "Glenav'eri" is a novel in verse, turning upon the somewhat hackneyed theme of a change of infants in the cradle. It is marked by something of the same aristocratic democracy which distinguished the elder Bulwer; but there is a want of finish painfully apparent. Many lines, and even stanzas, are hopelessly prosaic. There are fine passages here and there, but the whole would be vastly improved by boiling down into half the compass. Some of the situations are, we think, more violent than his father's taste would sanction; and while the plot is undoubtedly ingenious, it will strike most readers as being upon a key pitched quite too high for ordinary human nature. We do not give an outline of the story, for it is only for the story that it will be generally read; but it is only fair to say that if read for the story, brilliant passages will be discovered. The best portion is the Swiss episode, in the Third Book. There is, too, a very curious ideal of a new settlement to be made on "government lands" in the United States territory—a sort of cross between the Hughes scheme and the French Icaria. This will be found in the Fourth and Fifth Books. One thing there is not, however, and that is, any "villain" or wrong-doing in the story, which is very like a salad-dressing without vinegar, pepper, or mustard.

THE NOVA CELESTIALIS, or, Bhagavad-Gita. (From the Mahabharata.) Being a discourse between Arjuna, Prince of India, and the Supreme Being under the form of Krishna. Translated from the Sanscrit text, by Edwin Arnold, M.A., author of "The Light of Asia," etc., etc. (Boston: Roberts Brothers.) pp. 158. Price $1.00.

We have no doubt but that this is an admirable version of the original. Mr. Arnold's reputation is beyond all doubt in this direction. Our question is, as to whether it deserves the pains taken, and upon this point, we have not been able to decide affirmatively. It seems to us that the usual defect of Indian thought, viz., vagueness and want of true knowledge of the Divine revelation is here apparent.

It is talent of a high order which Mr. Arnold has lavished upon material not deserving the effort.

We question also the method of Mr. Arnold in one respect, his copious use of Sanscrit terminology. However good it may seem to him to use an Eastern word in default of an English equivalent, he ought to consider that to the ordinary English reader this has no meaning whatsoever, except as the context can supply one. It is yet a violent presumption that literary people in general, not to speak of the mass of readers, are acquainted with the literature of the East. This habit of his simply mars the whole meaning of his lines. We presume it is in part inadvertence; but this would be a fault, if indulged in by the translator of a modern European tongue, and is much more so in the case of a language which only the specialists of his peculiar walk can be expected to know anything about.

LITERATURE.

THE LEONARD SCOTT Publishing Company are hereafter to do their own printing, and their reprints will appear promptly.

MACMILLAN & CO. are to bring out an American edition of Dr. Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory," which has had such a run in England.

CUTTLES, UPHAM & CO. announce "Fruit, Pastes, Syrup and Preserves," by the author of the "Ugly Girl Papers," and also David Mason's "Yachting Views," including the Priscilla, Puritan and Genesta.

"HALF-HOURS in the Holy Land," and "Half-Hours in the Forest," both illustrated, and "Immortality," a clerical symposium by the Rev. W. J. Knox Little and others, are among Mr. Whittaker's fall announcements.

MARION HURLAND, in September Babyhood, has a paper on "Baby's Nurse," and continues her "Nursery Cookery." Every part of the number is interesting, and we call special attention to Eleanor Kirk's "Compulsory Kising," and the continuation from "Stray Lines from a Baby's Journal" by a Physician.

The Fortnightly Review and Shakespearians for August (Leonard Scott Publishing Co.) are at hand. The former has a paper on "Church and State in Scotland," by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and one on "Death and Aftwards," by Edwin Arnold. Shakespearians is devoted to one subject, but it is one of ever-tiring phase and interest.

"SCRIPTURES for Young People," edited by Dr. Bartlett and Professor Peters, of the Philadelphia Divinity School; "The Treaty of Utrecht," by James W. Gerard; "The Evolution of Contemporary Religious Thought," by Count Gobler D'Alviella, and Roosevelt's "Hunting Trip of a Ranchman," are some of the books from the press of G. P. Putnam's Sons for the fall season.

A good deal of the matter in the September Church Eclectic is original, or from American sources, as in the case with the first four articles: "The Three Creeds, II," by the Rev. J. E. Burn; "A Review of Mr. Footman's Work," by the Rev. H. Macbeth; "The First Three Bishops of Massachusetts," by Dr. G. C. Shattuck, and "The Law of the First Fruits," from Bishop Seymour's convention address; and also with the sixth article, which is "Report of the C. N. Y. Committee on the Revision of the Prayer Book." Besides these, the number contains selections from English periodicals, miscellany, correspondence, summaries, etc., of the usual varied and high character.

"Few volumes have ever been published containing so many interesting names, whether as subjects or as authors; and few others are destined for us by those which violate the venerable privacy of public individuals."

"If my indignation from my own indignation in reading these stories, the reader will find most of them to concern national events. He will have the pleasure of seeing Charles Dickens in his most engaging form, delineated by his daughter; and Dan Snary of Westminster Abbey, described by Canon Ferry, his associate and colleague. He will see Thackeray, sitting on a trunk, chatting with a chance acquaintance; and the Duke of Devonshire, as he is supposed to say by day to his secretary and amanuensis, Emerson, Longfellow, Prescott, Willa Waxter, Beaumont, Gladstone, Macaulay, Channing, and others, as they are described by those who have seen and known them well. Here, also, are Emerson, John, Green, Lowell, and other great men, who are described by the courtesy eyes of the staunchest Republicans, after their conviction, and sometimes their cordial respect."

"THE EXAMPLE OF HIS PATIENCE."

BY MRS. PAUL DAHLGREN.

"Patient 'neath betrayer's Kiss!"
 Do we think enough of this,
 When lured on to misery's brink
 From some tempter back we shrink!
 Are we not too prone to show
 That our creed is "blow for blow!"
 Patient 'neath the High Priest's scorn,
 Every insult meekly borne,
 Do we ever call to mind
 That dear Saviour's face resigned,
 When we feel the bitter smart
 Of some word-wound in the heart!
 Patient 'neath desertion's sting!
 Ah! to this thought we should cling
 When we stand alone in tears,
 While the friends of happier years
 "Pass by on the other side,"
 'E'en a look of love denied.

Woman! thou whose earnest face
 So oft fills the saddest place,
 Thou whose life holds many a thorn,—
 Learn in lot how'er forlorn,
 Patience is divine and wins
 Pardon, to condone all sins.

Think too of the glory thine,
 Which on Scripture's page doth shine;
 Who alone, when that last hour
 Came to test the Saviour's power,
 Steadfast stood on Calvary's height
 While disciples took their flight.

Thou canst then best learn and teach
 That the woes which come to each,
 Whether sorrow, or pain, or grief,
 Need not wound us past relief,
 If through life we keep the thought
 Of the power Christ's patience wrought.

Patient then ye too will be,
 When man's cold contumely
 Chills the heart and clouds the life,
 Changing love and peace to strife.
 Patient to the end, when He
 Who our every tear doth see,
 Will reward those who endure
 With a rest forever sure.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

The Children's Home.

"I pray you hear my song of a nest,
 For it is not long—
 You shall never light in a summer quest,
 The bushes among—
 Shall never light on a prouder sifter,
 A father nestful, nor ever know
 A softer sound than their tender twitter,
 That wail like did come and go."
 —Jean Ingelow.

"A maid of fullest heart she was,
 Her spirit's lovely flame
 Nor dazzled nor surprised, because
 It always burned the same.
 And in the heaven ward path she trod,
 Fair was the wife fore show;
 A Mary in the house of God,
 A Martha in her own."
 —Putmore.

There are pauses in life, strange pauses, every now and then.

The tide of human circumstance comes flows sluggishly and sometimes swiftly.

There is a turn, a slight ebbing or flowing;
 uncovered rocks glisten in the sun; there are colored sparkles, light frothings; the foam and bubbles burst in the sunlight; snow-white sails gleam on the horizon. The children build up their sand-castles, and deck them proudly with sea-weed and shells.
 In the evening the golden tide silvers and breaks into dark blue shadows—how fair it is, how grand! In the morning the children rise early and go down to the shore to seek their treasures, but, alas! everything is changed: a sullen wind sweeps over the sands, the sea is all gray, the sky hangs low, the waves break into foaming heaps, terrible rolling avalanches of gray froth;
 the gulls fly inland; there are rumors of wrecks; the fishermen's wives grope wearily to and fro. So it is with the tide of life; so does it ebb and flow in calm and storm.
 Now and then there is a break of summer monotony—changeless, unvarying, almost colorless; the tints are pallid—all grays or misty blues.

And then comes a long waiting, as the children wait for some ship that never comes after all. And just as, weary of play, and weary of constructing battlements of sand for the waves to demolish, they watch for the dim white sail which flutters for a moment on the horizon, so do their elders sit afar off, listening, sometimes for months, sometimes for years, and waiting for what the tide shall bring them.

Such a pause had come to Rotha—a break, when the strange tide of events that for the last ten months had swept her on so hurriedly from one transition to another had at length rolled away, leaving her bruised and battered indeed, but with such soundness in her; when months and even years sped on in a calm unvarying round of duty not unmix'd with pleasure; when Time, that great healer, did its salutary work, and Garton became but a beautiful memory, a link onward and heavenward.

Five years, five whole years, and Rotha is Rotha Maturin still.

Brief must be the record of these years, during which Rotha strove more and more in her honest woman's endeavor to follow out the divine precept, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might;"
 when she took up new work and found it rich with blessings; when "full measure meted out was pressed into her bosom," and she reaped her woman's harvest of pure unselfish joys.

Five years, five long years, and the vicar looks proudly round at his growing lads, Guy—almost a man now—and Rufus, half a head taller than himself; and the mother's hair is quite gray, but her face is sweeter in its chastened gravity than it has ever been before; and Robert is working still, uncomplaining, but sad, in his far-off home; and the swallows fly down on the marble cross, and the daisies grow up among the grass on the dead boy's grave and on Belle's; and in the church, just opposite to where Rotha sits, is a noble painted window, with the Man of Sorrows bearing His cross along the bitter way; and under it is written:

"In memory of
 GARTON ORD,
 Who died December 20th, 186—,
 Aged 33,
 IN HOC SPECTRO."

It was soon after the anniversary of his death that something very unexpected befell Rotha. Mr. Effingham made her an offer.

He had come up very boldly to Bryn to prefer his request, and bore himself in a way sufficiently manly; but Rotha shrank back, feeling herself wounded, she hardly knew why.

"I never gave you any encouragement—any right to speak to me like this, Mr.
 Effingham," she said, turning pale and trembling at this strange story of love. Her tone was repellent, almost indignant.

"I never said that you did," he returned sullenly; "but when a man loves a girl I think he has a right to tell her so."

Poor George Effingham! He had a heart somewhere in spite of his shallowness, and, to do him justice, he was smitten by the woman as well as the heiress. Rotha relented at the sight of his crestfallen looks.
 He had not much to say for himself; but he was tolerably honest, and then there were tears of positive disappointment in the poor fellow's eyes. Her next words were more gentle.

"Perhaps I ought to thank you, Mr.
 Effingham. Many girls would feel themselves honored by what you have told me.
 If I have been impatient or ungrateful, you must forgive me; it is not my fault that I cannot forget him," continued the girl, bursting into tears. "I don't think that I shall ever be able to listen to any one after Gar."

But, as he turned to go, she held out her hand to him with a little contrition for her hardness.

"You must not be hurt or angry because I cannot forget my trouble. I do not want to be any one's wife now that poor Gar is gone. I do not mean to marry—never—never," cried the girl, with a flush. "But I hope I shall be your friend always," smiling in the face of the discomfited young man. "There, go, Mr. Effingham, and God bless you!"

Rotha kept her word, for Nettie did not marry the widower after all; but fifteen months afterwards she married George Effingham, and made him the best little wife possible. George told his wife everything, like a man. But he was hardly prepared for the confidence she gave him in return; he found that Nettie had loved Gar really and truly, and that many of her reckless and fantastic ways had grown out of her disappointment.

She never told Rotha, though Rotha guessed it; but they all three became excellent friends. Nettie gave up fifteen out of her three-and-twenty bosom friends when she married, and consoled herself instead with her babies. But if any one had asked who was the most notable housekeeper and the most domesticated little matron in the whole of Blackscarr, they would tell you that it was Mrs. Effingham.

This was the first little episode that disturbed Rotha's monotony; but by-and-by there was another, when a great work grew out of a little speech of the vicar's.

Rotha was still insisting on being Lady Bountiful at the vicarage; but at last the vicar—that most enduring of men—became restive, and told her it would not do at all;
 on which occasion he addressed her in the following words:

"It will not do, Rotha, and I really mean it. And now I am quite determined that we shall come to an understanding with one another, for this sort of thing must not go on."

"What sort of thing, Mr. Ord?"

"Now, Rotha, I can tell by that quiet curl of the lip that you are going to be troublesome; but I beg to inform you that I am quite serious."

"So am I—painfully so, I assure you. Now, Mr. Ord, what sort of thing?"

"Do you want me to publish a list of your iniquities? You are growing too barefaced a sinner for me to deal with. Never mind. I will serve you up a resumé, hot and strong. First, there was taking Mary away to Filey—a piece of generous forethought that prevented a relapse after Belle's death; then there were the travelling expenses to Zermatt, and maintaining an establishment there for two months, when Mary and the boys and Reuben were your visitors."

"And you would not be. Oh, do you think I have ever forgiven you that?"

"Forgiven, forsooth! because I had a little bit of manly independence left. I like that. But that was nothing to my feelings when I got home. The vicarage papered and painted from garret to basement—my servants bribed and made accessories to the plot—new carpets and curtains all over the house—fresh chintz in the drawing-room—a new easy-chair in the mother's room—a new-fangled writing-table and a lot of oak furniture in the study! When I think of it now," finished the vicar, passing his hand over his face to conceal a smile, "I almost wonder that I can have anything to do with such a criminal."

"Now, Mr. Ord, we have heard this almost twenty times. You forget that I heard you tell Nettie the other day that it did your heart good to see dear Mary's face light up at the sight of her renovated house. I am sure you never liked any writing-table so well as this."

"Bless her!" very nearly said the vicar, but he checked himself in time, and went on sternly with the list.

"I don't think perhaps I ought to mention the marble cross and the memorial window in the same category?"

"No—oh, no," faltered Rotha, with quivering lip, and the vicar, clearing his throat several times, went on in the same seriocomic manner.

"But I do not think that a clergyman's wife ought to dress as Mary does. I do not understand it myself, of course," continued the vicar, somewhat puzzled; "and, except that her dresses are black and shiny, I do not know much about it. But I do not think Mrs. Stephen Knowles ought to say, as she does, that Mrs. Ord wears the most expensive stuffs that are to be got. I heard her say so myself the other day." But, to his surprise, Rotha, after vainly trying to answer him in the same vein, suddenly burst into tears. "Nay, my dear child, I am only in jest. What is this?"

"I did not mean—I tried not. But, Mr. Ord, you must let me do this for Mary; you don't know how I love to do it, and I never had a sister. And now she is everything to me, and I want to feel that I am a sister to her in Belle's place."

"Dear Rotha, you are a better sister to her than ever Belle has been."

"No—no—don't say so; almost her last words were for Mary; and, if it were true, she would never think so."

"My faithful-hearted Mary, no—nothing should ever shake her belief in Belle's goodness and affection to herself. Dear Rotha, we are ending our conversation rather sadly. Don't fear for one moment that I shall ever call you to account for what you do for her. Be sisters in heart and deed if you will, but, Rotha, you have done enough for us now—let it rest here."

Rotha was silent for a moment, and then she said very gravely, "Do you really wish it?"

"Yes," he returned, without hesitation; "my circumstances are better now, since the burden of poor Belle's maintenance is withdrawn, and I have no longer to help Robert in supporting Gar. Robert is quite rich too, and he talked in his last letter of having his godson sent out to him."

"No, no," interrupted Rotha, hastily; "let it be Rufus—Rufe has no taste for learning, and Guy has. I will accede to all your conditions if you will only let me provide for Guy."

The vicar shook his head doubtfully, but Rotha laid her hand on his arm persuasively and went on:

"He is more than sixteen now, and is getting a great fellow—too big to be idle, and a burden to his father. In another year or two my boy"—Rotha always called Reuben her adopted son—"is going to Oxford. I am glad and thankful the dear boy is anxious to be a clergyman. Let Guy, Robert's godson, go with him; and let me feel," whispered Rotha, laying her cheek against the kind hand, "as though this were my monument to Gar, and that the two boys be loved so fondly may become faithful priests, as he would have been if he had been spared." And, deeply touched, the vicar, after a little hesitation, granted her request for his eldest born.

It was some words of his dropped shortly afterwards that gave Rotha the idea which she was so ready to carry out.

She was complaining to him that, in spite of her lavish gifts, her money seemed to accumulate rather than otherwise.

"We want so little, Meg and I, and we prefer to live simply," added Rotha. "And there seems so little chance of its finding its way, after all, into Robert's hands, or his children's either; for I fancy, after what has happened, that he will not marry any more than I shall."

"And it is my opinion that both will marry; but all in good time," prophesied the vicar, who was the only one who had a glimmering of Robert's secret.

Rotha looked surprised and a little hurt, for it was only six months since she had refused George Edingham; and Mary, her sole confidante, knew she had refused him, and Mary told everything to her husband. After such a proof of faithfulness to Garton's memory, she scarcely liked to be told that it was possible, nay, very probable, that she would marry after all; and Robert, too, who had cared for one woman for five years.

The vicar saw the girl's hot flush, but he took no notice. His knowledge of the world told him that Rotha would think very differently presently. "If I were you, I would seek some interest or object in which you might invest your surplus money. I don't know whether you have ever thought of such a thing, or whether it would exactly suit your views, but the surgeon of the Cottage Hospital at Thornborough told me that he wished it were possible to have a small branch establishment at Blackscar, or even Kirkby, that some of the convalescent children might have a month or two of pure sea air before returning to the wretched alleys and dens where they lived."

Rotha almost clapped her hands when she heard the vicar's words. "The very thing!" she exclaimed; "the very thing that Meg has been longing for—work among children, and I think," she added, with a quaint sadness, "that it will just suit me too."

And so it came about that the "Children's Home," as it was called, was established in Kirkby.

Rotha and Meg thought over the matter deeply before they matured their plans and laid them before the vicar. Meg was even more enthusiastic than Rotha, although Rotha threw herself heart and soul into the undertaking.

By the vicar's advice it was only begun on a small scale at first. Two or three of the whitewashed cottages adjoining the vicarage were taken and thrown into one, and furnished in the simplest manner. A young woman, whose sad history had brought her under Rotha's notice, was to be the nurse in charge, and an orphan, who had been trained under Mrs. Ord's own eye, would be sufficient for the cooking and cleaning. The "Little Sister," as she now began to style herself, was to be head matron and housekeeper, with Meg under her.

Perhaps the happiest hours that Rotha had ever spent since Garton's death were in fitting up and arranging her Children's Home. Mary found her often singing over her work as she sewed carpets or stitched blinds—nothing seemed to come amiss to her nimble fingers. The boys, Reuben and Guy especially—her two devoted knights, as the vicar dubbed them—worked hard in their leisure hours. The three gardens had been thrown into one, and made a tolerably large enclosure. Guy and Reuben laid down the new grass sods, and planted the privet-hedge to shut out the palings; while Laurie and even Arty were never weary of rolling the fresh gravel. And Rufus, who was no mean carpenter, put up shelves, fitted up the cupboard with pegs, knocked his head valiantly against the low cottage ceiling in hanging the clean dimity curtains, and was the most good-natured aid-de-camp to the two women that could be found.

His last duty was to put up the huge board over the entrance, on which Reuben had been bestowing infinite care, and paint on it "The Children's Home." It was put up at the High street entrance, facing the church, and deeply affected Rotha when she went down to the bottom of the garden with the boys to read it.

"How big it is!—I can read it from here," said Arty, contemplating it with feelings of awe.

"It really looks like a beginning, Meg," whispered Rotha; and Meg, always chary of words, dropped her eye-glass with a satisfied nod.

The next day was a perfect fête to the young workers, for the vicar and his wife and the new curate, Mr. Trogarten, a distant relation of Sir Edgar's, were to come on a tour of inspection; and Nettie and Annet Eliza were to be of the party; and in the afternoon the first patient, a crippled boy afflicted with abscesses, was to come over from Thornborough.

Rotha had come very early in the morning; but, early as it was, Rufus and Laurie had rolled the paths freshly and watered the grass, while Reuben was nailing up the last beautiful illuminated text that Rotha had finished late last night, just fronting the entrance—"Suffer the little children to come unto Me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Every room and nearly every cot was furnished with the same illuminated texts, all appropriate to the sick and suffering little ones who were to be received under that roof.

The visitors arrived punctually at the appointed hour, and the boys formed already a sort of guard of honor to receive them; but neither the vicar nor Mary could forbear a smile when they saw the little sister. Rotha and Meg had arranged that, for convenience sake as well as decorum, they would wear a simple uniform of gray during their working hours at the Home; and Rotha wore a little cap over her bright hair, which suited her infinitely better than it did Meg; for, if possible, Mrs. Carruthers looked more gauche than usual in the homely gray dress and linen collar and cuffs that looked so natty on Rotha, who came bustling up with her keys dangling from her trim waist-band to receive her friends.

"Peace be to this house!" said the vicar, taking off his broad-brimmed hat; but one cannot repeat the whole of that solemn beautiful blessing, which thrilled those who heard it. And then, stepping over the threshold, he spoke a few forcible words on that text, "I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me. I was sick, and ye visited me." And then, kneeling down, he invoked a blessing on the house and the work that was to be that day undertaken for the glory of God, and for the relief of His suffering children. "And oh," prayed the vicar, "may He who took the little ones in His gracious arms and blessed them, enter with us this day, and stretch out His hands in blessing over this house! May He strengthen the heart and hands of this ministering woman, that it may be said of her and all who follow her in this work, in that day of days, 'She hath done what she could.'"

There was a brief silence, hushed and full of feeling. "And now," said the vicar, rising and giving his hand to Rotha, "We are ready to follow you, and to see and admire all that is to be seen. And first, what room are we in?"

"They are all written up over the doors," returned Rotha in a low voice; for she was somewhat overcome by the solemnity of the vicar's address.

"This is called 'The Mother's Room,'" interrupted Rule eagerly, who had kept as near to his adopted mother as possible.

"I want to feel as though I am their mother," returned Rotha, bashfully, "and as though they were all my children for the time being. It will help me to be more patient and loving with them than I might otherwise be. This is where I shall write and keep my accounts, and receive visitors, and where Meg will sit too. I shall always be here from ten to one on every day in the week, and Meg from two to five in the afternoon. One or other of us will always be here."

"I see you mean to work it thoroughly," returned the vicar, smiling. "A very good arrangement; don't you think so, Tregarthen?" And then he looked round approvingly on the snug cottage parlor, with its cool summer matting and white curtains, and the fresh flowers on the little round table, and a beautiful engraving of "Christ Blessing Little Children" over the mantelpiece. The illumination for this room was Rotha's favorite one, "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." And on the table, as though willing to put the precept into practice, was a visitor's book, in which the vicar wrote the first entry, and a newly-lined account book, with a formidable array of pens bristling in a very large inkstand.

From this room they proceeded to the kitchen, where they were received by the smiling orphan, clad in a new print dress of alarming stiffness, over which she wore a snow-white bib-apron. "Come, show your cupboard, Emma," said the vicar. And the girl, curtsying and rosy with pleasure, showed the shelves, with their rows of shining pewter and china mugs; while Caroline, the nurse, a pleasant-looking young woman, slightly marked with the smallpox, led them into the storeroom, where Rotha's linen-press was, and where she was to keep her stores of groceries and jams and the simple medicines and salves that they were likely to need.

Leading out of this was the long low room where the children were to dine or have their lessons, and where they could also play on rainy days. There was no furniture but one long table and a few chairs and stools; but several beautiful prints, all sacred subjects, hung on the walls; and Mary noticed there were flowers tastefully arranged in this room, while a canary sang shrilly in a green cage, and a fine tabby cat and kittens reposed in a cushioned basket.

"Carrying out your theories, Rotha?" said the vicar, with a smile.

"Yes," returned Rotha softly. "I cannot imagine children without pets and flowers; to me it seems a part of their education. My children will delight in those kittens. If you open those cupboards, Nettie, you will find them full of picture-books and toys. You see the school-books are all bound neatly for use.

"I don't believe you have forgotten a single thing," cried Nettie, with a sigh, half admiring, half envious. "Just look at those little work-boxes for the girls, Mr. Tregarthen, and the patterns of wool-work for the boys. Why, Rotha, you could have done nothing else for months."

"You forget I have had Meg to help me; that is Meg's department," returned Rotha, blushing; and then they went up to the dormitories. There were only four neat little rooms, with three or four beds or cots apiece, all fitted up in the same pretty summer matting, and with white dimity curtains blowing in the fresh sea-breeze; over every bed was a picture, and a text underneath; and a white plaster angel on a bracket in every room seemed to keep guard over the little sufferers.

"Oh, Austin, is it not lovely?" whispered Mary, with tears in her eyes. "If only our darling Belle had been here to see it."

"She sees it now, perhaps," he returned; "and our Gar too." And Rotha, catching the words, looked out on the sunny ways, and thought how he would have liked it.

Rotha was greatly tired by all the excitement; she had worked early and late, too, and when all her visitors except Reuben had departed, she merely stayed to welcome her little patient—a perfect "Tiny Tim" of a child rejoicing in the extraordinary name of "Shirley Pearl;" and, leaving Meg to undress him and lay him in his little cot, she went slowly home, leaving Reuben to have tea at the vicarage with Guy, who was now his great chum.

When she got home she found a letter awaiting her from Robert, for they had kept up a steady correspondence now for months two years. Robert wrote extremely well, and one of his long letters was always a treat to Rotha. She had just written him a full account of her plans for her Children's Home, and doubtless this was in answer; so, asking Prue to bring her a cup of tea in her own room, she sat down by the open window to enjoy that and her letter together.

But the tea cooled, and Rotha's cheek grew white before she had read many lines; but long before she had finished it her face was burning, and, as it dropped from her hands, she put her head down on the window-sill and cried long and bitterly. But all she said was, "Poor Robert! poor Robert!" And then, "Oh, Gar, what would you say? Oh, Gar, never—never!" and kissed the gold keeper that guarded the glittering cross.

And yet it was more than two years since she had lost him—and it had been but a nine day's wonder after all—and Robert had written a letter such as few women could have resisted, and had shown her his heart with such a depth of passionate love in it that she might well weep and wring her hands, knowing that it was in vain.

What it had cost him to write it! and yet every line was tinged with hopelessness akin to despair. It was as though he knew that he tried his fate in vain, and still could not resist the attempt.

"What you will say, or what you will think, I dare not pause to ask myself, or I should never send this; but something within me forces me to speak, and demands to be heard. If I cannot write an answer from you now, perhaps the coming years may do something for me; not that I can afford to wait, God knows, for I am growing old and gray before my time with all this misery, but because I love you so, Rotha, with every fibre of my being, with every thought of my heart, as I have never—dear Belle, sweet saint, you know it now—loved or could love any other woman."

Well may she tremble and cover up her face with her hands, and cry out that it must be a mistake—Robert! Gar's brother!—and then call herself with saying the dear name over and over again. Does she feel now, as she must have done, that Gar was but a boy compared to this man? She reads on, page after page. Ah? he does not spare himself. She can hardly bear to read the generous self-accusing—the many acts of his past cruelty which he brings back to her recollection; it was as though he strove to humiliate himself even in her sight. Never, he tells her, has he forgiven himself—never is her face, so sweet and reproachful, absent from his mind for one moment; and then he speaks of the long atonement, of the dreary evenings when he and his remorse are brought face to face, and how little by little he feels himself purified by suffering, and more worthy to address her.

"Not that my pride would even now tell you this," he finished, "if I did not know that I might at any day command an independent position in England. But, Rotha, unless I grow weak—which I may, heaven knows, seeing to what I have come—I have almost sworn that nothing but you can ever recall me; but speak that word, Rotha, and I come.

"Yours, through and through, however you may scorn my love—ROBERT ORD."

Ah, well may she make herself nearly ill with weeping, and creep to her bed that her faithful Meg may not guess the cause of her grief. Not for days—days during which her white weary looks move the vicar and his wife to compassion, not unmixd with curiosity—does she write her answer. "She is in trouble," she tells them; but begs them earnestly not to ask her why, and then goes and sits among her children till her sweet face grows calm and serene again. But that is not until she has written to him, not until she has penned a few lines with many tears, in which she tells him that she loves him dearly, dearly; that she will pray for him, and think of him day and night, but that she cannot forget Gar. No, she cannot, she cannot! And then bids God bless him for his faithful friend and sister—ROTHA.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The Broken Clause.

"Come, lest this heard should, cold and east away,
Die ere the guest adorned she entertain;
Lest eyes which never saw Thine earthly day, Should miss Thy heavenly retain."
"Come weary-eyed from seeking in the night,
Thy wanderers stray upon the pathless void,
Who wounded, dying, cry to Thee for light,
And cannot find their lord."
—Jean Ingelous.

But another episode occurred shortly which disturbed Rotha not a little, and which for a short time broke up the tranquillity of Bryn.

It was about four or five months after the Children's Home had been established. So far the trial had been a success. Nine children had been received as patients, and Rotha was now at work in earnest.

Every one who saw it—and visitors were numerous during the first few weeks—said that the home was admirably managed, as indeed it was.

Rotha was there every morning, and never left till Meg took her place. Rotha's part was to give out stores, write orders for the tradesmen, keep the accounts, and receive visitors. She also looked after Caroline and saw that the dormitories were kept tidy and ventilated.

Meg's duties were different; she presided over the children's meals, gave short lessons to those who were well enough to receive them, taught the little girls work, and sang hymns with them, and when the weather was fine took them down to the shore, where she might be seen any lovely afternoon among the sand-hills with a crippled baby in her arms, pushing Shirlie Pearl's perambulator before her, and surrounded by a crew of sickly or limping little ones. This was Meg's own work, and she dearly loved it.

Of course Rotha's time was greatly taken up, and an afternoon or an evening at the vicarage became a rare treat. In general it was understood that Meg and she were to have their evenings free, and to spend them there in the old way, but Meg often stopped till the little ones were safely tucked up in their dormitories, and Shirlie had left off moaning himself to sleep. Meg used to sing the Evening Hymn with the children, and then come out through the sweet summer air to meet Rotha going to or from church. Rotha used to smile, but she never reproached Meg for her delay. She knew that Meg began to centre all her happiness within those cottage walls. The children loved Meg almost more than they did Rotha. She told them quaint stories when they sat among the sand-hills, and she could carry two or three together in her strong arms when they were tired. When the children were sick they always asked Meg to come and sing to them. Meg could sing them "Ye faint one with ye goldene locks" as well as she could "The Three Kings" and the Manger songs. Rotha, returning for her afternoon, would peep in sometimes into the refectory, as it was called, and find Meg sitting on the floor with the children swarming round her, telling the story of "Henny Penny," or "Goody Two Shoes," or the "Little Tiny, Tiny Woman"—kittens and children and Meg, and sometimes Rotha's little gray skye Fidgets, all in a chaotic mass together. The youngest child there, a mere baby, would clap her hands and say "Meg" if asked whom she loved, though she always finished with "Meg, and little mother too, and Meg loves Annie."

It would have been no wonder if Rotha grew absorbed in her sweet work; but she did not forget the duties that her position entailed, and, though she told all her friends frankly that she had no time for either paying or receiving mere calls of ceremony, she still accepted invitations for a quiet evening, and now and then dispensed hospitality by throwing open her pretty rooms and making all her friends heartily welcome.

These evenings were much sought after, for Rotha was an admirable hostess under Mrs. Ord's chaperonage, and among her most frequent visitors were Lady Tregarthen and Mr. Ramsay, who were both liberal subscribers to the Home.

Rotha had taken the vicar's advice, and received all voluntary donations and subscriptions, and after the first year it was found necessary to form a ladies' committee, when Rotha was unanimously elected as secretary and treasurer, and in a little while another cottage was added, and then another, as the applications became more numerous, until at last Rotha acceded to Mr. Ramsay's generous proposition to unite with her in building new and more spacious premises; and when this was done, which was not for some years after this story closes, Meg was elected as resident lady-superintendent, and spent the last years of a long and useful life among the children whom she so dearly loved.

One cloudy afternoon late in October Meg had occasion to go into Blackscar on some business connected with the Home. Rotha, remaining on duty during her absence, was sitting writing in the mother's room, with baby Annie fast asleep at her feet, when there was a quick light tap at the door, and the vicar entered.

"I thought Mrs. Carruthers was here, Rotha," he said rather anxiously. "Is she up at Bryn then?"

"No, she has just gone into Blackscar, and I do not expect her back till nearly five. Why, did you want her?" she asked, struck by something grave in the vicar's tone.

In reply he went to the door and shut it carefully, and then, taking a seat, stirred the fire thoughtfully and warmed his hands over it, for the afternoons were growing decidedly chilly.

"Do you think you could find her?" he asked after a pause, during which Rotha's curiosity had been strongly roused by his unusual gravity.

"Well, I am not quite sure that I can. She has gone to the infirmary, and to the bank, and to several shops. Is anything the matter, Mr. Ord?"

"There is no time to be lost," continued the vicar musingly, and rubbing his hands slowly over each other. "The rector said so, and I suppose he knew. Rotha, who do you think is lying ill, apparently dying, only two or three miles from here?"

Rotha looked at him earnestly for a moment, and then the truth flashed on her.

"Do you mean Jack Carruthers, poor Meg's husband?" and the vicar nodded.

"I have just come from the rector's, Rotha. I hurried on here thinking I could find her before I took the train to Thornborough. You know I have to preach a charity sermon at St. Luke's?"

"Well!" exclaimed Rotha breathlessly. "I must tell you what he said. But you must find Mrs. Carruthers, for there is no time to be lost. Mr. Hodgson sent for me directly he found out the truth."

"Early this morning he was sent for by the landlady of the 'Pig and Whistle,' a little public-house on the Leatham road, just before you turn off by the path that leads to the Leatham woods. I daresay you have often passed it; there is an old stone drinking-trough placed under a very fine elm tree, with a small green before it, always full of geese."

"Yes, yes," returned Rotha, eagerly; "I went in once with Meg to ask my way."

"Well, the landlady is a very tidy body, and she told Mr. Hodgson when he got there that she was greatly troubled about a poor man who had come in for a night's lodging about ten days ago, and had lain there ever since, growing from bad to worse, till at last the doctor said that he had not many hours to live, and she thought she had better fetch a clergyman to him. She described him when he came in as very emaciated and miserable looking, almost as though he had been half-starved, with a driven, hunted look in his eyes, as though he was not quite in his right mind; and she described to the rector his moaning and restless picking at the clothes as a sign that the end was not far off."

"Oh, my poor Meg!" sighed Rotha; but the vicar went on.

"I must tell you exactly what happened, and then leave it in your hands. Mr. Hodgson went up, of course, and found the poor creature just as she described, and a more forlorn object the rector said he had never seen. He had evidently been once a fine-looking man, the rector said, but a more hollow, wasted face he had never seen, rendered more intensely death-like by the ragged black whiskers and beard, and eyes unnaturally large. He seemed pleased to see Mr. Hodgson, and told him scraps of his history as well as he could. He had been a sheep-farmer in Australia, and had afterwards gone to the diggings; had then lost all, and worked his way home again; and in some drunken fray had broken a blood-vessel, and had lain in a hospital for months at the point of death. He gave his name as Jack Carruthers, and told Mr. Hodgson that he had a wife living, he supposed, near London; that he had made some attempts to find her, but had never succeeded. But his description of her to Mr. Hodgson so exactly resembled our Mrs. Carruthers, whom he had met several times at my house, that, without saying anything to the poor fellow, he brought back a scrap of his handwriting with him and sent for me at once."

"There can be no doubt that it is her husband, I suppose," interrupted Rotha, at this point.

"None, I think; but of course she will recognize his handwriting. Now, Rotha, I can do nothing more in the business myself, and I must leave it, as I said before, in your hands. Will you undertake to find Mrs. Carruthers for me, for I am afraid, from the rector's account, that this is the poor fellow's last night on earth? Mr. Hodgson has promised to go again to-morrow in case he should be alive. But he could make very little impression on him. All the time he was praying he was moaning out to 'Madge'—I suppose that was his wife—to come to him."

"I will go at once," returned Rotha, lifting up the sleeping child in her arms.

"And I will wait and go with you as far as the station," observed the vicar. And in another five minutes Rotha and he had left the house together.

The bank was already closed, but Rotha went to the infirmary and to several of the principal shops before she found Meg in the chemist's dark little back parlor waiting till sundry prescriptions had been made up. Rotha made some excuse to the druggist and took her out, and then, linking her arm in hers, led the way down one of the side streets which led to old Blackscar church and to the Leatham road.

It was a cloudy afternoon, and already it was growing dusk, and one or two drops, forerunners of a wet evening, splashed down on Rotha's mantle.

"Meg, darling, can you bear a shock? Will you promise me not to be too much upset at what I am going to tell you?" began Rotha, very tenderly, all the more as she felt the sudden, close grip of her arm.

"Something is the matter! You have heard of Jack! He is dead!" exclaimed Meg, in a wild, pitiful sort of way, as she caught sight of Rotha's grave face.

"No; not so bad as that. Meg, dear, look at this writing; is it his?" She need not have asked when she saw Meg kissing it and crying over it.

"My own Jack's handwriting! Oh, Rotha, for pity's sake tell me where you have got it. Is he alive? Can I go to him?"

"We are going to him, and I trust to Heaven that we may find him alive. But he is very ill, Meg—desperately so; dying, they say." And then as they hurried on, regardless of the fast pattering drops, she told Meg all that she had heard from the vicar, and begged her to prepare herself and be calm for Jack's sake, as well as her own, for he was very ill, so very ill, and so on.

Meg made no answer but to wring her hands and walk on faster; once she broke out into bitter weeping when she heard he had asked for "Madge."

"He never called me anything but that when he was in a good humor," she said. "Oh, Jack, Jack, just to hear you call me that once more," and then quickened her pace till Rotha could hardly keep up with her. It was a wet evening and still early, and there were few loungers around the door of the "Pig and Whistle"; and they took very little notice of the two ladies, who, they supposed, wished to take shelter from the approaching storm.

"It is going to be a dirty night, ladies," said one who looked like the ostler.

Rotha said, "Yes, a very unpleasant evening," and pushed past into the little dark entry, where a bright glow shone from the bar, in which a rosy-faced landlady was sitting alone at a little round table drinking tea.

Even under these painful circumstances Rotha noticed how cosy it looked, and that a bright fire it was, before the landlady started up at the sight of the two ladies and came bustling up.

"You have a Mr. Carruthers here," began Rotha with difficulty, and in an instant a shade came over the woman's pleasant face.

"Dear, dear; yes, the poor creature! The rector has sent you, has he?" glancing curiously at Rotha's dress and Meg's agitated face.

Rotha said "Yes" impatiently, and begged that they might be shown up at once; but Meg put her hurriedly aside.

"I am his wife, good woman—his wife—do you hear? For pity's sake, take me to him at once."

"Dear sakes alive," muttered the rosy landlady; "who would have thought his wife was here, poor creature? The Madge, no doubt, he's calling after. Bet's with him now. Bet's a famous nurse, and was with him all last night. Bet's nursed two brothers and a sister, and saw a winding-sheet in the candle last night," gasped out the garrulous landlady as she tolled before them up the steep, crooked staircase. "One landing more. He asked for our worst room, having little money; and he's got it, sure enough. Stoop your heads, ladies, for the ceiling is rarely low; and there is a deep step, you might break your necks leading down to the room."

"Hush, he's partly asleep," said Bet, a strong-featured, red-armed wench, coming forward. "It's been 'Madge, Madge' off and on all the afternoon, till I'm that moidered I'm half crazed."

"It is the gentleman's wife, Bet," said the landlady, wiping her eyes on her apron, as Meg, with a sort of sob, kneels down beside the narrow truckle bed; and Rotha, half awed, half dizzy, looks round the comfortable garret with its lean-to roof, and its carpetless floor, and the creaking bedstead with the blue-striped counterpane. Bet puts her arms akimbo and says, "Lor heart's alive, missis, and to think of that!" and breaks into a hysterical chuckle. The rain pours down against the crazy window, the sign flaps madly outside, the fire splutters up with a faint gurgle, and the candle gutters low in the socket. Meg, kneeling with her arms extended over the bed, kisses a pale hand lying motionless on the coverlet; and the uneasy sleeper stirs and moans restlessly, "Madge, Madge!"

"Hear him," says Bet; "he says nought else."

Meg, turning her white face to Rotha, repeats softly, "Hear him?" And whispers to herself, "Thank God!"

Rotha clears the room after that, and sets the guttering candle aside and lights another; and then, replenishing the tiny fire, closes the door and comes again to the bed.

"He looks very ill, Meg," she whispers. Meg, laying the skeleton hand against her cheek, points to the wasted arm and shakes her head.

"Not long for this world, are you, Jack? Oh, Jack, Jack!" she repeats in a heart-rending voice, "will you not wake up once more and speak to your wife?" And, as though the suppressed agony of her tones had power to rouse him, he opened his eyes wildly and rolled them from side to side.

"Whose voice was that?" he muttered, harshly; "it is like hers when the dead boy was carried out. Don't haunt me, Madge; don't haunt me!"

"Oh, Jack, your own Madge—never, never!"

The restless picking of the clothes recommenced.

"Who said it was my fault, and that she might have died too?" he raved more loudly. "Somebody pointed out the black bruise on her neck. Who struck her? Not I. Don't strike me, Jack, when I love you so," she said. A curse on her white, reproachful face. No, Madge, I did not mean that. Come here, my girl. The boy died and the mother too, but I did not murder them. All the legions of hell are trying to put it on me. But I won't say I did it, I won't!" and the voice fell into indistinct muttering.

"Jack! do you not know me, dear Jack?"

"Know you? too well," he muttered, "You are Madge Browning—tall Madge Browning—old miser Browning's daughter—ugly as sin. Who said that? Nonsense. I've brought you some carnations. Dark reds for Madge's faded colors. Don't wear white, it does not suit you. Say it aloud. Louder still. I can't hear you—love, honor and cherish. Whom? Browning's daughter? Ah, ah, no! Nonsense. Kiss me. Madge. I'm a drunken brute, but I never meant to hurt you."

"He does not know me. Oh, Jack, one word, only one word!"

"Hush! she is playing her music—grand, grand! The 'Dead March in Saul.' No, not that. Do you hear? Ah, terrible, terrible!" Again the indistinct mutterings, again he dozed, then woke more conscious as Meg was putting something to his lips.

"Who is this? Not Madge—Madge herself!"

"Yes, your own Madge, dear; your faithful, loving wife. Drink some more, dear Jack."

The hollow eyes stared over the rim of the china vessel, and then he pushed it aside.

"No more. I can't swallow. Is it really you, Madge, and not a dream?"

"Really and truly. Thank God you know me at last!"

"I don't know you," he repeated, half frightened. "My Madge had no gray hair, and her face was not white like yours."

"That was seven years ago, Jack."

"Seven years ago? ay; that's a long time, surely." He seemed wandering again, but she roused him.

"Say something to me before you go to sleep, Jack," she said, supporting the poor dying head on her arm. "Say 'God bless you, Madge,' once—only once!"

"God bless you, Madge! That is a prayer, isn't it? I haven't said my prayers for seven years; never, I think, since I was a child." He looked up in her face as though a glimmering of the terrible truth reached him even in his semi-consciousness. "I haven't said my prayers, and I am going to die."

"Say them now. Oh, Jack, fold your hands in mine and say one prayer for mercy!" He shook his head feebly.

"I don't know any. Teach me, Madge." And he let her hold his hands, and tried to say the words after her.

"I will arise and go to my Father. To my Father." What next, Madge? "And will say unto Him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before—before—" The broken clause was never finished, for he dropped his face, muttering still, upon her bosom. Two hours afterward he slept away, unconscious still, and Meg fell weeping upon Rotha's neck, and suffered her to lead her from the room.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXVII.

On the 26th morning of each month, the cry of the English Church for centuries, and of our own since she was planted on these shores, has been "Let me not be disappointed of my hope." There is a difference in the petition as we read it in our Bibles. In King James version and in the Westminster Revision it is rendered "Let me not be ashamed of my hope."

I think it needs both words to fill out what was in the mind of the Psalmist.

When a Hope, valued and trusted, fails us in the hour of trial, it is hard to say which is the more bitter element in the experience, the disappointment or the shame.

O, the disappointment, after counting securely on the prize, of finding that we have run in vain! And O, the shame, after long years of confidence, of finding out that we have been cheated with a delusion and have been resting all our weight on a support worthless and fallacious!

And this, I suppose, is what St. Paul means when he says, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable."

It is not that we have not been the happier thus far by reason of our religion; but this instead: No present happiness or advantage can compensate for ultimate disappointment and disgrace. The true Hope, he says, maketh not ashamed. But to live in high hope of becoming presently rich and great and happy, and to wake up to find ourselves poor and wretched and naked this is to be miserable indeed.

What an echo to the Psalmist's prayer do we find in the gentle exhortation of St. John: "And now little children abide in him: that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence and not be ashamed before him at his coming."

While none of us may be altogether devoid of apprehension in view of the approaching judgment, I suppose that every one has somewhere in his heart a hope that it will be well with him.

The hope may be dim or clear; it may be a reasonable hope, or a hope against hope; it may be the mere hope of impunity and avoidance of pain, or the glorious hope of blessing not now utterable or even conceivable; but some sort of hope each one of us cherishes consciously or unconsciously. If we had it not, if around the approaching sunset of our life hung the pall of despair, and no gleam of hope, life would be intolerable, reason could not endure the execrable wretchedness.

And who, that thinks at all, but must be frightened at the possibility even, that his hope shall, in the end, but disappoint him, and put him to shame?

Hope is the anchor of the soul. But, O my God, if I have mistaken the anchorage, and have no holding ground; if the wind and the wave scorn so feeble a tenure, and I am drifting on the rocks, save me from my self-confidence, and show me where to rest my hope!

Let us consider what our hope is really worth. Is it a hope that disappointeth or a hope that wakeneth not ashamed?

One may say, I have great confidence in the goodness of my Maker, I believe He is more merciful than many esteem Him to be.

Truly, God is merciful, and we trust in His mercy. But may we safely build our hope upon a vague confidence in His mercy? God is not all mercy. It were anything but reverential to make this the exhaustive description of His character.

We admire the quality of mercy in our fellowman, but only where it is harmonized with justice and determination. The weak amiability which makes no discrimination in its estimate of men, which has not the nerve to demand lawful obedience, which is incapable of noble scorn and generous wrath, is simply contemptible in our view. What right have we to think of God as of a Being so merciful that He will endure without remonstrance our defiance of His authority and our neglect of His commands?

We have no right to fasten this character on God, unless He has warranted it by His acts or by His words.

We know God through His acts, for all history is behind us, and all providence is around us. From what He has done and is doing, it is safe to argue what He will do in the future.

It is vain that we search here for any indication that God is too merciful to visit for sin. The lesson of all history is retribution upon nations and upon individuals for their misdeeds. We have but to call over the roll of early associates and the comrades of later age, to discover beyond a doubt or a peradventure, that God does not in weak mercy allow men to escape the consequences of sin. He does, in this present time, punish men for their vices, their follies, their thoughtlessness, even to the forfeiture of liberty and reputation, of health and of life itself.

Was it ever heard in the annals of human courts that a judge, out of mere goodness of heart and compassion for the wretched yet unrepentant criminal at the bar, regardless of the public safety and of the demands of justice, directed a notte prosequi to be entered? And shall not the Judge of all the world do right, and while He shall temper mercy with judgment, maintain the eternal barriers of right and wrong?

But God has spoken as well as acted; spoken so loudly that all may hear, so clearly that none need misunderstand. He hath appointed a day. He hath designated a judge. That judge has himself visited us beforehand, telling us what will be the criteria on which His sentence will be founded, and what plea may be successfully introduced in arrest of judgment.

Pitiable is the sight of a culprit whose guilt is undeniable, with a just judge, an overwhelming array of testimony, a law incontestable, who solaces himself with the expectation, that the mere humanity of the court will forget the outrage done to law and the injury to society, and so let him go free. Irreligion as well as Religion has its cant. And what is all talk about the infinite mercy of our Judge but cant and self-deception, when it contravenes all that we know of His government and all His express assurances, that He will by no means clear the guilty.

And another advances a plea and states a ground of hope. God cannot deal harshly with me, for I have done no great harm. I have been quiet and orderly. I never tempted man or woman to a great sin. As the phrase goes, I have been no man's enemy but mine own.

Are you sure of the facts, my friend? Have you really done no harm? Have you never dropped the bitter word, the uncharitable word, the word distorted by prejudice? Have you never by weak indulgence done harm to those you were set to guide? Have you never caused a little one to stumble or encouraged a weak brother to disregard the admonitions of his conscience? Has all your conversation, all your influence, all your example been absolutely harmless to those who insensibly copied you ways?

I am at a loss to understand how any one can honestly review the past without finding cause for bitter regret in the harm he has done to others by his inadvertence, or self-indulgence, or lack of self-control. I cannot conceive such temerity as that of one who in the Judgment shall cast his eye over the throng upon the left hand, and defiantly challenge any to disprove his boast that he had added nought to the world's evil.

But what if you have done no harm? What authority is there for erecting this test as determining your verdict? The Judge Himself has told us that the lost will be driven from His presence for another reason: for the reason that they did no good. For He had come to us and sojourned with us to teach us how we ought to live and to please God. He gave us an example. He left money in our trust. He committed His vineyard to our care. He placed a torch in our hands. He sent His poor to ask our aid.

You have done no harm! You have not ridiculed your Lord; nor made riot with His wealth; nor rooted up His vines; nor extinguished the light; nor oppressed the poor!

Grant it all; but the sin and the penalty remain, of an example unimproved; of the Lord's money hidden and neglected; of a spiritual vineyard from which you have extirpated no weed; of a lamp gone out, when it should be lighting the King of Glory on His path; of sorrow and ignorance and wretchedness uncares for and unrelieved.

O! when the Angel of the Judgment shall demand your hope, and you shall answer God is very merciful and I have done no great harm; how will that Hope shame and disappoint you when the answer shall come clear and sonorous from the Throne: What good hast thou done worthy of thy immortality, commensurate with thy opportunity, remunerative of the gifts bestowed?

IN MEMORIAM.

I call my little child, he leaves his play,
And looks up to my face, as if to say,
Why from my toys thou callest me, I do not know,
Thy love I know, and mine to thee prevaileth so,
That with my small fingers in thy dear hand
To go where'er thou lead'st, I, waiting stand.
If erring parents from their children meet
Such loving homage and a trust so sweet,
Should they not render to their God the same
Implicit faith, and trusting in the name
Of Him Whose hand still leads us on the way Through shadow sometimes, to the brighter day,
Lean on His arm Whose "ways so perfect" are,
And trust our future to His loving care!

THE POWER OF FAITH.

Faith's Enlarging Power.

BY W. D. GROUND.

II.

In a former article we saw that God chooses to be limited by the limitations His people make. We now wish to show that a greater faith in Heaven pushes back those barriers, and that a faith as large as the promises of God makes room in a man for such a mighty working of the divine spirit that practically the human conditions cease to exist, and to such a one all things become possible. As the power is divine it is manifest that it cannot wanton out into lawlessness, but must move along the lines of truth and holiness.

As the proof that faith can bring rich enlargement is so all-important, I shall offer no apology for using a very homely illustration. Suppose then a rich man takes a poor boy out of the streets, and puts him in his household. That action may represent our adoption into the household and family of God. Now what we have to mark is that that boy's notion of the position he is to occupy is by far the most powerful of all the forces that go to fashion his mind and character. That one thing will shape his thoughts, his tastes, his habits, his aspirations; it will determine his companions, his books, pursuits, business; in fine it will give the mould and framework of his inner and outer man. Is he to be a servant in the kitchen? then he will live on that plane of life. Is he to be a clerk in the counting-house? at once, without an effort, his thoughts rise to that region. Is he to be a partner, our adopted son? that belief opens up to him a new and vaster world, and his whole life will be fashioned upon that scale. Finally, is that benefactor a powerful minister of state, and does he intend this boy to stand in his place? then, obviously, as soon as the boy believes this, his thoughts will begin to widen out to that extent, and he will set about grasping all the matters needed for the wise government of our empire.

No doubt many other forces work along with the force exerted by the boy's belief and will. For whatever position his benefactor may design him, his education will be shaped, and the means placed at his disposal adapted. But what we need to remark is, that over all that area of thought and conduct that the boy himself controls, his belief and will will be by far the most powerful of all the shaping forces. His education may be intended to fit him to become a minister of state; but if he believes he is going to be only a groom, that inner belief will frustrate all well-meant efforts of others, and will infallibly drag him down to the level of the stable. If, on the other hand, he believes he is meant for the higher position, then, even if his education is suited only to the lower, his belief and will will push aside those hindrances, will strike out towards and will obtain what he wants for the greater intellectual life necessary for the higher place, and will fashion him into the size and shape of the man he has believed he should become.

Thus the measure of our faith—the sense of the possibilities that are open to us—the sense of what we are to be and to do in life, determines the size and shape of our inner man. It determines whether our life edifice—the structure we build within us—shall be a hut, a mansion, or a cathedral; determines the area and compass of our souls. As the life-energy rises up in us, moment by moment, that one thing—our faith—determines along what lines that energy shall go, what shall be the breadth of the thoughts we think, what the scope of our aspirations, what the field present to our inspiration; in a word, it fashions the whole world in which the spirit lives. In Spencerian language, our organization fashions its environment—the bodiless soul builds up the house it lives in on a scale to suit its own requirements. The soul of a groom builds a hut suited to a groom; the soul of a minister of state builds up a mental mansion adequate to its needs.

Now these gradations of life evidently have their counterparts in the spiritual world. All Christians have the Holy Ghost, but in some His life is feeble and contracted, whilst in some that life is so great and powerful that they stand forth as the foremost soldiers of light. These differences were once accounted for by referring them to the arbitrary will of God, but that notion is now practically set aside. And the far truer and wiser explanation is that the promises of God are thrown wide open to all, and that each individual Christian takes of those promises as much as he desires. His spiritual stature and strength are in the main dependent upon himself; it is his faith which determines the measure of God's gifts to him. As I show in a chapter in "Ecce Christianus," faith is a most severe and searching test of the man's inner nature. It is a complicated factor made up out of his sincerity, his earnestness, his fidelity, his manliness, his unselfishness, his generosity, his love; it is the outcome and index of a thousand prayers and struggles, the α which most completely represents the man's moral life. As such, it is the most perfect measure of a man's whole soul, and it represents the capacity of that soul to receive of the fulness of God. It decides the size of the vessel that each man brings to God to be filled. As the matter is highly abstract, let us recur to our illustration. Suppose then, the rich man after rescuing the boy and showing him many kindnesses, should tell him that he is still willing to do for him whatever he may ask. Obviously the moment would be a crisis in the boy's life. It would form a line of higher departure, and the extent and height of the departure would depend simply and solely on the boy himself. The answer he makes, the position he chooses, will be a revelation of the inmost desires of his heart. It will show where he has been living up to that hour, and along what lines his spirit now wants to move. And it is worthy of notice that what will mainly fashion the answer is the measure of the boy's generosity. He will expect another to give to him as he would give to that other if he had the power. If he has a noble and lordly nature, if he is a soul of high magnanimity, he will ask without effort for the largest things; if on the contrary he has a grovelling, niggardly nature, he will ask only in a mendicant fashion.

God puts before us His largest promises, and he bids us dilate to the utmost possible dimensions of our natures in order that we may receive from Him right royal gifts. But He lets us attach our own meaning to those promises, bids us take according to the measure of our souls. To quote but one of the promises, "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things." Now every man must attach his own meaning to that promise, must measure it after his own soul. One who fully grasps it, fully believes it, will be likely to reason something like this—"God has already given His Son, that is as the ocean; giving the ocean He will not deny the spray; I may as well therefore ask Him for the estate and endowments of an archangel, for which obviously His power and grace abundantly suffice." For such a faith therefore to ask for the powers, the position, the work, the destiny of a Moses or a St. Paul would manifestly be quite easy, would be rather a descent than an elevation.

It is quite possible that some of my readers as they enter into their minds the conception of their becoming men of the mould of Moses, already feel the enlarging effects of that greater faith, and possibly also they feel the intellectual and spiritual strain which the grasp of such a conception involves. Thus they may see that but a few minutes of a greater faith brings a distinct enlargement, and, if so, it ought not to be hard to believe that if such a faith be continued and made habitual for a few years, the enlargement becomes constant, and moreover is ever passing on to a greater measure. For that enlarged faith brings a greater spiritual capacity, which the Holy Ghost can fill; that larger measure of the spirit brings a vastly increased strength, that increased strength is adequate to bear a heavier burden, and hence a larger faith becomes possible, and so by a few removes of this nature it is possible to mount away from one's powers as an ordinary man into the breadth and volume of nature manifested by God's mightiest men. The enlarged faith opens up a new line of departure; it is an opening into infinity, and when this path is entered upon there need be no stopping place at all. We may grow up unto the Head, even Christ. Even a Moses and a St. Paul are far inferior to the Master, and until we have grown into the image of the Perfect One we need not deem ourselves to have attained.

THE CHARMS OF OXFORD.

BY THE REV. NEWLAND MAYNARD, D.D.

Though it would lay me open to the charge of presumption, were I to attempt in a single letter to give a just idea of this ancient university, having carefully visited each venerable college, it may be interesting to your readers to have a general outline or sketch of those old classical cloisters of learning that have hail so much to do with making England great, and of giving her that liberty in civil and religious life that is the glorious boast of her people.

First impressions have always a very lasting influence in the ideas we carry away of celebrated places. Beautiful weather, and cheerful associations exert powerful influences on the appreciative sensibilities, but, I think, it makes very little difference when visiting this "City of Pinnacles," as Oxford is called, so intrinsically attractive is everything that greets the eye of the new-comer.

Leaving the city, London, with its roar and tumult of traffic, affords a striking contrast to the quiet, dignified tranquillity that characterizes the surroundings and conditions of Oxford: an air of refinement and quietness pervades the people and place.

It has been said that the glorious trees of old England that adorn and beautify the sites of her sacred fanes, add immensely to the glory of the architecture, while on the continent, the sterility of the surroundings are a great detriment to the aesthetic effect. Now, in Oxford, the charming combination of classical cloisters in the midst of forest trees and fragrant flowers, is irresistibly attractive; it is impossible to imagine art and nature more appropriately wedded together.

As the tourist enters either end of Oxford, he is called upon to view one of the most glorious groupings of towers, spires, halls, chapels, colleges and churches that any land has to show. The bridge that crosses over the Cherwell, which glides gracefully into the Isis, which is in reality another name for the Thames, is a handsome stone structure, from which you can behold one of the most beautiful towers in England, namely, Magdalen College Tower. This exquisite specimen of decorated gothic was erected by Wolsley in the earlier days of his comparative obscurity. From what ever point it presents itself, it is a masterpiece of masonic work. The college to which it belongs ranks after Christ Church College as the most eminent and opulent in the whole cluster of schools, and is the home of royalty when it visits this ancient seat of learning. Here you enter the city, and are in High street, so deservedly famous for being flanked with portals and palatial halls which run back to remote days, each of which has had more or less to do in giving light and intellectual life to the individuality of England. On the left, as you enter High street, are the Botanical Gardens, gorgeous with grounds, on which are grouped every shrub and exotic plant that centuries of care have brought to perfection. Over the entrance of this horticultural garden is a gate, perfect of its kind, built over two hundred years ago, before Christopher Wren was heard of, and when Inigo Jones was the national architect of the country.

Leaving this fascinating enclosure, a few minutes walk brings you to the University Church of St. Marys, where some of the most eloquent preachers have held forth, being specially selected by the university. Here it was that John Henry Newman, now cardinal, delivered those chaste and deeply religious addresses that are regarded by scholars as the highest standard of cultured English. This noble building is crowned by tower and spire, lofty and impressive, with the principal portal at its base flanked with twisted columns, stained with age.

Opposite this church is the new building for all the examinations, that gives matriculation to enter, and confers collegiate distinction on learning. It cost over a million of dollars, is quite new, and therefore, lacking that "oldness of monuments" that Victor Hugo calls "their days of beauty."

Still moving up High street, colleges and gates on each side greet you, all emphasized with age, such as Queens and the University College; this last claims, with some plausibility, to be the foundation school of good King Alfred, and which, consequently, would make the age of this college over one thousand years.

Now on each side of this magnificent monumental thoroughfare which passes through the heart of Oxford, in crescent outline of graceful curve are other halls that are literally palaces, and represent various fashions of former architecture.

On the left is Merton College, the second oldest, then Oriel with its sculptured figures and oriel windows, then Corpus Christi, famed for its effort in former days to revive the learning that then was eclipsed, a college round which frightful bigotry and persecution for conscience sake has waged its bloody contest. Then you come through Canterbury gate into the quadrangles and cloisters of Christ Church College and are under the shadow of the cathedral in whose choir rests the ashes of the saintly Pusey. This college is the most aristocratic, possessed of prodigal endowments, and owes its existence and splendid patrimony to the genius of Cardinal Wolsley and generosity of old Henry the Eighth.

All these buildings have enormous kitchens, which in even time are a sight to behold; and also dining halls filled with souvenirs; but the dining hall of Christ Church College exceeds all in dignity and splendor of ornament. This room was Wolsley's work; you enter it by a staircase of stone carved and covered by a roof of fan tracery on stone, supported by a single clustered column similar in groining to the Divinity School of Oxford, and fashioned like a chapter-house. In this immense room three hundred sit down to dinner, other meals being taken in their own rooms. The walls are alive with portraits and personal reminiscences. Attached to this college is a gallery of art, in which Tintoretto, Titian, Rubens and Raphael are represented, together with a library containing the rarest manuscripts imaginable. The wealth of this society is enormous, coming from endowments that represent every county in England.

Having mentioned the places of interest on left of High street, let me add that those on the right, are first, Magdalen College, in whose classic groves, are "Addison's Walk." This college is bounded on its skirts by the River Cherwell, hence its "water walks" are the most refreshing and picturesque in all Oxford. Five minutes walk from cloisters or quadrangles, as they are called, for every college, has from two to three quadrangles, is a park with gigantic trees five hundred years old, filled with deer who roam about followed by their little ones, and are a great acquisition to the scene. Following Magdalen is New College, five hundred years old and one of the three wealthiest of the foundations. It would be difficult to express in words the sylvan loveliness of the grounds, gardens and glorious foliage that make a visit to New College so fascinating. Here you see the old towers and walls of the city, in singular preservation, and which are seven hundred years old. Clustered together are St. John's, Trinity, All Souls, Balliol and Wadham college, near which is the "Union," where the debating society meet and where Gladstone first exercised his oratorical eloquence.

Lincoln College is very old and very small; Wolsley was an under-graduate here, and I think Wycliffe also. I saw the room where Wesley lived and the vine that was just alive, that be planted, and the pulpit from which he preached, made of cedar wood and well preserved. The college of Worcester is the smallest, and is called "Botany Bay," because so remote from the others; the grounds of this college are unusually beautiful, and in its groves and lawns, the beautiful umbrageous character of English trees is delightfully illustrated, the lovely sheet of water, the swans moving gracefully, the shelter and shade, with seats inviting the pilgrim to rest; children enjoying the soft grass and fragrant flowers, was a scene that can never be forgotten—it was a little pocket Paradise for any student.

I must not forget to say a few words of Keble College, which has been in existence ten years, and which holds its own with singular success; there are one hundred and seventy in its cloisters; it enables the under-graduate to have equal advantages with its older sisters and at less costly expenditure. Its situation is simply delightful, not crowded, and I should say, for ventilation and modern improvements, it is superior to colleges of far greater pretensions. It is built (chapel included) of different colored brick, has a polychromic appearance that generally is being toned down in tint. In the library you see Holman Hunt's wonderful picture of "The Light of the World," valued at ten thousand pounds; it is not a large picture, but a most beautiful representation of the ideal Christ. Having given a brief sketch of High street, with colleges and halls that lay to right and left of it, and to which narrow lanes or streets lead, let me mention a few general facts relating to this intensely interesting locality.

It would seem that in the old days the stone that was used from a local quarry, and, not being good or capable of resisting the exposure, most of the colleges have grown prematurely old from this fact. In all additions and restoration great care is taken in the selection of material. These colleges were never more prosperous. The evidence of this increasing demand and wider extension of usefulness is shown by the large additions that are being made, and the enormous number of houses that are licensed to receive undergraduates after a year's occupation of the college. The new buildings are faithful copies of the old designs, and are a joy to the eye in the finish and refinement of the carving.

Magdalen, Balliol, Merton, are at the present time making large additions to the roomy cloisters already existing.

I believe it is generally admitted that Oxford regards itself as more aristocratic than Cambridge. The majority of public men (Gladstone included) are Oxford men. This university has been spoken of by John Bright as the seat of "dead languages and undying prejudices," and the great historian, Lord Macaulay, who, needless to say, was a Cambridge man, said in allusion to the martyrdom of Cranmer, Latimer and Ridley, that Cambridge made the great men and Oxford burned them. There can be little doubt that some of the greatest thinkers of the age belong to the rival of Oxford, which is celebrated for natural sciences and mathematics, as Oxford is conspicuous for eminent divines and classics.

The Lady Margaret College is the woman's college of Oxford. I believe it has achieved considerable success; but prejudice, which was like a dark cloud, is now but a murmur in the distant horizon.

Were I in this hurried letter to give any lengthy description of the chapels, churches, colleges and cathedral, which last has existed before colleges were heard of, I should exceed my allotted space. Suffice it to say that Exeter chapel, New College chapel, Magdalen chapel and Keble chapel are each delightful specimens of the choicest work, and all worth that more extended treatment that with photographs I have purchased I hoped to do justice to, when next winter I give my lecture on the "University of Oxford."

One of the great lions of this most interesting city is the Bodleian Library. Here seven hundred and fifty volumes alone comprise the catalogue. This library possesses more precious MSS. than the British Museum, and is centuries older. The degrees of the university are conferred with great pomp and imposing ceremonial at the Sheldonian Theatre, where the present Premier of England, Lord Salisbury, the Chancellor, might have been seen the last June presiding over this assembly of scholars.

I spent two hours delightfully visiting the scenes on the Isis at the foot of the spacious grounds of Christ Church College, where the great boat-racing takes place.

The stream is as broad again as Broadway, and all along the banks are barges fitted up by each college for its own visitors. There is also a university barge for royalty and special visitors that is supported by all the colleges. The boats for racing are shells fifty-eight feet long, with eight men and coxswain. The Oxford color is dark blue, that of Cambridge light blue. There are two races every year on the Isis, and one on the Thames. Each college has its own boat and picked men. The boats are arranged in a long line and bump each other, and when the boat ahead is bumped it falls behind, so in a few days they can soon find out who are the best. The crew of each boat train for weeks, and, next to the "Derby Race," this one between the universities is one of the most exciting in England.

I have often heard that the scenery of the Thames equalled any river in the world, and have appreciated this when at Richmond and Kew Gardens; but from photographs of the river and baronial residences that slope down to its banks, I should say that an excursion from Oxford to London by water would give the perfection of that picturesque scenery of England that is surpassed by no country in the world.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

A HOSPITAL DOLLY.

The little readers of THE CHURCHMAN, have, I suppose, heard and read of the sick children, who are taken care of in the hospitals of our large city; and, perhaps, some of you have gone into the children's ward of one of these hospitals, and seen the children lying in their little white beds. I dare say it all seems very sad to you, and you hardly thought they could spend many happy moments; but these little children are very patient, and bear their sufferings bravely. They are bright, and cheerful, too; making the most of the means of enjoyment within their reach.

They spend hours, playing with their games and toys, and especially with their dollies; and it is of these hospital dollies, I am going to tell you. You know how natural it is for you to live over again with your dolls the daily life which goes on around you; you dress your dollies, and take them out to drive, or make calls, just as your mamma's and auntie's do. Now, these hospital children, seeing around them only sick children, attended by doctors and nurses, look upon their dollies as sick children, and treat them as the doctors and nurses do the real sick children. You will see their dolls with bandaged heads and arms, and on inquiry, learn that these are accident cases. "Just come in." It is quite funny to see the earnest way in which they talk of them. I asked a little girl, one day, what was the matter with her doll who seemed very sick indeed. "Oh, she has the gymnastics dreadfully every night," replied the little mother, as she lifted her tenderly. They display great skill and ingenuity in imitating the different splints used by the doctors. Sometimes when a splint is being put on a child, you will see the keen bright eyes of some little sufferer near, watching every movement; and soon her tiny fingers will fashion a similar one for her doll.

A bright eyed girl of twelve, who has lain flat on her back nearly two years with spinal disease, has a pretty fair-haired doll, named Lizzie. Lizzie, her mamma declares, has hip-joint disease; and she has made for her a splint, similar to those worn by the children who have that disease. She thinks now that Lizzie is well enough to go to school, and as the convalescent children are taught a few hours each day, Lizzie made her appearance yesterday in the school-room with the other children. She looked like a very neat scholar indeed, in her calico dress, white apron, and little white hood, tied with pink ribbon. Her mamma sent a message, saying, that she hoped Lizzie would be a good girl and give no trouble, and she would send her books next day. This morning, Lizzie, when brought into the school-room, had on her arm a tiny school-bag, in which was a "Swinton's Geography," about an inch square, and a spelling-book, smaller. Lizzie is not very studious; you could hardly expect that of a new scholar; but she is very quiet, and appears to listen attentively to the recitations of the children, and I have no doubt she learns a good deal in that way.

To-day she carried home in her little bag, a "good conduct" card. Her mamma was very much pleased, and said she might go on the lawn to play in the afternoon; and, as I looked from my window, I see the children playing under the trees, and sure enough, among them is Lizzie, the "Hospital Dolly," whom a dear little girl, is dancing up and down to the tune of "Daffy down Dilly," played entirely upon one note on his funny wooden pipe, by Jerry, the house-doctor's little boy.

THE BLUE BRACELET.

BY HELEN F. MORE.

"I am in a dreadful scrape, Elsie." It was Lulu Venable who spoke to her little friend, Elsie Graham. Elsie looked up from her book, with her brown eyes full of sympathy and interest.

"What is it, Lulu?" she asked.

"Anything in which I can help you?"

"Of course you can help me," said Lulu, petulantly. "I should not have told you but for that; I am too much ashamed of it. You know that pretty bracelet that Miss Fanshawe wears—the one with the padlock hanging to it!"

Miss Fanshawe was visiting in the house of Lulu's mother, and Elsie had often seen and admired the pretty turquoise-studded bracelet.

"Well," Lulu went on, "I've so often wanted to try it on, but I never had a chance until this morning. You know mamma and Miss Fanshawe have gone to spend a few days with Aunt Mary at Orange. Would you believe that Miss Fanshawe forgot the bracelet, and, when I went into her room, there it lay on the pin cushion. I thought I would try it on, and it looked so pretty that I could not bear to take it off. I wore it all the morning and—and—"

"You did not lose it!" cried Elsie.

"No; I did not lose it, but it is all gone as bad; I broke it. How it happened I'm sure I can't tell. I had forgotten all about it, and I just looked down and saw that the padlock was gone. O, but I was scared! I hunted everywhere and, at last, I found it on the floor in my own room. I must have caught it in the key of the bureau-drawer and pulled it off."

"What will Miss Fanshawe say?" cried Elsie.

"Oh, dear! she must never know," said Lulu. "Why, I would not have her know for anything. You don't know how cutting and severe she can be when she is offended, for all she is so sweet. No, there is only one thing to do. I have been to the jeweller's, and he says that he can mend it for fifty cents so that no one would ever know it has been broken; only—I have not got the fifty cents."

Elsie looked at her in surprise, for every one knew that Lulu's parents were far richer than hers.

"Neither have I," she began; but Lulu broke in, eagerly,

"Not of your own, I know; but you have the money, for all that. You are the treasurer of the Sunday-school class, you know, and you have ever so much more than fifty cents—four or five dollars, at least. If you will only lend me fifty cents of that money, Elsie, I am sure of being able to pay you long before Easter, and no one need ever know. You will, won't you, Elsie?"

Lulu looked up appealingly into her friend's face; but Elsie looked not only shocked, but absolutely frightened at the idea.

"Lend you that money, Lulu!" she said, softly. "Oh, I could not; I should not dare. Why, just think. It isn't my money at all; it is the Lord's money, and how could I take it for my own uses? It would be like Ananias and Sapphira."

Lulu's face flushed, and she answered, angrily,

"It isn't for your own uses at all, Elsie. If you come to that, I'm sure the Bible says, 'Bear ye one another's burdens,' and you ought to help me to bear mine. I tell you I am sure of being able to pay you. Uncle Jack always gives me five dollars on my birthday, and you know that comes a fortnight before Easter. Ah, Elsie, dô lend me the fifty cents."

Elsie had turned very pale, but she did not waver.

"I can't, Lulu, I can't. Don't ask me," she said. "If I had it of my own I would gladly lend it to you, but I can't touch that money. I should feel like a thief, stealing from the Lord. O, I could not do it!"

"Then you're a mean, hateful, selfish thing," cried Lulu, in a rage. "I'll pointed he was to find that she had gone away. Lulu was the gainer by it, though, for Uncle Jack had so much the more time for her. It was not hard to confess things to Uncle Jack, and before many hours had passed Lulu had shown him the bracelet, and told him of the trouble she was in and of Elsie's unkind behavior. Uncle Jack stroked his moustache thoughtfully as he listened.

"Your little friend was quite right," he said at last. "She must be an uncommonly clear-headed and high-principled little girl. No doubt it was very hard to refuse you, but she saw that she had no business to meddle with money which was entrusted to her. If everybody saw that so clearly and acted upon it so firmly, we should cease to hear of thieves and defaulters in high places. However, Miss Fanshawe must not suffer. Let me see this bracelet."

Lulu was glad enough to hand the bracelet over to Uncle Jack's care, and still more glad to receive it again the next morning, so neatly mended that it had been broken at all.

"And you won't tell any one, Uncle Jack?" she asked, anxiously.

Uncle Jack hesitated a moment.

"No," he said, at last; "I won't tell any one; but, Lulu, if I were you I would tell mamma and Miss Fanshawe all about it. Depend upon it, you will never feel comfortable until you do."

He had no time for Lulu's answer, for the train whistled just then, and it was all he could do to get to the station in time.

Well, Lulu congratulated herself again and again that things had turned out so fortunately for her. Miss Fanshawe never suspected that anything had happened to her bracelet, therefore Lulu had never been obliged to confess her fault. The only thing left to recall it never speak to you, nor have anything to do with you again. You needn't try to make up, ever, for I'll never forgive you."

"O, Lulu!" began Elsie, but Lulu was out of the house before she could say another word, and Elsie could only cry angrily.

Lulu considered herself a very lucky girl when she reached home and found that Uncle Jack had come out from the city to spend the night. Lulu was a great pet of Uncle Jack's, and she made sure that it was to see her he had come. I will tell you as a great secret that it was not Lulu but Miss Fanshawe whom he came to see, and very much disap-to her mind was her quarrel with Elsie. You could hardly call it by that name, though, if it be true that "it takes two to make a quarrel." It was only that Lulu could not forgive Elsie what she considered her nakedness in not helping her out of her trouble. Mrs. Venable tried several times to find out what had come between the little friends, but in vain.

"It is only that I have found Elsie out, mamma," Lulu insisted. "She is a selfish, unkind girl, and I only wonder that I ever liked her at all. I never shall again, that is certain."

"There must be some mistake. I am quite sure that Elsie is neither selfish nor unkind," said Mrs. Venable, who had always liked Elsie, and thought her influence over Lulu excellent in its effects.

But Lulu was not to be convinced, and, as there were no other girls for whom she cared much, her bird Bijou was her principal companion during the summer. Bijou was certainly a very pretty little bird. He was a slender, yellow canary, with green wings and a cunning little top-knot, which gave him such a knowing look when he turned his head on one side and looked at you out of his bright little eyes. He knew Lulu well, chirped and fluttered against the wire whenever she came into the room, and flew straight to her as soon as the cage-door was opened, to perch upon her shoulder and give soft little pecks of affection at her rosy cheeks. Lulu loved him dearly, and, in the days of her friendship with Elsie, their nearest approach to a quarrel had arisen from a comparison of their respective birds. The lady who had given Bijou to Lulu had given to Elsie another bird from the same nest. Elsie called her bird Jou-jou, and the two were so much alike that only their little mistresses could tell one from the other.

When September came in, and the close, heavy heat brooded over field and forest, Lulu fell sick, and her illness lasted through many painful days and nights. It is hard to see those you love suffer, and what wonder is there that while Lulu lay moaning and tossing on her feverish pillow, knowing nothing that was passing around her, Bijou was half forgotten? No one could tell how it happened that his cage-door was left open. All that was known was that when the maid went to give him fresh seed and water the cage was empty and Bijou gone, no one knew whither. This was while Lulu's life still hung wavering in the balance, and no one had time to think much about the bird. But at last came a day when Lulu's eyes shone no longer with the vague, wandering brightness of fever, but with the clear light of reason. Then they began to wonder how it would be when they had to tell her about the bird.

"Where is Bijou?" was one of her first questions.

She was satisfied when they told her, as the doctor bade them, that his song was too loud for her room and she must wait, but they knew that the excuse would not long serve. They thought that if they could find a bird something like Bijou they might put it into the empty cage and let her see it from a distance, until she was strong enough to bear the truth. But it was in vain that they ransacked the town; no bird in the least like Bijou could they find. Mrs. Venable was almost in despair, for the doctor had told them that if Lulu heard of Bijou's loss before she was quite strong again, it would probably cause a relapse, from which she might not recover.

"I really do not know what we shall do," Mrs. Venable was just saying. "Lulu keeps asking about Bijou all the time. She has begun to fret because we will not bring him to her, and it will not be long before she suspects the truth, or something near it, and then—"

A timid little ring at the front door bell interrupted her words. When the door was opened, there stood Elsie, with tears in her eyes and something that looked like a basket in her hand.

"Mrs. Venable," she began, hastily, "Dr. Marsh was at our house to-night and he told us about Bijou. I am so sorry for Lulu. I love her dearly, though she does not love me any more, and—and—I've brought Jou-jou. He's so like Bijou that she never can tell the difference across the room. If you'll take him and put him into Bijou's cage, and, when she knows him, tell her—it's for good."

"But, my dear little Elsie!" cried Mrs. Venable, "you do not mean to give your bird to Lulu? O that will never do! If you will just let us keep him for a week or two, until Lulu is strong enough to bear the news of Bijou's loss, we shall be more obliged than I can say. You shall have him back safe and sound at the end of that time."

But Elsie shook her head. "No," she said. "It must be for always. You haven't heard since Lulu has been sick, but we are going out West—to Dakota—to live. We are going to-morrow and—and—if I leave Jou-jou I must leave him for good and all. Take him and give my love to Lulu."

And, before Mrs. Venable could say any more, the little wicket cage was thrust into her hand, and Elsie, sobbing as if her heart would break, had fled down the steps.

Lulu was quite satisfied when Jou-jou, in Bijou's cage, was brought into her room and hung where she could see him. If she asked to see him nearer, her request was refused on one pretext or another. But the time came, at last, when she could leave her bed and even walk about the room, and then the discovery could no longer be delayed.

"Why, mamma!" she cried, one day, "how Bijou has changed! He hasn't to have that yellow mark on his left wing and—why, mamma, it isn't Bijou at all! It's Elsie's Jou-jou."

In her bewilderment she was ready to accuse Elsie of having stolen Bijou, until Mrs. Venable told her the whole story. Lulu turned red and pale by turns as she listened, but before the end she had burst into a flood of tears.

"O, mamma!" she cried, "I have called Elsie selfish and quarrelled with her and—O, what a wicked girl I have been! Let me tell you all about it, for the very first, and maybe I shall feel better."

Then the whole story came out—about the broken bracelet and Elsie's refusal to lend the money, and Uncle Jack, and all. Mamma listened gravely, and talked to her little girl gently but firmly, as mothers can. Lulu felt much happier. I can tell you, when it was all off her mind. There was no Miss Fanshawe any longer, but Uncle Jack's wife looked wonderfully like her, and she and Uncle Jack had just reached Lulu's home, as the first stopping place on their wedding tour.

"I'll tell you what it is, Lulu," said Aunt Mabel, as Lulu called her new aunt, "I think I shall have to give you the famous blue bracelet to remind you of a thing or two. And another thing, Jack and I are on our way out West. If you are anxious to send Jou-jou back to Elsie, we will see that he gets to her safely, now that he has finished his mission here. I suppose she loves him as well as you loved Bijou."

I have only one thing more to say, and maybe you will think that Lulu did not deserve that. A few days later a boy came to the door and asked whether a bird had been lost from that house. Sure enough, it was Bijou. The boy had caught him a month before, and had only just found out where he belonged.

So Bijou's and Jou-jou's cage each has its own occupant, and there are two happy birds and two happy mistresses. Lulu and Elsie have not met since, but loving letters flutter to and fro between Dakota and New Jersey. And so long as Lulu wears a certain blue bracelet on her wrist and a certain lesson in her heart, we hope that she will never again forget that concealing faults does not mend them, and that truth and honesty are not only the "best policy," but the highest wisdom.

WHAT would be wanting to make this world a kingdom of heaven, if that tender, profound and sympathizing love practised and recommended by Jesus were paramount in every heart?

The signs of the Zodiac, as known to us, were also known to the Chaldeans, as appears by engraved gems of the period and carved stones. Among the Babylonians the heavens were divided into twelve parts, or divided over by twelve constellations.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1885.

THE closing of the fiscal year, at the beginning of this month developed the very gratifying fact that the Foreign Committee of the Church's Missions held in its treasury three hundred dollars more than the amount necessary to pay, when accrued, every obligation for work performed up to that date.

WHATEVER has come of the Church Association and the Church Union in the Church of England, nothing answering to these associations is wanted in the Church in this country. They would surely antagonize parties, draw strict dividing lines and really injure the cause which they are supposed to benefit. What is wanted on all sides is charity and fairness. None of these are for the most part possible, when one is committed to the defense of a set of principles, as if nothing else were worth defending or worth considering. That which rules out everything but its own, comes to be a form of exclusiveness which needs nothing so much as to enter into the largeness and fullness of life. Happily, the Church has largely broken away from all this stringency and needs no more of it. One can be a stout defender of the faith and order of the Church even from his own point of view, without binding himself to rules and partisan relationships, whose tendency is to show that a part is equal to, if not greater than the whole. Some things are even more erroneous than error, and charity is to be desired above all burnt sacrifices.

THE CHOICE OF BISHOPS.

American Churchmen have often regarded the English method of choosing a bishop, which is by the nomination of the Prime Minister, and then the ex post facto election by the cathedral chapter, as superior to their own because the choice is made practically by one intelligent man. But this method is not free from objections. Canon Liddon is the first preacher, and is regarded by many since Dr. Pusey's death as the foremost Churchman, in England. He is not understood as desiring the episcopate nearly so much as his friends desire it for him. In the struggle that is close upon the English Church the strongest men should be among the bishops, and Canon Liddon has shown himself to be an exceptionally strong man; but the notable thing about him is that whenever an episcopal appointment is to be made the Prime Minister passes him by. Mr. Gladstone could have nominated him, but neglected to do so, and the Marquis of Salisbury has just passed him by when all England anticipated that he would be Bishop Moberly's successor. The English bishops are good and true men, and certainly no fault is to be found with our own bishops, but in both the English and American Church the strengthening of the episcopate means the strengthening of the working energies of the Church in each country. It is not so much the available as the best man who should be selected for this sacred and responsible office. Canon Liddon carries weight where he is, but his eloquence, his learning and his controversial power would carry much more weight if they were exercised in the conspicuous office of a bishop at a time when the English Church needs to put her best men forward in order to meet the approaching conflict with those who are laboring for disestablishment. Though there is no question of establishment in America, the Church gains strength almost in proportion to the wisdom and sagacity with which the several bishops discharge the duties of their office, and in a spirit that commands the respect and engages the sympathy of the American people.

CHURCHES OPEN.

The summer is ended, and the city churches are reopened. They have been standing for months silent, witnesses to their own uselessness during that time.

But now they are reopened. What does that mean? In too many cases it means that they are reopened for one day in seven until another summer comes. More frequently, indeed, than of old, but altogether too infrequently still, their doors will be opened for a brief week-day service. But after all their general aspect will be during the coming nine months, that of unused, useless, neglected buildings.

There is something terrible in this. God's House stands locked and barred all the week. It looks down upon the heedless throng that ever passes by, without one rebuke for their heedlessness. Worse than that, it seems to teach that religion is not a part of life; that all the doors of industry and commerce and amusement must stand wide open daily, but the church door must be swung open only one day in seven.

Why should men give any heed to the mute exponent of Christianity that looks down upon them, with its carved doors, and pictured windows, and sculptured stones, but showing no sign of life?

Nor is this true only of the city. What a pitiable sight to one who is whirling through country towns, is that of one or more buildings, often mean, too often ill-cared for, but sometimes beautiful, standing empty and useless upon the busy streets, yet bearing the name of churches, named after our Lord!

Better, almost, that no church should be built, than that it should be always incultating the uselessness of religion.

THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE NATIONAL LIFE.

When one of the radical leaders of English thought spoke in the Spectator in favor of maintaining that sort of Christianity which is concerned more about the spirituality of the national life than about certain dogmas, he might seem to be talking in riddles. What is meant by the spirituality of the national life? one might ask. What has the nation to do with being spiritual? One knows what is meant by the spirituality of the individual life or of the aggregate lives of Christian believers, but the national life is not supposed to be formed or qualified in any such way.

And yet we are not content with talking about the secularity of the national life, as if it were formed and included in purely temporal and natural conditions. This is a superficial idea of life, and especially that corporate life of a nation which is made up of the citizens or souls composing it. What of the items as against the sum? What of the individual life, however spiritual, if the aggregate life of the nation, and therewith its organization, institutions, relationships, aims and tendencies are simply unspiritual and only concerned about that material aggrandizement which has to do with this life on earth? Is it not plain that a life of this sort must weigh against, if it does not in the long run weigh down, the other? The late Mr. Bagehot wrote a book on "Physics and Politics," as if the national life, as Mr. Huxley would say of all life, has its formation in a physical basis. If this be true of the national life, how can the life of individual believers, or even the life of the Church, hope to withstand it?

That sort of Christianity, then, which is concerned about the spirituality of the national life is concerned to have it reach down into the depths of spirit and to find its formation and movement, in some sort, in that Divine Spirit which at the first moved upon the face of the waters. It would deny that the national life is the outcome of merely physical forces and relations. It would say, with Mulford, that "the nation was formed in the relationships of life and in the recognition of a relation to an invisible one; it did not exist simply in an accumulation of men and in the construction of an external order." As such, the nation which has its deeper groundings in spirit and in spiritual relations is to be qualified in spirit—that is, most surely, in that which conforms to right reason, as profoundly ethical in its character, and was appointed of God to make for order, righteousness, and justice, not only in reference to this world, but the next. Not only so, but there is a sense in which spirituality may be as truly sought for and realized in the national life as in the life of an individual soul. And this would be an actual consummation if the nation were truly and ideally Christian, as we conceive to be the case in the celestial commonwealth.

If these ideas, "spirituality and national life," seem to be incompatible in American ways of thinking, it is, perhaps, a part of the price Americans are paying for the separation of Church and State. They have made the dividing line between the so-called temporal and spiritual order so sharp and rigid, that they exclude the idea of spirituality from the one, if not that of temporality from the other. But the truth is, Church and State in their deeper groundings have no such separation. The two have their ordering in the Divine Will, and are formed in the nature of man with reference to his temporal and extra-temporal well-being. This idea has been held to with concurrent voice by some of the greatest of English statesmen and divines, such as Warburton, Hooker, Burke, Coleridge, Dr. Arnold, and Gladstone. Their Christianity, over and above being something which concerned the Church and the individual lives of believers, almost equally concerned the life of the nation. For the same reason the organ above spoken of, though strongly liberal in most things, says it will uphold the Established Church, being concerned to maintain that sort of Christianity which has to do with the spirituality of the national life.

THE CHURCH OF LAW AND THE LAW OF THE CHURCH.

A CHARGE TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF WESTERN NEW YORK.*

Moved by the Holy Ghost, and not by any mistaken idea, the inspired authors of the New Testament always spoke of "the Day" as at hand. "That day" is their familiar expression, and they impressed the early faithful with the thought that theirs was "the Last Time." It seems to have been the Divine Will concerning us that Christians should always live under this impression. For this is the great incentive to soberness, watchfulness, fidelity and hope, as well as to a wholesome and filial fear. Our preparation for "that Day" must be made in our own lifetime, and practically, therefore, the Day is ever impending. In my own diocese there is at least one person alive, and in possession of all faculties of mind and body, who was born more than a hundred years ago. Eighteen such lives touch the Apostolic age. How short, therefore, has been the period since the times of the Apostles; how very short in the reckoning of Him with whom "a thousand years are as one day."

The Christian age and dispensation were designed to be short; "cut short;" and He who bids us to pray that He may "come quickly," means not to delay His coming. The six thousand years which apostolic men supposed to be the fulness of time are nearly filled up. We ourselves are living in the Latter Day. Prophecy has been fulfilled in our own times, before our eyes, and, as I suppose, the last prophecies concerning "the times of the Gentiles" are now verified. The Imperial Image of Daniel has dwindled to the toes, and "iron and clay" are rapidly crumbling at this moment. Feudalism is "the iron" and democracy "the clay," which refuse to mingle. There is no more a base for—

"Those pagod things of sabre-away, With front of brass and feet of clay."

"Many run to and fro, and knowledge is increased;" but other signs are about us of which we should take heed. "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" Iniquity abounds; the love of many waxes cold, and emphatically it is the age of lawlessness. The Antichrist must be near—the lawless one. All who break law are his children. "How is it that ye do not discern this time?" says the Master.

The nations are disorganized. Dynamite has not been invented by chance. It is the prophetic doom of "Feudalism" to be thus smitten. Imperialism perishes before lawless violence. Henceforth, popular governments only can stand. It is a day when the Church itself exhibits that restless tossing on the waves which leads to the outcry, "Save, Lord, or we perish!" It must be so when, in our sight and hearing, a bishop of the Church, having no more right to innovate than the merest layman, has forged two novel dogmas and bound them on the consciences of millions of Christians, although they are false and undermine the foundations of the Faith and the entire fabric of Catholicity. Internally the Roman system has undergone this terrible revolution, and at the same moment its external form and relations have been annihilated. Its temporal sceptre has departed, and not a potentate in Europe is its friend. "Never since the days of Charlemagne," says an Ultramontane journalist, "has the Roman See been in such a situation of isolation and helplessness." And while this ignoble character of our times is otherwise reflected in the outpourings of unbelief, its restlessness and lawless self-assertion have been seen in the unstable souls who have deserted Catholicity for Vaticanism; and equally in such characters as Rönán and Lamménais and Lacordaire, who have ignobly rushed out of superstition only to "run violently down a steep place and perish" in the gloomy flood of Scepticism. Oh! how blessed are they whose feet are on the Rock, and who can say with St. Paul, "None of these things move me."

The Church of which we are members is historically the Church of Law. From the Venerable Bede to the judicious Hooker, this is her character. Nay more, the whole system of the common law is the product of her spirit. The Church created it, and the boasted Constitution of England was as really constructed by her "as the honey-comb is made by bees." So also her sober and gradual reformation at every step was ordered by law. Her own bishops under Warham took the lead, and her whole body by regular canonical proceedings had rejected the papacy as an alien and usurping power while Cranmer was yet a presbyter. Thus she reasserted the Nicene constitutions against decretalism and its forgeries. She, alone, gave the reformers of the continent this example, and their failure to copy it has only made her wisdom the more conspicuous. Again, when the lawlessness of the Puritans seemed for a time to destroy her, God had secured for her a glorious resurrection in the mighty work of that great asserter of law, Richard Hooker. Those books of his "Ecclesiastical Polity" embody the very spirit of her quaint language in the XXXIV. Article of Religion: "Whosoever, through his private judgment, willingly and purposely doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church which be not repugnant to the Word of God and be ordained and approved by the common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, that others may fear to do the like, as he that offendeth against the common order of the Church and hurteth the authority of the magistrature and woundeth the consciences of the weak brethren." Not inadvertently did our compilers retain those words, "hurteth the power of the magistrature," which might have been supposed inappropriate to our freedom from the State. Our children are taught to "honor and obey the civil authority," and he who by his private judgment breaks the Church's law (of all laws the most sacred), does at the same time stultify himself as their catechist. He gives an example of lawlessness in himself, and teaches the young to "despise government," and so to disregard the law of the land.

Public men have often recognized the influence of this American Church as that of a blessed conservatrix of law. Those who seek to reproach her, generally find their text in some circumstance which only proves her anchorage to be good, while storm and wreck make havoc round about. A very eminent jurist, a Puritan, and the son of one who filled a high seat upon the bench in the days of Washington, once said to me, "Your Church is nearly the only conservative influence in this country, while popular religion contributes only to solvent and centrifugal forces."

Now, what if our salt should lose its savor? Shall we, also, "hurt the authority of the magistrature" by lawless individualism? God forbid! But need I remind you, brethren, that ("yea, even in them that are regenerate,") even in our own fold, lawlessness has asserted itself. On the one hand we see daring innovations which threaten doctrine through ceremonial; on the other, we confront a flagrant and impious assault on the Faith itself by priests of God, who have voluntarily bound themselves to minister, not by caprice of private judgment, but "as this Church hath received the Doctrine and Sacraments and the Discipline of Christ."

* Delivered by the Bishop of Western New York, in Trinity church, Geneva, in his Diocesan Council, September 10th, 1850.

In the day when I was admitted to Holy Orders, how sacred was the rubric in all eyes! Our rubrical law, it is true, in all particulars, had never been quickened into active service. Our colonial orphanage had lain on them like a long winter; but there was the law. Wise men loved it, and zealous men strove to revive its operation. To violate a rubric which had been operative, or to which the diocesan directed attention, was to forfeit all character for Churchmanship; save only where it was proved, that under a rigid necessity and with no disloyalty in mind or heart, the seeming offender had transgressed the letter, but not the spirit of the law. An anecdote may illustrate the dutiful spirit of that period. Dr. Muhlenberg (saintly and venerable name) had something of the revolutionist in his nature; but, when I once playfully accused him of "circumventing a rubric," he rose from his seat and resented the charge; stopping his ears with a benevolent smile, and crying out—"circumventing a rubric? no, never! I wish I could abolish some of our rubrics, and canons, but, I never trifle with what I have sworn to obey." Once, inspired by a new scheme of benevolence, he said to me: "Will you let me come into your diocese and carry it out?" He was more than half in earnest, and I answered, "Yes, and welcome, with a whole heart! and all I can do as the Ordinary shall be done to give you liberty; but more than that I can't promise. I often think you have a special mission, like John Wesley, and Wesley should have had a special license." I told him that in my opinion the law was good, but that all laws must have exceptions, yet, "I also was under authority, and beyond certain limits of missionary precedent, I had no more right to relax the law than he." He recognized this in his delightful way, and then broke out into a sort of rhapsody, "O, that our successors of the apostles were not tied up in their apostolic powers!"

Now, such a reverence for the Law was the spirit of this diocese when it was left to me by my eminent predecessor, a man who was the embodiment of law and order, and reflected their spirit in all that he did. Impressed with this conviction, I very early committed myself to preserve the traditions of my diocese, inherited as they were from White and Hobart, the great exemplars of Bishop DeLancy. Not, indeed, was I committed to what my own Gamaliel, Bishop Whittingham, once called in my hearing, "a hide-bound conservatism." I have always recognized a legitimate progress, and have favored every advance toward the realizing of all that Hooker and Andrewes and Ken, or even Laud, recognized as rightfully ours in the reformed Church. But, these were my conditions and limitations, viz.: (1). This rule respects only things always recognized as lawful and always asserted, like that dormant right of convocation, which Dr. Johnson said he would face a park of artillery rather than surrender, dead though it seemed to be in his day. And (2). Restoration itself must be authorized. It must not be in the power of every novice to innovate, nor to resuscitate the obsolete, however innocent in itself. For example, it is lawful and right to offer the Morning Prayer at daybreak all the year round. I wish it could be done with propriety; but the rector who should insist upon his right to deprive the great majority of his people of their accustomed Sunday Morning Service, by uniformly celebrating this service before they were out of their beds, would deserve my rebuke. He who in his private judgment would scandalize a diocese or disregard his bishop's fatherly counsel in such a matter, would strain at the gnat of a private scruple while swallowing the camel of disloyalty. And, to concede the utmost, if the weak only are offended, yet it wounds and wrongs those "consciences of the weak brethren," which Scripture and our Holy Mother the Church ordains that we should tenderly respect, in Christian charity. The lines of legitimate progress, then, are in things lawful, to use lawful and expedient means. All things may be lawful, but "all things," says the apostle, "are not expedient." Where rubrics and canons are ambiguous, or where they are silent, the bishop is the ordinary whose golly counsels are the ecclesiastical authority, till the Church, in her synods, legislates. This is the ordinance of God, if, as we believe, we have the apostolic succession in our bishops and the power of the keys committed to their charge. And further, as to any supposed improvement or advance in things lawful in themselves (the law being recognized by common consent, though dormant by usage), the innovator, who would proceed under the favor of God, must personally apply the three queries of Bishop Hobart, as follows:

(1.) Should this thing be done? (2.) Is this the best time to do it? (3.) Am I the man whose duty it is, very clearly, to take the lead accordingly? Against the remonstrances or kindly and affectionate request of one's own "father in God," he would be a bold man who should answer all three of these inquiries affirmatively. He ought to have great learning, a large experience, and what one of our educating canons calls "extraordinary strength of natural understanding, a peculiar aptitude to teach, and a large share of prudence." To such a gifted individual, what bishop of the Church would not surrender his own limited faculties, and concede the authority due to special inspiration?

My reverend brethren, for twenty years I have endeavored to administer the affairs of my diocese on these principles, never departing from them consciously, much less intentionally. In all that time, only a single instance has occurred of insubordination and contemptuous breach of law; and that one instance was so quietly disposed of that I suppose few will recognize the case to which I refer. In a very few other instances, a gentle and fatherly request for a compliance with the order of the diocese has been instantly complied with, and God no doubt will bless the loyal and filial spirit, even supposing any instance of paternal judgment to be an honest mistake. Thanks be to God, brethren, that I can say this of you, with a grateful heart. To such a spirit in the clergy of the diocese, far more than to any faculty of their bishop, we owe it that there has been everywhere among us a rapid and healthful growth of Catholic ideas, naintained by Mediseval ceremonialism, puerility, or superstition—a beautiful development of rubrical observance and ritual propriety, with a great improvement in constitutional legislation and the order and solemnity of diocesan synods. And yet these twenty years have been marked by exceptional convulsions and revolutions in the religious world around us. Even in the Church it has been a period of excitement and agitation, of caprice and extravagance, and such assertion of self-will and individualism. It has been a period of nrippe and frivolous dogmatism, of childish itching for the novel and the sensational, and of imbecility and arrogance, defying law and trampling oaths and promises under foot. The mere innovations of enthusiasm have been dignified as a "Catholic revival," and the name of "Catholics" has been arrogated by half-educated youths, perhaps recently imported from sectarianism, or revolting from a pseudo "evangelicalism." We have seen revolutions undertaken by tyros in theology, ignorant alike of Catholic history, the criteria by which Catholicity is defined, and yet more ignorant of the Holy Scriptures, without a deep study and knowledge of which the most zealous declaimer against an uncatholic system is but "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." If, then, my diocese is unvexed by these theologasters, does any one ask, "Why such pastoral admonitions?" My dear brethren, hear my answer. I speak these words in order that your love of order and law may continue to be the traditional spirit of this diocese. The times are fruitful in disturbing elements. The late revisions of our English Bible have been attended with deplorable results. Our Prayer Book itself is in the crucible. Laws seem to be, everywhere, in a state of flux, and the "spirit of disobedience," alike in Church and State, is the spirit of our epoch. Now, then, let us trim our own vessel and set sail for a safe navigation. As I have often said, I covet for my diocese a thoroughly Catholic spirit: its rightful reputation will then vindicate itself, in time. Let me mention a few particulars, to which I trust you will see the propriety and wisdom of my references just now. I purpose, hereafter, to illustrate my positions in this charge by citations from Patristic authority, with Gallican or Greek illustrations, as well as from Anglican and American canonists, doctors, and jurists of eminent wisdom. My positions in this charge are none of my own manufacture. The torrent of Catholic and Anglican testimony would sweep away all pretences to the contrary.

[Here follow the charges to the diocese, omitted in this place. The concluding portion, on Law, is of general purport, and will be given next week.]

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER ON DIESTABLISHMENT.—The Bishop of Chichester (Dr. Durnford) has addressed a pastoral to the archdeacons and rural deans of his diocese, stating that the question of diestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England will, beyond all doubt, be brought before next Parliament, and probably on some early occasion. He says, "The advanced Liberal party has taken up the question as an election cry, and the more moderate members of that party, so far as I have observed, for the most part speak hesitatingly in support of the National Church. The programme of the Liberaionists means nothing less than total subversion. They are bent upon root-and-branch work. The small measure of mercy shown to the Church in Ireland will be denied to us. Our endowments are to be confiscated, the incomes of all bishops and clergy to end with their lives, the Church, so far as the law of the State is concerned, to have no corporate existence after diestabment; all ancient churches to be vested in a parochial board, with power of sale at a fair valuation." He speaks of the necessity of the new constitutions being instructed as to "what disestablishment and disendowment really means—what results would be brought about thereby in country towns and yet more in villages—what is the truth about the endowments of the Church—how the clergy are paid—what tithes are, how applied now, and how they would be dealt with in case of disendowment—what are the duties of the clergy—how they are fulfilled now, and how they would be fulfilled under conditions such as the Liberatorists have in view." He does not believe the future electors care for none of these things; but the manifestoes of the Liberatorists are scattered broadcast among them, and if nothing is done to contradict these, they are sure to be more or less believed. He condemns the supineness which permits this, and while not advising political sermons, he calls on the clergy to be faithful in upholding the constitution in Church and State, and warning their people what their loss would be if it were overthrown. He calls upon the clergy "to influence the public opinion of their parishes, to set before them refutation of the falsehoods so widely circulated, and enable them to give a reason for their attachment to the Church of their fathers. In fact," he says, "the question of disestablishment and disendowment concerns the laity even more than the clergy: it is they who will suffer if their resident pastors are violently ousted; if the ministrations of religion are given in scanty measure or wholly withheld; if they lose the friends and helpers of the poor and afflicted—the fathers as well as teachers of their parishes."

THE WAKEFIELD BISHOPRIC.—The fund for the proposed new bishopric of Wakefield progresses slowly—$450,000 in all is required for its endowment. Of this about $170,000 has already been subscribed, while the Bishoprics Act of 1878 assigns $1,500 to the see, which, if capitalized makes about $50,000 more. The Bishop of Ripon is pushing the matter of making up the large deficiency, in order to have the bishopric established, and some large additional subscriptions are being made.

A QUESTIONABLE FIND.—An honorary canon of Canterbury writes to The Guardian that he has discovered the Canterbury Stone, vainly sought for at Rome by the late Dean Stanley. He says: "I found it, with a number of relics, in the sacristy of a church at Sienna, on my way here (Lucerne) from Rome a month ago. The stone itself is of a brownish color, and only 1.1-3 of an inch square; probably a portion may have been once cut off and taken away as a relic. On the edges is the incised inscription of which I send you a rubbing, and I shall be glad if you can throw any light on what it refers to. There is a small hole in the stone, through which is drawn a bit of narrow parchment, and it has the following writing, which the archivist of the state papers at Sienna had some difficulty in deciphering, but which he pronounced to be in the characters of the twelfth century: "De lapide super quo sangui. Beati Thomas Cantuariensis effusus est." From the stone on which was shed the blood of the blessed Thomas of Canterbury." Not being an antiquary, I was unable to decipher the incised inscription."

On the other hand, a letter signed J. O. W., and dated from Magdalen College, Oxford, states that "the small piece of stone mentioned in the Times of the 25th inst., and described as 'the Canterbury Stone sought for at Rome by Dean Stanley,' and found in the sacristy of a church at Sienna, proves to be a medicine stamp, the letters inscribed on the four narrow edges of the stone being inscribed backward, so as to be legible only when reversed, either by pressure upon a waxen or other soft surface, or by having the incised letters filled with ink and printed off upon paper."

SCOTLAND.

THE COADJUTOR BISHOP OF MORAY AND ROSS.—Bishop Kelly arrived at Inverness on Tuesday, August 25th. He was met by several of the clergy and laity, and welcomed to his new sphere of work.

Bishop Charles Wordsworth, of St. Andrew's, corrects the statement that the confirmation of Bishop Kelly's election was unanimous. Bishop Wordsworth did not join in the confirmation, and says that he has no intention of doing so, for reasons which he will give at his diocesan synod.

THE DISESTABLISHMENT QUESTION.—Mr. Gladstone and Lord Roseberry have each written a letter for publication stating that the question of the disestablishment of the Scotch Church is purely a matter for Scotchmen to deal with, and ought not to be made a test question at the coming Parliamentary election. At the last session of Parliament there were 1,361 petitions with 690,022 signatures against the Church of Scotland Disestablishment Bill, and only 108 petitions with 3,799 signatures in favor of the bill.

SYNOD OF ABERDEEN AND ORKNEY.—The annual Synod of the United Dioceses of Aberdeen and Orkney was held in Aberdeen on Thursday, August 27th. The bishop (Dr. A. G. Douglas), in his annual charge, spoke of the disestablishment question, and also reverted, with strong disapproval, to the suggestion of the use of unfemented wine in the Eucharist, and commended the Church Temperance Society. He thanked God for the abounding of signs of a healthy growth in the diocese, and also for the signs of a growing desire for unity among those now separated from the Church.

Dr. Walker of Moneyman moved "that this synod, while rejoicing in the recent happy meeting with our brethren of the American Church at the Seabury Centenary, trusts that such happy meetings will be less rare in future, and that our Church will respond readily to the evident desire of the American Church for a more frequent interchange of visits between America and Scottish Churches." He was of opinion that such meetings would be greatly for the benefit of them all.

Dean Ranken of Old Deer, in seconding the motion, said, aided by a wise and willing staff of organizers and helpers, the bishops and clergy succeeded in making the Seabury Centenary a magnificent success. But it would have been short of much of its meaning without the presence of the American element, and he thought it was right at this first meeting of the Synod of Aberdeen and Orkney to give permanent expression in the synodical records of what they all thought and felt, and he had, therefore, great pleasure in seconding Dr. Walker's motion.

The motion was carried unanimously, and on the motion of Mr. Wiseman of Buxburn, it was agreed to send a copy of the resolution to the Diocese of Connecticut.

The following petition, largely signed, was presented and supported in an able speech by the Rev. J. M. Dawson of St. Andrew's church, Aberdeen: "That your petitioners are deeply attached, by long familiarity, to the Liturgy commonly called the Scottish Communion Office. (2) That your petitioners are much dissatisfied with the position of inferiority assigned to this rite by Canon xxx. of the Code of Canons now in force, and more especially by section 4 of this canon, which ordains that 'at all Consecrations, Ordinations, and Synods the Communion Office of the Book of Common Prayer shall be used.' (3) Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your lordship, in your place in the Episcopal College, will take such canonical steps as are necessary so as to secure perfect equality of position for the English and Scottish Rites."

The bishop assured the petitioners that nothing should be wanting on his part to urge the petition upon the Episcopal College at its next meeting. One member of the synod went so far as to say that the Scottish Church would never prosper until her national office was reinstated in its supremacy.

JAPAN.

JAPANESE CHRISTIANS.—The Danish "Aldindelig Kirkeliste" quotes from the "Japan Mart" to the following effect: "In the recent census more than 80,000 Japanese avowed themselves Christians, of whom 30,000 were Romanists, 10,000 Russo-Greeks, and the rest connected with British and American missions. But the Russo-Greek form of Christianity seems to promise most. The Mikado himself is said to be inclined to it. Its head, Bishop Nicholas, is certainly the most popular of all the missionaries in the empire; he has ordained no small proportion of his adherents to the priesthood, some of whom, after further study in Russia, are to be raised to the episcopate. On the other hand, the Romish native clergy are now extremely few."

MAINE.

EPISCOPAL ACTS.—The North-East gives the following summary of Episcopal acts of the bishop of the diocese:

Camden.—On Monday, August 17th, the bishop preached at Evening Prayer at St. Thomas's church, and confirmed a class of four candidates presented by the rector, the Rev. Henry Jones.

Rockport.—On the following evening he preached and confirmed three persons, also presented by the Rev. Mr. Jones, in St. Mark's church. There were good congregations at both of these services.

Rockland and Thomaston.—St. Peter's church, Rockland, was visited by the bishop on Wednesday, August 19th, and St. John Baptist church, Thomaston, on the 20th. He preached at Evening Prayer on both occasions. It was a sore disappointment to the faithful missionary in charge of these stations that he was unable to present any candidates for confirmation, but there is evidently a growing interest in the services of the Church and in the labors of the missionary, at least at Thomaston.

Wiscasset.—In St. Philip's church, on the 21st, the bishop preached and confirmed one candidate presented by the rector, the Rev. Canon Fry. Extensive and substantial repairs and improvements have been made upon the church building in this parish during the present summer, and the congregation have now the satisfaction of worshipping in a comely and attractive "house of God." When a like work shall have been done upon the exterior of the rectory, the parish buildings will form a very pleasing group.

Poland Springs.—An interesting service was held by the bishop, on an urgent invitation of some of the guests at Poland Springs, in the Music Hall of the Spring House, on Sunday evening, August 23d. A congregation of about two hundred was assembled, the responses were hearty, and the musical parts of the service were excellently rendered by a selected choir. After the sermon, and a few remarks with respect to the missionary character of our Church work in this diocese, a substantial offering for the support of that work was made, for which a grateful acknowledgment is due.

Mechanic Falls.—Previous to the service above referred to, the bishop had driven to Mechanic Falls, six miles distant from Poland Springs, and there officiated for the first time. Several of our Church people in Buckfield came over to the neighboring town for this service, and, bringing Prayer Books with them, materially aided in the responsive parts of the worship. The use of the Universalist meeting-house was kindly proffered for the occasion, and some excellent singers rendered valuable assistance. The congregation, numbering a hundred or more, though generally unfamiliar with our mode of worship, gave heedful and reverent attention both to the service and sermon, and the few Church people of the town felt and expressed great satisfaction in the privilege thus afforded them.

Newcastle.—In St. Andrew's church, on Monday evening, St. Bartholomew's Day, the bishop preached, being assisted in the service by the Rev. Canon Fyne, who also presented one candidate for confirmation. The beautiful church was entirely filled by the assembled congregation, and a very real and deep interest was manifested in the discourse of the preacher.

At an early celebration of the Holy Communion in the same church on the following morning, nearly twenty participated in the blessed sacrament.

At the stated weekly evening service on Wednesday, the bishop, having remained in Newcastle for a day or two as the guest of some dear friends, again preached to a large congregation, many of whom subsequently gave him the opportunity of an hour's social converse with them. The entire community was at this time anxiously concerned for the recovery from a sharp and serious illness of an honored citizen and beloved physician, Dr. Dixon, and the prayers of the Church on his behalf were most heartily seconded by all of his fellow-townsmen.

VERMONT.

DIOCESAN ITEMS.—After his mid-summer rest the bishop proposes, God willing, and with improved health, to begin the autumnal visitation of the diocese, on Sunday, September 13th.

The ordination of the Rev. W. F. Weeks to the priesthood is appointed for Michaelmas, September 29th, at Enosburgh Falls.

The Vermont Church Choir Guild is to meet in Burlington, on October 22d, Mr. S. B. Whitney of Boston, being the conductor. The Vermont Branch of the Women's Auxiliary is to meet in Vergennes, on October 7th.

Church property in the following parishes and in one mission have been conveyed to the new corporation of "The Trustees of the Diocese of Vermont," viz.: those of Brattleboro, Burlington, Enosburgh, Island Pond, Northfield, Richmond, Poultney, Sheldon, St. Johnsbury. To these is now to be added the parish at Fairfax; and other parishes have the matter of transfer under consideration. The object of this transfer is to secure a better title to the Church property, without divesting the wardens and vestry of their usual rights in care and occupancy, and in use of insurance money in case of loss by fire. This very desirable object, the security of title to Church property, commends itself to all members of the Church. Its loss by debt, mortgage, sale, alienation, or by the death of the parish itself, is thereby prevented.

MASSACHUSETTS.

LENOX—Trinity Church.—The corner-stone of Trinity Church (the Rev. Justin Field, rector), was laid on Monday, September 7th, in the presence of a large congregation, which included Senator Dawes of Massachusetts, Mr. J. H. Choate and Judge Rockwell of New York, and many others of note who have subscribed liberally towards building the church, which is to cost $40,000. The tin box containing the church history and other things was deposited in the stone by the Hon. Chester A. Arthur, Ex-President of the United States, who is one of the subscribers to the building-fund.

RHODE ISLAND.

PROVIDENCE—St. Andrew's Church.—This church, the corner stone of which was laid on St. Andrew's Day, November 30th, 1883, was opened for divine service on Thursday, September 3d. It is not entirely completed, but nearly enough to warrant its formal opening. The church was filled, every seat and chair being occupied. The church was handsomely decorated with flowers, the altar, font, lectern and organ being almost covered. There were present of the clergy, the Rev. Messrs. T. H. Crocroft and G. S. Pine, late rectors of the parish, and the Rev. Messrs. E. H. Porter, G. H. Patterson, W. N. Ackley, Percy Barnes, C. E. Blanchet, A. E. Carpenter, and E. J. H. Van Deerin. The clergy assembled in the sacristy, and having vested, entered the church in procession, as the choir sang a processional hymn. The services were conducted by the late rector, the Rev. George S. Pine, in the necessary absence of the bishop. The Holy Eucharist was celebrated, preceded by Morning Prayer; the sermon being delivered by the first rector, the Rev. T. H. Crocroft. Before the sermon the Rev. Mr. Pine made a few remarks stating what had been accomplished, and expressing the hope that a large part of the debt remaining on the church, about $350, would be provided for by the offertory. The offerings amounted to $109, thus providing for nearly half the debt. After the services the visiting clergy and laity were entertained.

St. Andrew's had its origin in the winter of 1876, when the Rev. T. H. Crocroft began to hold services. Mr. Crocroft was rector of St. Phillip's, Crompton. Under his ministration the mission prospered, and in 1879 a Sunday-school was organized. Initiatory steps were taken to raise money to build a church, and these developed two years ago, into the appointment of a committee of the Lord's Guild, to solicit subscriptions and build the church. The corner-stone was laid in 1883, and the work progressed so well that the church was ready for occupancy at the beginning of the current month. Mr. Crocroft resigned in 1883 to take charge of a parish in Providence, and the Rev. G. S. Pine succeeded him, who recently resigned to take work in Boston. To the energetic work of these two faithful priests, earnestly backed by a faithful laity, is due the success of this mission.

St. Andrew's church is gothic in style, with a tower; it is forty feet by thirty-four, and is a handsome addition to the number of beautiful churches which this diocese possesses.

ALBANY.

TANNERSVILLE—St. John the Evangelist's Church.—The work on this little church, in which so many of our readers have taken an interest, and which they have aided with their offerings, has progressed more rapidly than its friends dared to hope. The expectation was to be able to roof the building, add the porches, put in the windows and the floor, thus enabling the church to be used for purposes of worship. In addition to all this, the walls are being plastered, the roof will be panelled and the arches put up, and, with the exception of painting and interior decoration, stalls, etc., the church will be entirely finished. The church will seat over two hundred people; one hundred and fifty chairs have been given for seats.

The church was opened for divine worship on Sunday, August 9th. There were three services, at 7 and 11 A.M. and at 4 P.M. It was a joyous and thankful day for those who had worked hard for this result. There was a large number of residents present, and the church was well filled. At the early celebration there were twenty communicants and thirty at the second celebration.

Some beautiful gifts have been presented to the church, among them a handsome Brussels carpet for foot pace and steps of the altar, two eucharistic and six vesper lights in brass, a dossal cloth, two alms basins and a very handsome bell. The altar cross and the brass altar desk are promised, and a lady is considering the giving of the west window.

Architecturally the church is correct and very effective. The interior impresses the beholder very much, and will, when finished, be very handsome.

About sixty persons have been baptized and thirty confirmed; and the bishop visits the church for confirmation on September 21st.

PAUL SMITH'S—St. John's in the Wilderness.

—There is probably hardly another summer retreat in the country where a strong interest in church work and services is so well sustained as at this popular resort in the Adirondacks. The visitors are appreciative of the Church privileges which by many are unexpectedly found here, and throughout much of the summer have filled the picturesque Church of St. John in the Wilderness and joined in the common prayer and praise with great heartiness. The ministering clergyman during August were the Rev. Milton Dotten and the Rev. Parker Morgan. The St. Regis Lakes are frequented by many campers, who in themselves form a considerable community, and are an important element in the church's congregation. It is a pretty scene on a Sunday morning to see the boats of these appearing from the different inlets and shores and gliding over the lake toward the hotel landing, whence the wagon road and a shaded wood path lead up to the church-crowned hill. "Be still, and know that I am God," was the subject most appropriately chosen for one Sunday's sermon, and made suggestive by the earnest preacher of the soul's opportunities in a season of retirement in the woods.

The services here impress anew upon the mind the importance of the Church's ministrations to her people, and to strangers at their retreats for rest and pleasure. Change of air and surroundings, and even the change from their own parish church and pastoral teachings, however dear these may be to them, quicken the mind and heart as well as the body, and a fresh interest and susceptibility are ready to meet sacred influences. And then the blessedness to the invalids compelled to spend months at such retreats! The Church seems to them a loving mother indeed, when she seeks them in their weakness and loneliness with "the means of grace," and her words of help and comfort. The clergy at such places, whether resident or visiting, may be sure that no work of theirs is apt to prove more influential for good than that done for those whom they thus meet by the way.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society.—The first meeting of the Board of Managers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, under the new management, was held in the chantry of Grace church on Wednesday, September 9th. It was preceded by a celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the Assistant-Bishop of New York being the celebrant. At the business meeting Mr. James

M. Brown was elected treasurer of the board. It was decided to extend to the remainder of the financial year the appropriation for both the foreign and domestic department, on the basis of the appropriation for the last three months. From an examination of the books, it appears that all liabilities connected with the foreign department have been paid, and a balance of $300 remains in the treasury.

NEW YORK—Funeral of the Rev. Dr. Tyng.—The burial service for the late Rev. Dr. Stephen Higginson Tyng was held in St. George's church (the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, rector), on Tuesday, September 8th. There were present the Presiding Bishop, the Assistant-Bishop of New York, the rector of the parish, of which the deceased was rector-emeritus, and about sixty other clergy. The remains were met at the door of the church by the bishops and clergy, preceded by the wardens and vestry of the parish and the full surpliced choir of men and boys. The opening sentences were said by the rector. After the singing of Hymn 531, the Rev. W. H. Benjamin read the lesson. Hymn 297 was then sung, and the assistant-bishop said that the Presiding Bishop, who was a life-long friend of the late Dr. Tyng, would make the address.

The Bishop of Delaware spoke with much feeling, giving some account of Dr. Tyng's character and ministry, and especially of his greatness and successfulness as a preacher. The Church was now much larger than when Dr. Tyng was in his prime, but it had no more effective and eloquent preachers. He instanced such men as Hawks, Bedell, etc., saying that Dr. Tyng stood first. He was sustained and eloquent in his preaching, was never at a loss for words, and, notwithstanding his vehemence and force, was full of feeling. He had no other theme save that of Christ and Him crucified. As a man, the speaker said, he was absolutely without fear. At the conclusion of the address Hymn 485 was sung, when the committal service was read by the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, the assistant-bishop, and the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton. The remains were taken to Greenwood for interment.

By invitation of the assistant-bishop, the clergy met in the chapel, to the west of the church, to appoint a committee to prepare a minute as a testimonial of the deceased, to be published in the Church papers. The assistant-bishop presided, and called on the Rev. Dr. Newton, successor to Dr. Tyng at the Church of the Epiphany, Philadelphia, for some remarks. He asked him especially to relate an incident which he had just related to himself. Dr. Newton stated that during the Native American excitement, some years ago, the mob determined to burn the Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Augustine, and to kill the Roman Catholic bishop. The bishop was in such peril of his life that he came to Dr. Tyng for protection. The latter received him in his house, and, going out on the door-step, told the excited mob that they couldn't touch a hair of the bishop's head without riding over his own dead body. As a result, the mob slunk away, and the bishop was unhurt.

Various incidents were also related by the Rev. W. H. Platt, the Rev. C. Walker, and the Rev. Dr. G. D. Wildes, the latter stating that a happy and pious old colored woman, a servant in the family, first called Dr. Tyng's attention to the subject of religion, and that he was largely indebted to her for his religious convictions.

At the conclusion of the addresses the assistant bishop appointed the Rev. Drs. Dyer, Morgan, Ryland, Eaton, Wildes, and the Rev. Messrs. Platt and Newbold, to draw up a minute expressive of the feeling of the meeting.

The bishop of the diocese sent a message by the assistant-bishop, regretting his inability to be present at the funeral, and testifying to his great respect for the character of the deceased. The assistant-bishop remarked that though the relations between the bishop and the former rector of St. George's were at one time strained, it came, at length, to be far otherwise.

NEW YORK—Church of the Holy Cross.—This church, which was erected through St. John the Baptist Foundation, was consecrated on Monday, September 14th, by the assistant-bishop of the diocese. The attendance was large, quite filling the church. At 10 a. m. the assistant-bishop and other clergy, for the most part in cassocks and surplices, entered the church, when the service of consecration was proceeded with. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. G. H. Houghton. In the evening of the same day confirmation was held by the assistant-bishop at eight o'clock.

The mission was recently incorporated under the statute providing for the incorporation of free churches, and by the terms of the statute no rent charge or exaction can ever be demanded of any person occupying a seat in the building owned or occupied by the mission, during public worship. In addition to the amount now guaranteed to the trustees, the sum of $2,000 will be required to carry on the work for the coming year, the trustees submit that this attempt to extend Church influence in this part of the town is of great importance to the Church at large. They feel that it is the duty of the Churchmen to see that this mission does not languish for want of support and trust that their appeal will be generously responded to.

The work of the mission began about ten years ago. The population reached is largely German, and the aim has been from the beginning to meet the needs of the German speaking people. Services have been regularly held in the German language, and after a time it was found necessary to supplement these services by those in English.

The number of communicants, German and English, is now two hundred and fifty, while five hundred children are cared for in the Sunday-school. The mission also embraces guilds for women, for boys and for girls, and sewing schools. In addition to this instruction is given to about one hundred persons.

The services during the octave on weekdays, and on all week days thereafter will be celebration at 5:30 o'clock in the morning, Matins at 9 o'clock, Evensong at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and mission service, German or English, procession of guilds, etc., with short sermon, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

On Sundays there will be English celebration at 7:30 a. m.; German celebration, with sermon, 9 a. m.; English Matins, 10:15 a. m.; English celebration, with sermon, 10:45 a. m.; English Evensong and catechizing, with sermon, 2 p. m.; German Vespers, with sermon, 7 p. m.; and English mission service and sermon, 8 p. m.

A cordial invitation is extended to Church people and others interested in Church-work among the poor, to visit the mission at any time the better to see the nature and extent of this work.

The spiritual charge of the mission will continue as heretofore in the hands of the clergy of the Order of the Holy Cross, assisted by the Sisters of St. John the Baptist.

NEW YORK—Church Temperance Society.—Mr. Robert Graham, the organizing secretary of the Church Temperance Society has addressed a letter to several of the bishops, asking that they bring to the attention of their clergy the subject of preaching sermons on temperance on the first Sunday in November. A few days after the letter was sent, a communication was received from the Bishop of Long Island, copies of which had been sent to all the clergy of the diocese. The communication is as follows:

"As the annual convention of the Church Temperance Society is to be held during the first week in November, it will greatly extend the interest of its work, and do good in many ways, if the clergy generally in this State and in others contiguous to it, will, on the first Sunday in November, preach on the terrible evil which the society is laboring to overthrow, and on the duty of the people of God everywhere to do what they can for the same end. Should there be any attempt at concert of action in the matter, I am sure the clergy of my diocese will promptly and zealously cooperate."

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Christ Church.—There has been placed in the chancel of this church (the Rev. Dr. James H. Darlington, rector), a fine oil painting, presented by Mrs. Wyndust of Locust Valley, L. I., as a memorial of her old and cherished friend, the Rev. Alfred H. Partridge, late rector of the parish. The Scripture scene delineated is that of the "Tribute Money," where our Lord meets the shrewd questioning of the Pharisees by answering, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." The figures of Christ, the Apostles and Jewish priests are of heroic size, and the central figure of the Saviour is of remarkable beauty and majesty.

This large and finely executed painting was purchased and brought to this country many years ago by Mrs. Wyndust's husband, recently deceased. Becoming, through her thoughtfulness, a memorial of a justly venerated servant of God, it has now found a permanent and appropriate resting-place.

GARDEN CITY—Cathedral Schools.—The Cathedral School of St. Paul, since coming under diocesan management, has shown a most vigorous growth. The committee determined, at the start to exert every endeavor to make known the extensive educational facilities provided by the schools of St. Paul and St. Mary, and have advertised extensively for this purpose. The schools will open on September 23d. Prospects indicate for St. Paul's about one hundred scholars, who will be provided with superior educational advantages by a most competent corps of instructors, each one of whom, though new at St. Paul's, is possessed of large and successful experience to qualify him for his work. St. Paul's promises, in a few years, to be one of the leading Church schools for boys in the country, and in this, its first year under diocesan management, it makes a long step in the right direction. The times demand nothing more, if so much, as Christian education for youth. The Diocese of Long Island, by its admirable schools in Garden City, and St. Catharine's in Brooklyn, is doing much in the line of this great duty.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

AUBURN—St. John's Church.—A local paper gives the following account of this church (the Rev. F. A. D. Launt, rector), and the installation of the new vested choir on Sunday, September 6th: "St. John's church, the bare walls of which in the past have been bleak and unsightly, has been handsomely kalamined and decorated by Downer Brothers, and the interior now presents a cheerful and finished appearance. The work has been done in the best manner, and reflects great credit upon the skill and exquisite taste of the Messrs. Downer, whose combination and blending of colors is not only appropriate to the edifice but pleasing to the eye. An approprize text of Scripture ornaments the wall over the altar, and adds an agreeable finish to the decorations. Mrs. Mary A. Davids, who donated one-third of the amount required to carry out the improvement, and Mrs. William B. Chisholm, who obtained by donations the remainder of the money, are entitled to the thanks of the congregation of St. John's for their efforts to beautify and adorn the church. A large congregation attended service there on Sunday night. A choir of male voices, fifteen in number, appeared for the first time in the service, dressed in black cassocks and white cottas. The choir was instituted by permission of Bishop Huntington, the rector, Mr. Launt, using the appropriate service written by the late Bishop Doane, of the Diocese of New Jersey. It was an impressive ceremony, and was performed in Auburn for the first time at St. John's on Sunday evening."

PHILADELPHIA—Convocational Work.—As the regular fall meetings of the convocations which form this diocese will soon be held, attention may be properly called to the means at hand for the accomplishing very much good work for the cause of missions. It is one of the causes of complaint against the old system that no one but the rector of the parish knew in what condition the Diocesan Missions were, and he was not always fully posted. Under the new order this is changed. The whole convention of the diocese is a general committee on missions; and the clergy and lay delegates of each parish are a special committee for that parish upon missions, who, being members of the convocation, hear the reports of missionaries and vote upon the appropriations. They are thus able to stir up a far greater interest in missions than was possible in the old way. Much greater results will flow than there ever has. As an example, a parish by no means strong, raised its assessment of $100 in a few minutes by the clergy and deputies getting together and talking over the matter. If this was done in each of our parishes much more than $12,000 would be raised, and an interest would be aroused that would surprise even the most sanguine.

PHILADELPHIA—Death of George L. Harrison.—Mr. George Lieb Harrison, who for some time has been in ill health, passed away at his summer residence, School Lane, Germantown, on Thursday morning, September 10th, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. He was a Philadelphian by birth and residence. Having been a student at law he was admitted to the bar, which profession he never followed, but took charge of his father's chemical works. In 1849 he became a partner in the firm of Powers & Weightman. Afterwards he was instrumental in organizing the firm of Harrison, Havemeyer & Co., whose towering sugar refinery looms up as one approaches the city from the river.

He was for many years connected with St. Luke's church, being the senior-warden for a large part of the time. He was a member of the General Board of Missions, and treasurer of the Episcopal Hospital. He was one of the trustees of the Philadelphia Divinity School from its establishment. He was also prominent in many charitable works, as well as the president of the first General Convention of Public Charities. He interested himself largely in the amelioration of the condition of the insane. To this end he collated, had printed, and distributed gratuitously a voluminous work on the laws which have been enacted bearing upon the care and protection of the insane.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON—St. John's Parish.—The steady growth of this parish cannot be well represented in figures, yet even these indicate something of the yearly increase of interest and zeal on the part of the congregation. The communion alms have grown from $1,400 to $1,900; the number of communicants in 1883, 600; in 1884, 700; in 1885, 800; Sunday-school pupils, from 400 to 600; total parish contributions from $23,000 per year to $32,300. Nearly two hundred sittings were called for and added in 1884. This year nearly $1,500 were contributed for missions alone. The enlargement and beautification of the church cost $23,000, and has been paid from the surplus funds of the parish.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Alban's Church.—This parish (the Rev. N. Falls, rector), having church, chapel and vestry of the total value of $12,000, seventy communicants, annual contributions averaging $600, about forty-five families including upwards of one hundred and sixty-five persons, holds its own, though at times against many odds, and under the present rector goes bravely on in good works. Though in government employment during the usual department hours, he makes abundant time for parochial duty, and his earnest works testify to his zeal.

WAYNE—St. John's Orphanage for Boys.—On Thursday, September 6th, the bishop of the diocese formally opened the building lately erected for this institution. It is a frame cottage, lined with brick, having sixteen rooms. It is built of the best materials, in the most complete and substantial manner. But it is hoped that in the course of time this much-needed charity will be so far developed and receive such aid that a larger and more substantial edifice of stone will be provided. The present house has cost about $6,000, and the trustees have $7,000 invested as the commencement of the endowment.

Evensong was said in the church, there being present in the church, besides the bishop and the rector of the parish (the Rev. F. H. Stubbs), the Rev. Messrs. John S. Miller, Geo. S. Johnson, Geo. W. Harrod, William F. Lewis and Robert H. Gernand. The bishop made an earnest address, his theme being "The true wealth of the Church." He gave a touching illustration of his meaning by describing the act of St. Laurentius, who, being summoned in Rome to reveal the supposed hidden treasures of the Christians, brought the Church's poor as her living "jewels" into the presence of the astonished judge. The wealth of the Church, the bishop urged, was not to be measured by the ability to do good, but by doing good. The treasures of the Church are souls and bodies succored and brought to Christ.

After the service in church a procession was made to the orphanage ground, immediately adjacent, the choir singing the 202d hymn. The bishop said prayers at the house door, in the chapel, refectory, kitchen and dormitories. He then returned to the chapel and concluded the service. The chapel, with its altar bright with lights and flowers, was beautiful to see. Before the bishop vested, the sisters and children knelt and received, one by one, his blessing.

This new orphanage, we understand, is the only Church institution for orphan boys in Maryland, and it ought to receive liberal support. Its income from all sources at present is adequate to maintain only seven children.

CUMBERLAND—Emmanuel Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. P. N. Meade, rector), on Sunday, September 6th, and preached at both the morning and evening service. He also catechized the Sunday-school in the afternoon. After the second service the bishop confirmed four persons presented by the rector, and delivered to them an instructive and earnest address. The offerings amounted to over $40, and according to the announcement of the bishop were devoted half to the Diocesan Missions and half to the Bishop's Contingent Expense Fund.

St. MARGARET—Death of the Rev. Dr. Ridout.—The Rev. Dr. Samuel Ridout, rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, died suddenly on Tuesday, September 8th. He was paying a visit to a relative about a mile from his own residence, and complained of feeling unwell. He lay down on the sofa, and in a few moments expired. Dr. Ridout had just returned from Berkeley Springs, West Virginia, and was apparently in excellent health. He was about sixty-six years old, and had been rector of St. Margaret's parish for twenty-five years. Dr. Ridout was universally respected as a man of preëminent piety and sound judgment.

The burial service was held at Dr. Ridout's residence, "White Hall," the Rev. Messrs. W. S. Southgate and T. C. Gambrell officiating. The interment was in the family burial lot on the place. It was desired to bring the clergy of the Annapolis Convocation, of which Dr. Ridout was dean, together to the burial, but it was found impracticable to do so.

EASTON.

THE BISHOP'S FAILING HEALTH.—The bishop has returned from Massanutta Springs, Va., and is now at the Church House in Baltimore. He is falling rapidly, according to late reports, and it is said that his continuance is now hut a matter of a few days.

WEST VIRGINIA.

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS—St. Thomas's Church.—This church has not received the aid during the past summer that it had every reason to expect, considering the number of visitors, and the apparent interest taken in it.

Years ago the idea of a consecrated edifice in which to worship, instead of having prayers in the ball room, commended itself to many of the guests who disliked using the same room for dancing and worship. This led ultimately, after some years of patient labor by the Rev. R. H. Mason, who was missionary in this part of the State, and the ladies of the hotel, to a practical result in the shape of a fund of several thousand dollars. The fact, however, of the residents and guests uniting in the work gave rise to a serious difficulty. On the one hand the number of resident Churchmen was so small, that a church of very contracted dimensions would suffice for their use; while on the other, the congregation in summer is swelled to a great size, owing to the number of visitors, so that a large church is required to seat them. It was necessary, therefore, to build the church to suit the latter requirement, and the expenses have been in proportion. The church is built of Georgia pine, is of very pretty design, and has, besides the vestry, a chamber called the "Prophet's Room," where the visiting clergy can be accommodated while taking their meals at the hotel.

In time there will be sufficient work here to keep a resident clergyman constantly employed. In winter there is the resident population, and in summer the guests at the hotel require clerical ministrations. At present, though there are apt to be clergy among the guests, the only dependence is on the Rev. R. H. Mason, settled at Union, several miles distant.

For years he has faithfully labored, not only in his own parish, but in missionary work here and in other settlements, and his labors have been of the most self-denying character.

The bishop of the diocese has the success of the church here very much at heart. About $5,000 is required to finish the chapel, and one of the bishop's conditions is that workmen shall be employed only when there is money to pay them and no debt shall be incurred.

The lot on which the church is built has been paid for. The church is roofed in and partly completed, so that services can be held in it on dry Sundays. The chancel window has been presented by the Rev. Dr. Osgood Herrick, chaplain at Fort Monroe, and money for another has been given through the Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim. The other windows have not been provided for. A reading desk has been provided for, and an altar and chancel chair, as well as an organ have been presented. It is now intended to complete the vestry before winter, so that it may serve for the use of the resident congregation; otherwise there will be no place for them until next summer. About $1,000 has been raised which will be used in paying for the work done this summer, and work will not be resumed next season until funds are in hand.

It is earnestly desired that funds may be had for the completion of the church. The comparative smallness of the amount needed leads to the hope that some one may contribute thereto of his abundance. Contributions may be sent to the Rev. R. H. Mason, Union, West Virginia, or to the bishop at Parkersburg.

NORTH CAROLINA.

EPISCOPAL VISITATION.—The bishop of the diocese has just completed an interesting tour of visitation through several of the mountain counties. Leaving Asheville in company with the Rev. D. H. Buel on the morning of the 8th of August, he drove to Waynesville, in Haywood County. Here on Sunday, August 9th, at Grace Church, in the mountains, there was morning service, with adult baptism, confirmation, and the Holy Communion, the bishop preaching. In the afternoon at the chapel lately built, but not yet completed, in a lovely mountain valley three miles distant from Waynesville, there was evening service with adult and infant baptisms, the bishop preaching. This chapel, with its school room (a transept of the chapel), is in the midst of a large population of hardy mountaineers, many of whom have come and are coming into the Church.

The next point visited was Webster, the county seat of Jackson County, where services were held.

The little band of church folk here are zealous and earnest, and the prospect of growth is encouraging. From Jackson we went still westward into Macon County, and here, in the mission field of the Rev. Mr. Deal, there were services, at St. John's Church, Castogee, and at two other stations, with confirmation and the Holy Communion. There is here every appearance of encouraging progress. While here a very eligible lot in Franklin, the county town, was secured, and steps taken toward the erection of a nice church. From Macon County, we came into the valley of the Cullowhee, in Jackson County, where we spent Sunday. Here a church (St. David's) has just been erected, which, though very plain, is substantial and beautiful. It is not yet completed, but we held services in it, having confirmation and the Holy Communion, and the bishop preaching. Through the kind efforts of two earnest Christian women (one of whom is sojourning in that valley and the other had come from Waynesville to be with us), the service was enriched with all the usual music, well rendered, and such a service held for the first time in the very heart of these mountains was most impressive. A prominent resident of this valley, who is very helpful in building the church, and three of his daughters were confirmed; and the first fruits, we have reason to believe, of a goodly harvest ere long to be gathered there.

From Cullowhee we drove to Cashier's Valley, a beautiful valley three thousand six hundred feet high. This mission is under Mr. Deal's charge, and he is doing a good work here among the native population. We held services in the Methodist building, and the bishop preached and celebrated the Holy Communion. A chapel has been erected here (the chapel of the Good Shepherd), but it is not yet finished. It has been built hitherto mainly by one family, Colonel C. F. Hampton and his sisters, of Columbia, S. C., who have a summer home in Cashier's Valley. Aid is now urgently needed to complete this church, and any aid that may be kindly sent for this object will be most usefully bestowed.

From Cashier's Valley we drove to Brevard, Transylvania County, thirty-five miles; and in descending a mountain were for a few moments in imminent danger of our lives, but were mercifully preserved.

On that evening at Brevard, the bishop received the intelligence of the death of his daughter, the wife of General William R. Cox, and was obliged immediately to return to Raleigh; setting off at once, and travelling all night in order to take the train at Hendersonville. At the bishop's desire, Mr. Buel remained and held services as he had appointed them. On Saturday we had service at St. Paul's, in the valley. On Sunday, August 23d, we held service with the Holy Communion, in the new, but yet unfinished church of St. Philip's, in Brevard. On Monday, the Feast of St. Bartholomew, there was morning service, as the bishop had appointed, at Bowman's Bluff, a most beautiful point on the French Broad River, near which five families of intelligent English Church people have lately settled. The service was in the open air, under the shade of a spreading old oak tree, and in full view of an exquisite landscape of lovely valley, grand encircling mountains, and winding river. There is the prospect of immediately supplying this point and others adjacent with the services of an excellent English clergyman who has just come to labor among us.

This missionary tour impressed the bishop more deeply than ever with the importance of this mountain region and its encouraging prospects. The railroads are now here, and are vigorously pushing their way through the mountains, opening to the world their fertile valleys and plateaus, and disclosing the wealth of the mountains themselves, in forests and mines, and in their fertile soil, and withal a climate of the utmost salubrity. Population is flowing in, and now is the Church's opportunity. We need missionaries, and still more (for missionaries can be had) we need the means to build plain churches and school-houses. With these, by God's blessing, a rich harvest, sure to be gathered, is here at hand.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON—St. Mark's Church.—Several of the churches of this city were damaged by the recent storm. The most seriously injured was St. Mark's (colored) church. Of this the News and Courier of September 3d says:

"The roof is entirely stripped; the interior of the church of course is destroyed. The fine new organ is exposed to all the rain. It will take all of $3,000 to restore the church. The congregation is undaunted, however. They worship now at St. Timothy's chapel, at the corner of Ashley and Bee streets, and wretched as last Sunday afternoon was, a sufficient number gathered there to organize for the arrangements to repair the church. Those present subscribed $563, a pretty good beginning, and an evidence of their zeal and steadfastness. Every member of the congregation will be called on by the committee, and, what is peculiar to that congregation, every member will give as much as he is able."—The Church Messenger.

CHARLESTON—St. Michael's Church.—The Charleston News and Courier of September 4th, has the following regarding the damage to this church during the recent cyclone:

"The havoc wrought by the storm in St. Michael's church is much greater than was at first supposed. Most of the damage to the interior, however, was done by the rain which followed the storm. During the entire week oceans of water poured through the roof and flooded the church, breaking the ceiling, in some places and deluging everything. Strange to say, however, the water percolated through the tile floor and had disappeared in the ground below. The handsome chandelier has been taken down for fear of accidents, and all the furniture in the church, including the cushions, etc., has been taken out and placed in the sun to dry. It is a subject of congratulation that the splendid organ escaped uninjured, the sexton, Mr. Bealy, having taken extraordinary precautions to protect it by covering it with canvas and such other textile fabrics as could be secured.

The historic ball which was blown down by the gale is lying in the vestibule of the church, and is at present the source of much care on the part of the sexton. Many persons have applied at the church for the privilege of seeing the ball, and this was freely granted, Mr. Beasley never dreaming of the dangerous animal known as the relic hunter. A day or two ago he saw a gentleman with a lead plate in his hand and instinct caused the sexton to ask what it was. The man was a relic hunter. He had carefully detached the plate from the table to which it had been nailed and was quietly and coolly walking off with it. It was taken away from him and then it was discovered to have been the plate put on the ball when the steeple was repaired in 1832 by the father of the late Mayor Schriener. On it is the following inscription cut into the lead: "W. Kelley, of Philadelphia, contractor for painting work, etc., 1832."

Since this little incident the sexton has watched the ball with as much intensesness as a well trained cat will watch a mouse. Otherwise it would be carried off piecemeal. When he made the first discovery some other enterprising relic hunter had commenced operations looking to the removal of another lead plate which was tacked on during the repairs to the steeple, just after the war, by an apprentice."

FLORIDA.

ORLANDO—St. Luke's Church.—The Rev. C. S. Williams, General Missionary of the diocese, writes as follows to the Church and Home, of this parish (the Rev. C. D. Barbour, rector):

"New parishes are apt to be so absorbed in effort to secure their own maintenance and permanence as to ignore the interests of the Church in other places. But St. Luke, Orlando, gave to the General Missionary very clear indications that it is not infected with the congregationalism which is dead to others' call for help. On the morning of the twelfth Sunday after Trinity, a large congregation assembled in the church. There was an evident eagerness to know what the Church is doing, and how the means for doing are obtained. The fact of the existence of spiritual destitution at manifold points, led to the consideration and understanding of the 'Woman's Auxiliary Society,' the sole channel through which money gets into the missionary treasury, if an occasional offertory be excepted. Steps are taken for the immediate organization of a branch of the Woman's Auxiliary Society. On the same day, in the evening, a fair congregation gathered in the Church of the Good Shepherd, at Maitland. Here, too, the people desired to learn about missionary operations. Some, perhaps most, will seek to participate therein, by becoming members of a branch of the Diocesan Missionary Society.

"At both services the rector, the Rev. Mr. Barbour, added very earnest words to what had been spoken by the General Missionary.

"Winter Park, almost within sight of Maitland, beautiful for situation, is bound to be entitled by its splendid private residences, its large and elegant hotel, its magnificently endowed and thoroughly equipped college, to the designation, 'The Superb.' A church in keeping with the prevalent magnificence will be erected the ensuing year. The site has been given, and five acres of land will be donated for a glebe.

"It will not be long before two clergymen will be indispensable to the proper care of the places above named."

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE—Church Home.—During the past month a number of children have been cared for in the free ward of the Church Home, which has been opened for the special purpose of giving to sick children and weary mothers the great advantage of pure air and careful nursing.

This is strictly a charitable work, there being no charge for admission, and the doors are always open to any sick child, and if desired, the mother also. It is not necessary that the child should be dangerously ill and in peril of death, but children will be received who are enfeebled by the hot weather or any other cause, and who would probably be benefited by a change of air and escape from the heated city.

Dr. Bodine, physician in charge of the home, with ready gladness gives personal attendance to all inmates of the home who may need his services.—Kentucky Church Chronicle.

OHIO.

DEAF MUTE SERVICES.—The Rev. A. W. Mann, the general missionary to deaf-mutes, has been closely at work during the summer. He has attended conventions and reunions of deaf-mutes in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio, holding services at all of them.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

COLUMBUS—Deaf-Mute Services.—The sixth triennial reunion of the Ohio deaf-mutes was held at the State Institution, at Columbus, in the latter part of August. A large number attended. The Church Mission to Deaf-mutes was represented by the Rev. Dr. Francis J. Gore and the Rev. A. W. Mann. Two services were held. At the last one the Rev. Mr. Mann baptized a child of deaf-mute parents.

INDIANA.

TERRE HAUTE—St. Luke's Church, Nail Works.—On Monday, September 7th, the ancient ceremony of "turning the sod" was observed on the McLean lot, recently given to St. Luke's church. At 4:30 P.M. a procession started from the Sunday-school room, consisting of the children and teachers of the school, followed by the officers of St. Luke's and St.

Stephen's Brotherhood, after whom came the rector of St. Stephen's church (the Rev. Dr. Walter Delsfield), while the rear was brought up by visiting friends. On reaching the lot, a hollow square was formed, with the stake marking the northeast corner of the foundation in the centre. After the hymn "Blest be the Tie" was sung by the brotherhood, portions of Scripture were read and prayers said by the rector, and while the doxology, "Praise God from Whom all blessings flow," was sung, Mrs. Major Donaldson was escorted to the northeast corner of the foundation, where she proceeded to dig the first sod, in the form of a Latin cross. The rector then stated that all felt honored to have this venerable lady present on this occasion, as she was one of the few Church people who welcomed Bishop Kemper to Terre Haute nearly fifty years ago. This was to be a free church, built especially for the Nail Works district, and therefore it was earnestly hoped that many friends would contribute toward its erection. The corner-stone would probably be laid with Masonic ceremonies on Sunday, September 20th, and the bishop of the diocese was expected to conduct the religious services on that occasion.

TERRE HAUTE—Opening of St. Matthew's Hall.—Visitors to the new hall which the congregation of St. Matthew's have opened beheld a delectable sight on the afternoon of Sunday, September 6th. Such a host of bright-eyed girls, with each a bunch of sweet flowers, and such a cluster of happy-looking boys, were surely never seen. Mr. Longman, the superintendent of the mission, and Mr. Griffith, the treasurer, were busily occupied trying to extemporize seats for the increased number of scholars. Hereafter there will be benches for all. The rector of St. Stephen's church opened the new hall with appropriate exercises, and St. Matthew's Mission started on its career under good auspices.

CRAWFORDSVILLE—St. John's Church.—The Rev. Montgomery H. Throop, Jr., has resigned the rectorship of this parish, to take effect on December 1st. His rectorship has lasted a year, and has been one of the most successful this parish has ever known. The church has been repaired within and without, painted, carpeted, and decorated, and the chancel has been newly furnished. The average congregation has increased from twenty-three to seventy-eight. There have been twenty-five baptisms. The reason of Mr. Throop's resignation is the removal of nine Church families from Crawfordsville, including the two wardens. The parish will probably be united with some other.

CHICAGO.

WASHINGTON HEIGHTS—Consecration.—The consecration of the Northeastern deanery was held in St. Jude's Mission (the Rev. John Rushton in charge), on Monday, September 7th. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. H. G. Perry and M. V. Averill, and addresses were made by the Rev. Drs. Clinton Locke and T. N. Morrison, on "The Good Parishioner" and "Punctual Church Attendance." On Tuesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the dean (the Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke) being celebrant, after which the Rev. J. S. Smith read a paper on "The Reality of Spiritual Things." At the business meeting statements of the condition of the mission work and its needs were made by the Rev. Messrs. T. N. Morrison, Jr., H. G. Perry, J. Rushton and A. Lechner and Mr. T. B. Townsend. Measures were taken to foster the services of the Church at several points in the deanery brought to the attention of the meeting. In the evening, Evening Prayer was said by the priest in charge and the Rev. Edward Oliver, and a sermon preached by the Rev. M. V. Averill.

QUINCY.

QUINCY—Church of the Good Shepherd.—A choral festival was held in this church (the Rev. Dr. W. B. Corby, rector.) on the evening of Wednesday, September 2d. The choir of St. Paul's parish, Warsaw, joined the choir of the parish in the services. There were present, besides the rector, the Rev. Messrs. William Bardens, A. Q. Davis and W. W. Corby. The vested choristers, thirty two in number, preceded by the crucifer, carrying a processional cross, entered the main door singing "The Church's One Foundation," and proceeded up the middle aisle to their seats on the chancel platform. After the regular Evening, a Te Deum of thanks was sung, the rector taking the solo parts.

The rector made a few remarks, expressing the pleasure it gave all in having the St. Paul choir visit them, stating it was the first time they had ever received such a visit from, or held such a service with, any choir. He then introduced the Rev. William Bardens, who spoke of the object of boy choirs. He stated that it was difficult to get boys to attend church after they were about fourteen years of age, and when they would go to church they usually took a back seat. Now, with a boys' choir, they have something to interest them; they feel that they can be of use to the church, and when once in the habit of attending they usually continue to do so. And they learn the beautiful service of the Church and accomplish a vast amount of good in assisting the priest and teaching the people.

After the 169th hymn, the rector pronounced the benediction, and the choristers and clergy retired, singing as a retrocessional, "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

MINNESOTA.

MINNEAPOLIS—St. Barnabas Hospital.—On Tuesday, August 25th, a fire starting from the chimney of the laundry of the hospital, rapidly spread through the older building and into the Welles Pavilion, which was full of fever patients. Fortunately, all the patients were safely removed to the new building and to the neighbors'. The old building and the Welles Pavilion were a total loss, and this just after they had been put in excellent order at an expense of about $3,000.

The insurance barely covers the repairs recently made, so the buildings are a loss to the hospital. This great blow comes at an especially unfortunate time, as during the three autumn months it was expected that the hospital would be filled to its utmost capacity. The time has come when a generous public ought to consider the great work of mercy done by St. Barnabas in past years, when for a long time it was the only hospital in the city. Its good work is also sorely needed to-day, for since the College Hospital closed there is hardly hospital accommodations for the demand during the typhoid fever season. The insurance money ought to be used to build a kitchen, laundry and servants' quarters separate from the wards in the centre of the lot, and the public ought to enable the trustees to build a permanent fireproof building where the old one burned down.—The Church Record.

IOWA.

FORT DODGE—St. Mark's Church.—In May last, when the Rev. R. J. Walker assumed charge of this parish, the parish had been without a rector for a whole year, and during that period there had been no services held; there was no Sunday-school, neither pupils nor teachers. The work of the present rector has

SCIENCE IN THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Without coming before the Rev. Dr. Fuller and the gentleman to whom he refers in his letter in your paper of September 5th, allow me, for the general reader, to give a few instances of some things which the "Old Testament says" about "clouds, vapors, rain," and a few other matters of science. (I take them from "Moses Right," etc., by Cumming.)

"All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again." Here is the doctrine of aqueous circulation, too popularly known now to require comment.

"The wind whisteth about continually, and returneth again according to his circuits." Here is that of currents and counter-currents of air.

"He hangeth the earth upon nothing." Gravitation before Newton.

"My doctrine shall drop as the rain and distill as the dew upon the grass. Dew neither ascends nor descends; it distills."

"The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he ariseth. The sun goeth towards the South, and turneth about towards the North." (If it be right to read the sun for "he.") Rotation of earth on axis, and course of planets in orbit. Ask any astronomer what this verse means.

"The life of the flesh is in the blood." Medical fact, that the blood is the life. Venesection is now nearly unknown. Ask any doctor.

"He maketh weight for the winds." Galileo in prison explained to the peasant the theory of atmospheric pressure, why water would rise in a tube only 33 feet. But Job was ahead of him.

"Through the scent," inhaling "of water, will it bud and bring forth boughs like a plant." Plants literally breathe. Parks are the "lungs of cities." We exhale carbonic acid gas; plants oxygen; the underside of leaves is full of pores, and the lungs, and so man and vegetation exchange. A tree is a sort of vegetable animal, with stomach, glands, lungs, veins, arteries, need of rest and sleep, etc.

"Though the fig tree shall not blossom." The fig, botanically, is a thorn; really this tree has the thorn on its stem. What we eat is small "unsexual flowers" attached to a succulent base. (So the calla is not a flower, but a blanched leaf. Nature is full of these "methods in its madness.") Consult your botanists.

"They shall be burned with hunger." No one dies of starvation—a comfort to the poorly-paid clergy! They cannot die (scientifically) of that, anyhow—they who "starve" are only burned up by the inhaled oxygen, which, having no food in the stomach to exhaust itself on, consumes the stomach itself and other parts. Yet Moses told us this before science found it out. Ask any chemist.

"The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall be as blood, when the Lord shall visit his own wrath, when he will smite his own people." Yea, verily, do St. Peter and science agree. Melting daily by the slow but sure process of oxygenation are all the elements. Rusty iron is iron melting. Every old roadside horse-shoe confirms St. Peter. Iron ore is iron melted, or smelted in the gigantic furnaces of the blast and open hearth. We get iron out of her own rough moulds, where, millions of years after, the pick of the miner finds it.

"He stretched out the North over the empty place;" and "canst thou hind the sweet influences of Pleiades," our authors use as further instances, but these and others will be passed by for lack of space.

I have not seen Dr. Fuller's commentary, nor the article of the president of the university, and may be going over ground. If so, the editors who are supposed to know all such things, and most others, can easily suppress at once my lines and myself. I have thought, that perhaps, these instances in which, in one way or degree or another, the sacred writers who "dipped their pens in inspiration," preceded by thousands of years the modern man of science, might be of help to, at any rate, the general reader.

Job, Moses, Solomon, St. Peter and the rest, long before Newton, Harvey, Plato, Fiteroy, or any of the rest of our useful company to which they belong, stated scientific facts in scientifically exact terms. Back from the plains of Shinar, might Galileo have heard the whisper which, in Roman Catholic chains, he himself dared not utter, lest he should die, and not suffer and linger only in his dungeon. Pope and cardinal might have had fewer sins of omission to repent of, had they better studied their Bibles: "He maketh weight for the winds."—"He hangeth the earth upon nothing."—"The sun ariseth . . . goeth down . . . goeth towards the North . . . turneth about towards the South." But, nil mortuum bonum: may they rest in peace.

No doubt, the most beautiful instances of Biblical accuracy is the Mosaic account of "light;" "face of the deep," i. e. fluid-state of original matter; and those distinct distinctions (never confused, by Moses) between lux and luminaria; phos and phosterea; ovr and maaroth. But, juw satia. R. W. LOWRIE.

UNIFORMITY, OR NOT?

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Of late years there seems to have been a decided move in the Church towards lack of uniformity. And the objection is made against the enrichment of the Prayer Book that it will increase this tendency. But if the revision of the Prayer Book is adopted, it will give the sanction of constitutional law to many diversified practices that have grown up in different dioceses and parishes. And the failure to approve of other practices in vogue in some churches, when the subject of ritual has been formally considered, should, and probably would, for a time lead to the abandonment of unwelcome and unwholesome applications.

Until some action is formally taken by the Church on these matters, her loyal sons are placed between two fires upon many such questions. Rubrics or canons forbid, or have for years been regarded as forbidding, practices which custom in a large number of parishes sanctions. Which shall prevail, rubrics and canons or custom? How general must a usage become before custom establishes it as fairly permissible or binding?

But in another direction there seems as great diversity of practice arising, without, however, the same hope of relief to the lay joy-seeker. I mean in the matter of vestments. Here fashion—call it works of ecclesiastical—as unsettled the minds of the lay clergy, as to what should or should not be worn as the official dress. So far as I am posted, the only legislation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States in reference to her priesthood and diaconate upon vestments, is to the effect that her priests and deacons shall be clothed in the accustomed habit worn by the same orders in England at the time of our organization as a National Church. That was then the white surplice, black stole and collar bands, with the black collegiate gown for the parson. The collar bands are discarded. The black stole is largely supplanted; and even the surplice's whiteness is frequently greatly abridged so as to display much of the casock beneath or largely covered by gaudy hoods of various colors.

The modifications in the cut of the surplice need trouble no one. But the matter of the stole is difficult. One who has always been accustomed to the black stole, and who believes it is that which is alone sanctioned by Church law, may, I think, justly hesitate to use the white or green or purple stole, because he cannot give a fair reason for the change. He cannot say that A, B, and C, used colored stoles should not be allowed to depart from the alphabet follow! If he appeals to Anglican or Romish use may it not be answered, Are they sufficient authorities to justify innovations in the American Church without action by our Church? If he claims that the newer customs in such things are allowed, because never condemned by the General Convention, would not parity of reasoning justify many imitations of the Romish Church that have sadly disturbed loyal Churchmen!

These matters of vestments and ecclesiastical colors are of comparative insignificance with the preaching of the pure Word of God and the due administration of the Sacraments. Because judicious men so recognize them, some have more readily adopted them because urged to do so by ambitious laymen. These same ambitious laymen or lay-women, while pressing the point of the comparative little moment of these externals as a reason for their adoption, do seem to make them out as all important.

It may be beneath the dignity of our Church legislators to pass canons upon habits and colors ecclesiastical. Or, being men, they may hesitate to decide on matters, which in the secular world are almost entirely surrendered to women. But, while here, as in liturgies, it may be wise to grant greater liberty than an old-fashioned Churchman thinks is now lawful, it surely would settle many vexed discussions if the permissible vestments and the proper Church colors were distinctly declared by the Church.

PARISH RECORDS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The letter of the Rev. D. A. SANFORD in your issue of Sept. 5, brings up a matter of very real and practical importance: The safety of Parish Records. That all the clergy carefully and accurately write the minutes in these volumes (which is, I fear, assuming too much), the volumes themselves are often exposed to injury, and the danger of destruction or loss. Thus, I know of one such volume from the midst of which half-a-dozen written pages at some former time were snatched out with a knife. In a Southern parish with which I am very familiar, the records from the beginning were found by the new rector after a long interregnum at the bottom of a barrel of old rubbish, the haunt of mice and beetles, where they had been tossed months before by the servant in charge of the rectory, as part of the general clearing up of the parish. In my own parish, the volume with records extending from the beginning of the Revolution well into the present century has been missing for, probably, forty years. I could multiply illustrations, from my own knowledge, but spare your readers. Now, these records are often the most interesting that a parish has, and, manifoldly, baptisms, marriages, ages, deaths, and the like. To say nothing of spiritual considerations, questions of legitimacy, the descent of property, army, and navy pensions, and the like, are settled by appeal to them. Their mutilation or loss by fire, or otherwise, then becomes a very serious matter; and, manifoldly of this, I had prepared a draft of a canon which I meant to propose to the last General Convention, but the pressure of work in the House growing out of the Ritual Revision prevented that.

The canon, if passed, would be incorporated with Section 5, Canon 12, Title I. It would direct the recording of each baptism, marriage, or in case of vacancy, the wardens or trustees, to make a return to the bishop at each annual diocesan convention of all baptisms, marriages, confirmations, and burials during the past year, and make it the duty of the bishop to have such entries written in the Bishop's Register. The result to be that where a parish record is destroyed or stolen or lost, easy reference can be had to the Diocesan Register, which it may be assumed would be kept in some fire-proof receptacle. I cannot but think that such a scheme would commend itself to the common-sense of the Church, and if I should be in the next General Convention, I propose to bring it forward.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE BISHOP WORDSWORTH.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

It is known to those of your readers who are in the way of seeing the English Church papers, that, at a public meeting held in April last, it was resolved that a canopied recumbent effigy of the late Bishop Christopher Wordsworth should be placed in Lincoln Cathedral.

It has been thought not improbable that some American Churchmen would wish to unite with their English brethren in such a tribute to the memory of one whose consecrated abilities were at the service and whose learned writings and holy influence and example are now the heritage of the whole Church. The committee charged with the reception of subscriptions for this memorial have, therefore, placed in my hands some copies of the papers issued with this end in view.

It will give me pleasure to send a copy of these papers to any one wishing to make such a subscription, and to receive and transmit to the committee any sums which may be entrusted to me for the purpose.

GRACE CHURCH, WEST FARMS, N. Y.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In a kindly article in your paper of the 5th inst., reference is made to Grace Church, West Farms, and to those to whom it is indebted for the revived interest in its welfare and enlarged usefulness. So far as others than the writer of this note are concerned, its praise is well deserved; but I am sure that they will agree with me in saying that no story of this new work and its large promise would be complete which did not own our preëminent obligations to the singularly unselfish and efficient services of the Rev. Alfred Poole Grint, the late rector of the parish. Mr. Grint, our great sorrow, felt his duty, at Easter, to accept of a call to the Diocese of Long Island; but, with a rare generosity, continued, after he had removed thither, to give us his most helpful services in manifold ways, and with most important results. We want him to know (for I am sure I may venture to speak for the parish as well as for myself), that we can never forget what we owe to him.

"SUFFER US NOT."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

It is a sad thought that your correspondent is so annoyed by those grand words of our Barial Service, which I would not have changed for all the world: "Curse God, and die," said Joh's wife to him (see Job. ii. 9.) And when your fair correspondent takes into consideration the terrible sufferings which God may send upon us, for our sins, through, she will see the exquisite beauty of having such a necessary prayer put into our mouths by our mother, the Church. I think we may be allowed, with Bishop Andrews, to pray daily that our death may be "as free from pain as may be," yet, if it be not God's will, "suffer us not at our last hour for any sins of death to fall from thee."

W. S. HAYWARD.

NEW BOOKS.

THE CONGO AND THE FOUNDING OF ITS FREE STATE. A Story of Work and Exploration. By Henry M. Stanley, with over one hundred full-page and smaller illustrations, two large maps and several smaller ones. Two volumes. (New York: Harper & Brothers.) pp. 388-400.

Mr. Stanley has addressed his book more especially to the commercial world. But he appeals to a far wider range of readers than those who are interested in the opening of African railways and for trade to be opened in the equatorial regions of the great region watered by the river which gives its name to the book. As a story of persevering and successful effort it is far above most novels. It is not easy to lay down the book when once it is taken up. It is a book, too, for the student of history, for it exemplifies in the present the same task that has been undertaken in the past by the founders of great colonial empires. It brings freshly up in contrast the two great struggles for a foothold on this continent of the rival nations of France and England, for it discloses a method singularly combined of the best qualities of each, with a careful avoidance of the errors of both.

But it has a still greater interest for the friends of Christian missions, because it meets as no other work has done, the practical questions involved, viz.: how to deal with the natives, and how to meet the dangers of the climate. Making all allowance for Mr. Stanley's interested views, we cannot but feel that he has here given a very just and impartial picture of the native negro. He shows that it is very easy to deal mistakenly with these savage tribes, and that there is required the highest degree of patience, justice, tact and good temper, in order to manage them. But he shows also that there is that which has always been wanting to the North American tribes—a willingness to labor, and a capacity of doing good work in subordination to the abler and better educated European. He shows, also, that while the Indian races have no "staying power," but rapidly die out before the white man, the African thrives and multiplies, and that only where the slave trade has come in with its incredible waste has there been any check to population. What he says of the prosperity which can be developed in the Congo regions is supported by careful statistics. Indeed, one charm of the book is its striking contrast of matter-of-fact detail with the most romantic adventure. In its indirect way it is as good as a sermon to young men. We have rarely seen the ideal of duty better set forth than it is in these pages; the impression of a temper which believes in doing with all one's might the thing one's hand finds to do, the thoughtful consideration of others, the casting aside of all selfish "nonsense" about one's dignity and position. What he says concerning the climate is worthy of very careful consideration. He speaks from an experience emphasized by one hundred and twenty fevers, and we are fully persuaded, has discovered the secret of dealing with the dangers of the African atmosphere. That lies in avoiding violent changes of temperature, all intemperance, and all mental depression. A cool head, a light heart, a watchful look-out for sun-strokes and draughts, will go very far toward preserving life on the Congo. Ignorance and recklessness have done more to fill African graves than any other causes. We have been able only to touch upon the leading features of this book, but we must not pass by the important one that it sets forth the true position of the Free State of the Congo and its relations to the civilized world. Whether it can be successfully carried out in the future is impossible to say, but the idea of Mr. Stanley seems to be that of a free native community which shall be, so to speak, the ward of the Christian and civilized world. Hitherto all colonization has been the exclusive and jealous work of particular nations. Here the effort is apparently to elevate the natives themselves through the contact of civilized life, while guarding them against oppression and extermination, by restricting the ownership of any one of the white peoples. Whether it will be practicable without a man like Stanley at the head of every trading station is somewhat problematical, but with men like him, it surely would be. "Hands off and fair play" would be all that could be asked. But it does require men trained in the peculiar school of journalistic enterprise or in some like pursuit. The governing idea of Mr.

Stanley is evidently just what, as employee of the Herald, he formerly had. He is to be on the watch for the interests he represents; not merely to fulfil a routine duty, but "to help the paper," to push it on in every rightful way and to have his eyes ever open to any chance which could be seized. At the same time he is to combine a very wide discretion with a very small amount of proppr, great independence with implicit obedience to orders. The journalists' creed is, "Be ready to start for the North Pole by the 4 r. m. express, get there by hook, or crook, but get there without fail. Look about you, and use your opportunities for the best interests of the Daily —"

In the way of making men equal to almost any practical emergency, if in no other, the newspaper is a true aid to civilization.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF EMORY UPTON, Colonel of the Fourth Regiment of Artillery and Brevet-Major General of U. S. Army. By Peter S. Michie, Professor in U. S. Military Academy. With an Introduction by James Harrison Wilson, late U. S. A. (New York: D. Appleton & Company.) pp. 311.

There is a measured quality and tone in this biography which entitles it to great respect. It is intended, no doubt, to be in some sort a justification of West Point, and we must say that we think it a case fairly made out. There is such a thing as military genius, by which great triumphs may be attained. But so long as wars continue to be waged, the study of the art of war will be necessary, and the higher the art the greater the economy of life and treasure. This is quite distinctly brought out in this volume. General Upton was a great professional soldier, that is, one who reinforced exceptional abilities by the most assiduous study and care. While his work in the War for the Union was distinguished work, it was after its close that he rendered the most important service to his country, in the perfecting of his system of tactics and in his exhaustive reports on the military organization of the nations of the Old World. Professor Michie examines the history of General Upton's sad suicide, and makes it morally certain that the act was the result of disease overcoming the mental and moral power of the General. The story of the General's more intimate and domestic life is a very touching one, simply told, in good taste. His Christian character stands very high, and the fact is well worth noting that West Point will compare favorably with many other colleges in the high moral and religious tone of its young men. The book is a more than an ordinarily favorable specimen of what a biography should be.

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEMES OF AESCHYLUS. With an Introduction and Notes. By Isaac Flagg, Professor in the Cornell University. (Boston: Ginn & Co.) pp. 138.

Those who are in fear lest the new school in education should drive out the study of Latin and Greek may take comfort in this careful edition of a Greek play by a professor in Cornell University, supposed to be the representative institution of scientific and practical culture. To edit a Greek play was once popularly supposed to be a qualification for an English mitre. We suppose Professor Flagg hardly looks for any similar result from his work, but he certainly will have the satisfaction of giving an edition with a well-considered text, full and useful notes, and various other proofs that scholarship has not yet lost its value. It is in "Aeschylus" that the old Greek tragedy appears in its most perfect form, chiefly as a monologue and chorus, and with little of the dramatic element as it is now understood. The plays of Aeschylus compares with other classical works as the ruins of the temples at Paestum seem, in their stern Doric simplicity, beside the edifices of imperial Rome.

We do not feel that the immediate abandonment of the study of Greek will take place, though Harvard makes it optional, as never before, and a member of the Adams family pronounces against it. If the scientific truth of the survival of the fittest be a truth, that which survives longest has claim to be considered most fit. Therefore, a play which has come down to us from such remote antiquity has a certain claim also to be studied in the same university which puts upon its shelves the trilobites and orthocerata of Glen Watkins.

THE SOCIAL PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION OF COMTE. By Edward Caird, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. [New York: Macmillan & Co.] pp. 319. Price $1.75.

The object of this ably-written volume is to show how Comte was compelled to reject the logical consequences of his own philosophy. After proving that theology and religion are impossible, he admits that they are necessary, and therefore undertakes to construct (upon the secret model of the Roman Catholic Church) a new religion for man's use. One is reminded of the Jesuits in Asia, who found it unwise to deprive their neophytes of any of the adjuncts of their old worship. They simply re-baptized the beads and renamed the genuflections, and found everything satisfactory. It is highly creditable to M. Comte that he felt the impossibility of a life which was to be without ethics and without religion, and that he supplied them as he best could, in conformity with what his followers were accustomed to. But as the secret attraction of Positive Philosophy, Agnosticism, or whatever it is pleased to style itself, is in its real license, we suspect that most of its devotees are like the old border baron in Scott's "Monastery." They fling off the bondage of the monks, they had no notion of putting on that of the Knoxites.

THE COLORED PICTURE BIBLE FOR CHILDREN. [New York: K. J. B. Young & Co.]

This little book, published under the auspices of the Tract Committee of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge in London, and in this country by the Messrs. Young, is a very attractive volume. It consists of four sections:—The first from the Creation to the Death of Moses; the second, Judges, Ruth and Kings; the third from Hesechial to the End of the Old Testament; and the fourth, the Holy Gospels. The story of the Bible is told in simple and attractive language, and the illustrations, most of them colored, are such as will fix the interest of the little ones. The book can be recommended to those who desire to lead their children to take interest in the Holy Scriptures as their book.

OUTLINES OF PRACTICAL PHILOSOPHY. Dictated Portions of the Lectures of Hermann Lotze. Translated and edited by George T. Ladd, Professor of Philosophy in Yale College. [Boston: Ginn & Company.]

We confess to an utter indifference to any system of ethics which does not find its basis upon Christianity, and Christianity alone. If we fail to find this volume particularly interesting, it is because the best that Herr Professor Lotze can say is said, and better said, in the New Testament.

LITERATURE.

"HEADS AND FACES, HOW TO STUDY THEM," is the title of a work in press by the Fowler & Wells Co.

E. P. DUTTON & Co. have in press for immediate issue "Easter Sermons," by Canon Liddon. 2 vols., crown octavo.

THERE is a very interesting paper in the Overland Monthly for September on the "Last Days of Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson (H. H.)," and many articles of interest and merit.

THE PROCEEDINGS at the Hundredth Anniversary of the Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, are published in a handsome pamphlet which has a historical value.

"OLDHAM, or Beside All Waters," a tale of New England life, by Miss Lucy Ellen Guernsey, and "Expositions," by the Rev. Samuel Cox, D. D., late editor of the Expositor, has just been issued from the press of Mr. Thomas Whittaker.

It will perhaps add interest and weight to an "English Opinion of the Prayer Book Revision," reprinted from the Guardian in two numbers of THE CHURCHMAN, to know that its author was the well-known liturgical authority, Canon Bright.

"WIKKEY, A Scrap," an excellent story which recently appeared in THE CHURCHMAN, many readers will be glad to know, is to be published in book form in a few days by E. P. Dutton & Co. The same publishers announce for next month the second of the series of Question Books, by the Rev. George Hodges, on the Creed, the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer in forty lessons. It is intended for children who have not yet learned to read.

A SUCCESSFUL LIFE.

BY E. S.

If life is measured by the span of life
Allotted unto man—threescore and ten—
And all that time be used to learn and know
The right, the noble and the best alone;
If all that time were filled with earnest zeal
To reach the beacon, throwing forth its light
From far we know, but yet appearing near;
Perchance we might look back, when death appears,

With quiet, calm serenity, and feel
We tried at least to do, to will the best.
But life to most is short, and youth absorbs
So great a part to strengthen heart and mind,
That man arrives at man's estate and knows,
Nay, hardly knows, his aims, pursuits in life.
He hears, he reads, he dreams of great success
Achieved by men in past and present times,
And reading, dreaming, wonders what it means.

A life successful seems to have a charm,
A spell; it seems to wish each calls:
Thou too canst enter here and reach the goal!
Is it the Hero's on the battlefield?
Is it the mighty Ruler's on the throne?
Is it the Statesman's with his sober mien?
Is it the Courtier's in his gay attire?
Is it the Artist's at the height of fame?
Is it the Poet's in his laurel wreath?
Is it the Scholar's at his midnight lamp?
Is it the Merchant's, raining precious gold?
Is it the Hermit's in his forest cave?
Are these the lives we call successful ones?
We answer ye or nay, but know it not.
Our aims fulfilled, our pursuits nobly reached
May be success in many, many ways.
As stars are bright, so is the fame of man!
But meaneath fame, renown, successful life!
We creatures on this earth do not exist
By choice of ours, but for a purpose wise
And good; a loving Father put us here
A mission to fulfill. To one and all,
In high estate or low, in health or not,
The gates are open wide to enter in.
A life successful means a happy one.
To gain it we must render others so.
That life is truly noble, brave and great,
Which worketh only good to other lives!

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XL.

Five Years Afterwards.

"Her letters, too,
Tho' far between, and coming fitfully
Like broken music, so in the land
Or made occasion, being strictly watch'd, Charm'd him thro' every idylmish till he saw
An end, a hope, a light breaking upon him."
Tennyson.

"Yes, it was love, if thoughts of tenderness Tried in temptation, strengthen'd by distress,
Tumour'd by absence, firm in every clime,
And yet, oh, more than all! untired by time."
Byron.

Two more years passed on, summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, since Meg closed the eyes of the poor prodigal, and took up the fresh burthen of her grief and her widowhood together.

At first the shock seemed to have stunned her, and then she wept till her poor half-blind eyes could weep no more. It was sad to witness that terrible waste of love and sorrow; she grew worn and gray—thin almost to a shadow; a sick loathing of all her duties came upon her; she shrunk even from her children, and for a little while cared to do nothing but to sit by Jack's grave and to brood silently over her trouble. But the dark hour passed and the pale face grew placid again under the widow's cap; and strangers, as they lingered in the churchyard in the summer evenings, often paused to hear the wonderful rich pealing of the organ, and stealing into the empty church in the twilight, saw Meg sitting alone with upturned face in the moonlight and playing fragments of strange requiem masses. Was it Jack's requiem she was playing? Hark! it breaks into a low, monotonous chant. The moonbeams play on the chancel pavement. The perfume of fresh lilies, dim white globes with golden hearts, bound up with scented sheaves, pervades the air; a voice tender, tremulous, breaks into deep, rich tones—"I will arise and go to my Father—"

Ah! Jack's dying prayer. The broken sentence unfinished and suggestive. The strangers steal away. Meg comes out, a black shadowy figure, and pauses for a moment by a white tombstone, whereon is the name "Jack Carruthers," and underneath it that noble clause from the Creed—"I believe in the forgiveness of sins."

"Where have you been to-night, dear Meg?" And Meg, with the solemn light still shining in her eyes, would often answer:

"Half-way to Paradise and back. And the music seemed like angels' wings, and carried me away till the chords jarred. And then I went to Jack's grave and wished him good-night." And Meg would turn the wedding-ring round and sound on her thin finger with a happy smile. And Rotha would know that that strange communion had strengthened and refreshed her, and that for many a day Meg would be bright, almost joyous.

But the anniversary of Jack's death had come round twice, and it was now more than five years since Robert had come up to Bryn to wish Rotha good-bye. More than five years, for then the rough March winds had been blowing, and now the soft May breezes swept refreshingly over the blue summer sea, and the primroses and the cowslips had long ago made golden hollows in the Burnley glens and Leatham woods, and the children went out in the fields to make daisy-chains, and to hunt in the hedges for briar-roses and bunches of pink and white May blossoms. And Meg had taken all her nurslings to drink fresh new milk at a farm, and to see the young calves and lambs and the brood of yellow ducklings at Gammer Stokes', and Rotha was up at the vicarage helping Mary to arrange her plans for the Sunday school treat.

"Austin has decided that it must be Burnley-upon-Sea this time," began Mary, as Rotha entered the room. Mary was sitting on her low chair by the open window, watching Arty playing on the lawn with his father. They were attempting a game of cricket, with Jock and Jasper as long-stops, and the root of an old tree for a stump. And, to enhance the glory of the game, Arty had already scored more than the vicar. Arty had taken to a jacket and trousers now, and looked very boyish in his turned-down collar and blue ribbon. And Laurie, who was lying on the grass lazily watching them with his broad-brimmed straw hat tilted over his eyes, was now a tall, thin stripling of fifteen, with a fair, effeminate face, that had grown strangely like poor Belle's, and which bid fair to be almost as beautiful. In fact, Laurie's beauty and his laziness, his sweet voice and his lovable, indolent ways, often made Mary and the vicar anxious about their boy's future—Mary on account of his delicacy, and the vicar for fear that his talents should outstrip his energy. But they need not have feared if they could have known the future. For the seeds of self-sacrifice and self-renunciation were somewhere hidden in Laurie's sweet nature, and came to light nobly at a fitting time; for, having been trained by his own desire for the priesthood, he was one of the few who, on the great day of intercession for the missions, consecrated his fresh young life to the arduous work of a missionary; and among the names of those who were reckoned as the first-fruits of that mighty prayer which pulsed through the length and breadth of England was the name of Laurence Garton Ord.

And the mother who gave up the flower of her flock to this noble work, and the fair young creature who had promised to follow his fortunes as soon as he can make a home for her in that foreign clime, will long remember the day when Laurie, coming out from the church "ruddy and beautiful" as a young David, walked silently home beside them, and then, putting his arm round his mother, told them that he had dedicated himself to a distant ministry, and asked his father's blessing on his undertaking.

But on this May afternoon in question Laurie was nothing but a fair-haired stripling, graceful and lazy enough indeed to justify Rotha's name, still applied to him, of "the little king." Rufus, loose-limbed and freckled still, but handsome enough in his mother's eyes, had joined his uncle long ago in New York, and was doing well. "As sturdy and independent and Rufus-like as ever," wrote Robert. While Guy and Reuben, the young men now—Guy nearly twenty-one—were two young undergraduates at Queen's. Reuben was a reading man, and hoped to take high honors, but Guy had joined the boating set; they were still chums and inseparable, but Reuben, the younger and staidier, kept Guy straight, and pulled him up every now and then when his fun and inextinguishable spirit were likely to get him into mischief. Both of them wrote to Rotha dutifully, and called her "the little mother," but Rube's letters are the more affectionate and frequent. Five years have passed very lightly over Rotha Maturin. She is seven-and-twenty now, but she hardly looks it; she is a little thin and pale, slightly grave perhaps, but the sweet face is as calm and good as ever, and she looks a mere girl this afternoon in her fresh summer muslin, with her smooth brown hair and a breast-knot of lilies of the valley. There is a pretty dimple still when she speaks, and the large eyes grow bright and dark in a moment; it is only in repose that a vague air of sadness still lingers—a quiet curve or two, an added thoughtfulness on the brow, which would tell a keen observer that Rotha Maturin has not been exempt from her woman's lot of love and suffering.

"Austin says it must be Burnley-upon-Sea, after all," repeated Mary.

"I am sorry for it," replied Rotha quietly; and then the vicar threw down his hat and came across the lawn to shake hands with Rotha.

Five years have made less havoc with the vicar than with any one else; he is not thinner, of course, and he continues to mourn over his superfluous weight, which he has sometimes been heard to declare is worse than even St. Paul's thorn in the flesh, but the kind, benignant face is as kind as ever, and the wide-open gray eyes are quite as keen, but the crisp curls are slightly tinged with gray; but Guy says his father is as young as ever, and Mary declares that Austin will never grow old, and the vicar tells his wife privately that he is afraid that he is a boy still in his heart, for he likes a game as much as Arty does, only Arty runs faster and gets longer innings.

"Well, Mary, have you told Rotha the news?"

"No, dear; I've been leaving it to you," returned his wife, smiling. "He has been dying to tell you himself, Rotha, and so I would not spoil his pleasure."

"Oh! I know Nettie has another boy. I met Mr. Effingham, and he told me all about it. Aunt Eliza is so disappointed—she wanted a girl this time; she had quite made up her mind for a little Eliza, but Nettie and her husband both like sons best."

"My son's my son till he gets him a wife," Mary is always saying that ever since Guy danced six times with Laura Tregarthen. Poor Mary! she does not understand calf-love; she thinks at twenty boys ought to think of nothing but their mother."

"Now, Austin, I call that too bad. Laura was a little flirt, or she would never have gone on so with Guy; and I do say, and say so still, that Lady Tregarthen has very frivolous young sisters-in-law, and if Guy is to marry I hope he will not choose such a giddy little thing as Laura for his wife."

"My dear, Guy will fall in love possibly with a dozen Lauras before he hits upon the right one; boys always do, and handsome ones like Guy especially; but here we are talking about Nettie and Guy, and quarrelling as usual, and Rotha has not heard the news yet."

"I can guess it is good news though, by the way you are rubbing your hands," said Rotha, merrily.

"Ha, ha," laughed the vicar, "so it is—so it is. Capital news—first-rate news—old Bobus is coming home."

"Robert coming home?" returned Rotha, feeling suddenly rather giddy. She felt a quick flush rise to her face, and turning her back for a moment on them both, went to the table and busied herself in finding some work. "When is he coming?" she said from a safe distance.

"When? Oh, he may be here any day; the letter has been detained, and ought to have reached us a week ago. He was on his way then. I will tell you all about it if you will leave that work alone and come here. I thought the news would have interested you."

"Oh, Mr. Ord?" returned Rotha, dismayed at this inflated imputation of indifference. "Of course I am glad he is coming home—poor Robert!" but her voice was not very steady, and her face was growing hotter than ever under the vicar's keen eyes. What would she have said if she had known that Robert in his despair had made his brother his confidant, and that Austin was looking at her and wondering whether Robert had really any chance, and whether he had been wrong in advising him to come home and try what three more years had done for him, and was speculating whether the sudden burning of Rotha's face meant only confusion or pleasure.

He was to remain in doubt on this point, for Rotha now regained her self-possession. "Is he bringing Rufus with him, or will he come alone?" she asked presently.

"Oh, no. Rufus is doing too well where he is, and Robert says that a year or two more of that work will be of great service to him; and that, though he is so young—barely eighteen—he is already a valuable assistant; he means to have him over by-and-by when an opening presents itself. Do you know, Rotha, I always guessed Mr. Ramsay would send for Robert when that accident disabled him. Poor man! he will never be able to go down to the work again."

"And is Robert to be manager there?" asked Rotha, not lifting her eyes.

"Yes; manager and partner, too, I believe. He is to have double the salary he now receives, to begin with. The firm are very loath to part with him; but Robert says that he hardly feels justified in throwing away such a chance, and especially to refuse Mr. Ramsay after what he has done for him. Don't you think he is right?"

"Quite right," returned Rotha quickly; "only he said nothing to me about all this in his last letter, so I cannot help feeling a little surprised. I suppose he has made up his mind rather suddenly."

"Yes; he tells me that he had no idea when he last wrote. By the bye, that explains a rather misty paragraph. He says—let me see, what is it he really does say!—oh! here it is—I am afraid Rotha, for one, will think me somewhat inconsistent after what I once said to her, but I think you can explain my reasons for acting on this sudden impulse, and why I cannot feel justified in refusing so kind a friend and benefactor as Mr. Ramsay. A man may sometimes alter his mind without being open to the imputation of weakness. There, perhaps you can interpret that mysterious clause better than Mary and I can." But Rotha said nothing, and colored so exceedingly that the vicar rather abruptly changed the subject, and Mary, after a few warm expressions of pleasure at the thought of seeing dear Robert again, and wondering how he would look, and when he would arrive, and telling Rotha that Deb and she had been beautifying and arranging the spare room that very morning for his reception, in case he should come any day, took up the subject of the school-treat again, and assured Rotha for the third time that the vicar and Mr. Tregarthen had already fixed on Burnley-upon-Sea. "You see we have exhausted all the places. We were at Nab Scar last year, and at Finnock's Hollow the summer before, and Burnley is so near, and the children can go by train, and it is so much less fatiguing for the teachers than jolting over those country roads in open carts; so if you do not mind, dear—being your treat—Austin thinks he could save you expense and trouble that way, for the season is not far enough advanced to go a long distance, and the gardener's wife at the head of the glen could boil our kettles for us, and it would not be far to carry the hampers; you know Austin can always get license for us."

Rotha was silent for a moment. It was more than five years ago now since Garton and Reuben and she had spent the day there, but she had only been there once since, and then quite alone. It was summer then, and she had walked where they had walked, and sat in the same place where she had sat, and dreamt of the fairy prince, and then lifted up her eyes to see Garton striding through the dim woodland aisles. She had taken a mournful pleasure in thus following his footprints, and in thinking what he had said and how he had looked, and it had seemed as though the very place were sacred to her; it would jar on her sadly to see it again surrounded by merry and shouting children; but she now banished this thought as selfish, and quietly told Mary that, if the vicar wished it, there was nothing more to be said, and then, in her usual self-forgetful way, tried to throw herself into her friends' plans, and to calculate the number of buns and the pounds of seed and plum cake that would be wanted, but she had never found it such hard work to keep her attention on anything—she made a mistake in her addition twice, and Mary, with placid surprise, put her right.

She was undecided, too, till the last minute, whether Meg should not go in her place; but on Mrs. Ord objecting to this, on the ground that it was Rotha's treat, and that she need not do anything to tire herself, and that the children would amuse themselves, and that there was nothing but to give them their tea and marshal them to the train, she reluctantly consented; and then scolded herself again for her selfishness, and told Mary that she was getting old and lazy, but of course she would go, and that perhaps Meg would be glad to be spared the fatigue; and, when this was settled, she rose to take her leave.

"But, Rotha, dear. Mrs. Carruthers is out, and Austin fully expects that you are going to stay to tea," pleaded Mrs. Ord, "and we have not half discussed dear Robert's coming home." But Rotha would not be persuaded; she had some work to do for her children, she said, and should rather enjoy a quiet evening. She felt stupid and tired, and her head ached a little, and, if Mary did not mind, she would come round in the morning and arrange everything for Thursday, and she thought, after all, the vicar had been right in fixing on Burnley.

If Rotha had any work to do she certainly did not do it that evening. Meg found her sitting at her window looking out at the sunset, as though she had been doing little else for hours.

It would be difficult to describe Rotha's exact feelings when she heard of the news of Robert's speedy arrival; but from the moment the words "he may come any day" had been spoken, a curious mixture of confusion, terror, and excitement had thrown her into such a whirl of conflicting emotions that she hardly realized herself what his coming home would be to her.

Three years had passed since she had answered that passionate letter of Robert's, and the correspondence which had been carried on between them had been in a measure somewhat constrained on both sides. Robert's letters especially had been brief and rather forced; and though he had never referred to his disappointment since then, even in the most distant manner, it was in a way brought home to Rotha in every word. Robert never spoke of himself now, never even answered her friendly questions as to his health and prospects. His letters related mainly to Rotha and her affairs, every trifle to which she had alluded was canvassed and magnified; but the unrestrained outpourings of the writer's heart seemed kept in check and forced back by a strong hand; only a tender phrase than usual sometimes conveyed to her that the writer himself was unchanged, patient but hopeless, and perhaps no eloquence could have touched Rotha's heart more deeply than those letters—so brief, yet so suggestive; so thoughtful for her, so forgetful of himself.

Once he had been ill, but Rotha never heard of it till long afterwards. He had met with an accident, and inflammation and fever had set in, and Austin told her one day very gravely that his life had been despaired of for days, and his recovery was chiefly owing to the watchful nursing of his landlady and her daughter.

Rotha wrote a reproachful letter to Robert after that, a letter full of sisterly affection and tenderness; but he wrote back in a little surprise, thanking her for her kindness. "I should not have thought that you would have cared so much whether I lived or died," it said. "I never fancy that I am much good to any one, or to myself either. I sometimes think that my life has been a failure, and that it would be better to go to one's long rest than to labor without hope in the heat of the day. When the laborer is weary he can go home. I have no home—not a soul belonging to me but Austin; the only woman who loved me lies under the grass sod. Sometimes I wonder why God permits such loneliness, such desolate hearths, such broken 'denied lives.' Forgive me, Rotha, I am weak still from recent illness, or I should not write like this. Just now, Rachel, my faithful nurse, brought me some nourishment, and told me I was getting faint, and must be more careful of myself. I will not tell you how I thanked her. I was very ungrateful, and she went away with her eyes full of tears. Rachel is a good creature. She thinks I ought to put a higher value on my life. She little knows—There, I will not finish that sentence. Good night, Rotha. Thank you for your goodness to me, dear—I was going to write 'Sister,' but I have sworn never to call you by that name; I will substitute 'Friend.'—There; it is cold enough, it makes me shiver, but many a man might think himself rich with such a one; but not when he is sick and solitary—growing old, but still far enough off his end—as I am, Rotha. Adieu, ROBERT."

That was the last letter Rotha had received, nearly three months ago, and now he was coming home. She showed no word that letter, but put it away with mingled feelings of pleasure and pain. It was hardly in woman's nature not to be touched and made proud by this passionate fidelity—this patient hopelessness. For the first time she lost sight of Garton's love, to wonder upon the length and breadth of this man's affection, that could survive distance and time and disappointment, that could refuse to be satisfied with the crumbs of her comfort. "Could Garton have loved me better?" she thought, as though for the first time she realized Robert's feelings in all their intensity, and a little fear and trembling seized her. She thought: "What if he should ever renew his suit? Would her purpose remain as unflinching and steadfast as it had done three years ago? Would Garton wish it? Would Belle?" But at this point she always broke off, shrinking from her own thoughts, trembling and blushing even in the darkness, and, foiding her hands, would pray that He who had guided her through her troubled youth, and had brought her feet out on these pleasant places, would lead her still through the shadows of the future in a plain path; but not now, because of her enemies.

These petitions always calmed her, but to-night they failed. The mere recollection of the words "coming any day" threw her into a state of distressing restlessness and excitement, a longing to go away somewhere, to fly from some inevitable fate which seemed to come upon her. She resolved to avoid the vicarage, to shut herself up in the fortress of Bryn, to live at the "Home," to do anything, in short, to put off the evil day of their meeting; and yet, such was her inconsistency, she longed to be somewhere that she might see him without his being aware of her presence. "Just to see him, and to be sure that it is Robert, and that he is well and safe, and to go away where he could not find me, or ever say what he said to me in those letters."

These were some of Rotha's thoughts; but it would be difficult to describe half of them. The leading idea seemed to be terror at what Robert might say to her, and yet in her secret heart she rejoiced at the knowledge that he was still unchanged. She fell asleep trying to recollect the contents of his last letter, and awoke depressed and restless and passed a most unsatisfactory day, and, as often happened, everything jarred with her mood: the children were troublesome, and Caroline had a raging toothache and was obliged to go down to the infirmary; Meg was called off in the middle of the afternoon by the vicar, and Rotha had to take her place just as she was most longing for quiet.

The children had got through their stage of fractiousness by this time, and were playing at Nebuchadnezzar and the burning fiery furnace. The game struck Rotha as slightly profane, but she was languid and lacked energy to interfere. It struck her as rather droll, however, that Shirlee Pearl, who was still there, should enact the part of Nebuchadnezzar and the Golden Image as well, and she got once or twice slightly confused over it; and she could not understand for a long time why the youngest boy there should be playing the Jew's harp industriously in the corner, till he told Shirlee crossly that he wasn't going to play Dulcimers forever, and that he thought it a stupid game, which woke her up in earnest; and after she had reprimanded Shirlee gravely, and had taken the refractory Dulcimer from her lap, she told them a story, and then made them sing the hymns Meg had taught them, and told them softly about the Child Christ, who had come to their beds when they were little and weak, with His arms full of tiny crosses, and had laid one down by the side of each child, bidding them carry them bravely for His sake.

"And what sort of cross did the Child Christ leave you, Shirlee?" asked Rotha. "I think it was a knobby one, mother," returned Shirlee promptly, for Shirlee was an orphan, a mere waif and stray cast upon Thornborough streets, and Rotha had classed him among her adopted children. "A very knobby one, bursting out with abysses and such like."

"I should think being almost dark is worse than abysses," put in Sallie, a diminutive child with a patient, sickly face and a shade over her eyes. "Shirlee can learn to spell, and cast up, and read pretty picture-books, though his bones is so sore that he cries sometimes."

"But Sallie can pick up shells and dig on the sand, and feel the sweet sea-breeze—can she not?" returned Rotha, putting her hand tenderly on the cropped head, for she knew that by and by it would be quite dark, and not almost, with Sallie. "And what did the Child Christ say to little Sallie when He laid on her this heavy cross?"

"Carry it, and it will carry you," returned the child in her shrill little voice.

"Yes; and, heavy as it is, it is not so heavy as His—we must remember that. And when do we lay down our crosses, children?"

"Never," returned one, and "When we die," responded others; and one small boy opined, "When their backs ached or they were tired;" but he was a cripple and a hunchback, and spoke feebly, and every one knew that poor Teddy was breaking down under the weight of his.

"Oh, Teddy, I wish we could!" said Rotha, with a compassionate glance at the deformed boy. "I wish we could lay them down, Teddy, sometimes, you and Sallie and I—when we are so tired, and our hearts and arms are so sore with the weight!" And, in that fanciful imagery so dear to children, she told them they must lie down in their narrow beds with their crosses beside them to the last—they and their crosses under the shadow of one mighty one; and how they must carry them right up to the Golden Gate itself, and there, laying them down forever, should receive tiny jewelled crowns; and where there crosses had fallen should spring up roses, white and red, and lilies fairer than any they had seen, and the Child Christ should lead them into the City—cripples and blind, and suffering no longer. "Now, children, sing the hymn Meg taught you last Sunday," and the children united their weak, quavering voices and sang, "We are but little children weak," but the Dulcimer had gone fast asleep, and Teddy came and laid his heavy head against Rotha's dress.

CHAPTER XII.

Won at last.

"Some one came and rested there beside me,
Speaking words I never thought would bless
Such a loveless life; I longed to hide me,
Feasting lonely on my inappetence,
But the voice I heard
Pleaded for a word,
Till I gave my whispered answer, 'Yes.'
"Yes; that little word so calmly spoken
Changed all life for me, my own, my own:
And the cold gray spell I saw unbroken,
All the twilight days seemed past and gone,
And how warm and bright
In the ruddy light
Pleasant June days of the future shone!
"So we wandered through the gate together,
Hand in hand, upon our future way,
Leaving shade and cold behind for ever,
Out to where the red sun's westerling ray
Gave a promise fair
Of such beauty rare
For the dawning of another day."
—Helen Martine Burnside.

The Sunday-school treat was fixed for the following day, and when the children were safe in their dormitories, Rotha meant to go round to the vicarage to make the final arrangements with Mrs. Ord.

It was a lovely evening, and the setting sun streamed into the long low room where Rotha sat among the little ones; the children had broken down in the middle of the hymn, and Rotha's sweet voice took up the refrain and hummed it softly with a sort of weird accompaniment from Teddie; the rest crooned out a dolorous chorus of "We don't know it, mother," when the garden gate suddenly clicked. Fidgets, who was fast asleep, got up and limped to the door on three legs and began a furious barking, every hair bristling with excitement. Firm footsteps crunched up the garden path, voices were heard in the little passages, the door of the mother's room opened and closed quickly.

"Run and tell the vicar I am here, Joe," said Rotha, breaking off her humming; "and, children, do not forget to get up and cartsey to him."

"May we come, little sister?" said the vicar's cheerful voice over Joe's head. "Do not let the children disturb themselves; they look far too comfortable. No, do not come in just yet," he continued to somebody in the background. "Guess what visitor I have brought to see you, Rotha?"

"That is not hardly fair," returned a well-remembered voice; "let me introduce myself, Austin." A firm hand puts the vicar aside—a dark figure blocks up the entry, a tall man, gray-haired, with a worn, handsome face. Rotha stands up, white and trembling, with the sleeping boy still in her arms—it is Robert!

"Rotha, are you surprised to see me? I did not mean to startle you like this."

Her only disengaged hand is taken and pressed kindly, and then Robert replaces her in her seat. She has not spoken one word of welcome—not one, except that low uttered "Robert!"—but her heart is beating so that she can hardly breathe.

"That is not a very warm greeting after five years' absence," says the vicar, mischievously; and Robert, gravely as before, just touches her cheek with his lips, and says quietly that Austin has brought him in to see the little sister in the midst of her children, and that he is glad to see her looking so strong and well, and so on. All spoken in the same calm kind manner, as though the blood that swept over Rotha's pale face did not stir every pulse within him at the thought that he had the power to stir her thus, that those burning blushes and quivering lips could not mean only that he had taken her unawares.

"I hope you do not mind my bringing him in like this? Robert was so anxious to see you," said the vicar, trying to put a stop to this painful embarrassment. "You are so completely one of us, you know, Rotha; and Mary said she was sure you would be pleased to see him."

"I am very pleased," returned Rotha, finding her voice with difficulty. "When did you come?" lifting her eyes timidly to Robert, who was leaning against the mantelpiece watching her.

"Only an hour ago; I got off the dust of my journey, and talked to Mary and Austin a little, and then Mary proposed our coming round to fetch you. How well dear Mary looks, to be sure? and as pretty as ever; only her hair is gray—not so gray as mine though." And he tossed it carelessly from his forehead as he spoke. "Do you not think me very changed, Rotha?"

"Very much changed. You look as though you had been very ill," she returned, softly. She was regaining her calmness at the sight of his, but her color still varied dangerously.

Yes, he was changed, wonderfully so; but she thought she had never seen a nobler face. His dark hair was quite iron-gray, though he was hardly more than thirty-six; and his face was thinner and paler, and the forehead deeply lined. But the hard-nerve curve of the lips had relaxed, and the curve round the mouth was exceedingly sweet and sorrowful; only when he smiled, which he did rarely, his smile was like Gar's.

"I was very near death," he returned, reading the unspoken sympathy in her eyes. "I suppose if I had not been with good Samaritans it would soon have been all over with me. Rachel cried when she received your present, Rotha. When I gave it to her I said it was so like the little sister that Austin talks about."

He had used the vicar's title twice, but not as though he had appropriated it. Was it merely to put her at her ease with him, or to remind her that he had no hope? Somehow the name jarred on her for the first time.

"You do not find Rotha much altered, do you, Robert?" struck in the vicar, briskly. Rotha's eyes fell again before Robert's swift, keen glance.

"No; she is not a day older. How do you manage to preserve your youth, Rotha—you look so young? And do you always wear that little cap? Do you know, it reminds me of the day I met you first in the Castle gardens? You had a cap on then, had you not?"

"No; only a lace kerchief tied over my hair," returned Rotha, with a smile. "This is our uniform, Meg's and mine," she continued hurriedly. She knew intuitively why Robert looked so grave. Would he ever forget that day when he saw her under the low apple trees, a slim creature in her black dress? It made her speak to him in her own frank way to see that look of pain on his face. "Meg will be so glad to see you, Rotha."

"Ah, to be sure. Poor Mrs. Carruthers! I was so sorry to hear about her trouble; but you told me in one of your last letters that she has been more settled ever since. How good you have been, Rotha, to write to me so often!"

"You were lonely, and I knew you would like to hear about everything," she returned, beginning to get hot again.

"You have no idea what letters she can write," he continued, turning to his brother, who had half a dozen of the children round his knee, and was talking to them in an undertone. "They used to be like a series of pictures to me, and clever pictures too. I don't think all these five years I have ever had to ask after anybody."

"We did not know you were a scribe, Rotha," returned the vicar, laughing; "but here we are keeping Mary and ten waiting. Do you know we have orders to carry you off?"

"Indeed! But I do not think I can leave just yet; I have my working dress on, and the children are not in bed, and—"

"Perhaps not," interrupted the vicar; "but Mrs. Carruthers is on her way to help Caroline, so that excuse has fallen through. And as for the working dress, if you want to honor Robert by a festive attire, we will willingly escort you to Byrn; but I can assure you that that gray serge is quite as becoming in our eyes as gray silk would be."

A mischievous little speech which made Robert smile, and after that Rotha would have gone in gray sack-cloth, if there were such a material; but as she still hesitated, though for far different reasons, Robert settled the matter by lifting the drowsy Dulcimer off her lap and, taking out his watch, told her that they would wait for her just five minutes—a piece of pre-emptory which reminded her of the old Robert Ord, and brought one of her sunny smiles back in an instant.

Rotha was in a curious state of mind all the evening; an uneasy sort of happiness, too nearly approaching nervous excitement to quite deserve that name, seemed to be the prominent feeling; it was very strange and very pleasant to have Robert back again. Now for the first time she realized how she had missed him, and what a blank his absence had made. The vicarage had never looked so like itself for five years, and the vicar seemed so wondrously content and so proud of Robert, and the boys hung about their uncle eager for news of Rufus, and the family tea-table had never looked more cheerful than it did to-night.

Rotha was very quiet and kept in the background all the evening, but no one seemed to notice it. For Robert and Austin had so much to say to each other, and were so busy in discussing the former's prospects, and every one had so many things to tell him and so much to hear, that no one seemed to perceive what a silent listener Rotha was; and though now and then Robert turned to her with a quiet word or smile, as though to show her presence was by no means forgotten, he never once strove to bring her into the conversation. But more than once the uneasy conviction seized her that her silence was understood and respected. And deeply as this thoughtfulness and delicacy touched her, it made her still more conscious. Now and then she started and flushed painfully as some tone or some expression of Robert's recalled Garton vividly. She had never thought the brothers alike, but a hundred times this evening some trick or turn of Robert's voice brought him before her. Now and then she could look at him unperceived, and then she was struck afresh by the great change in him; and once or twice the thought crossed her, of what noble metal the man must have been made that the fire of suffering had so purified and strengthened him.

She had been perfectly content in her quiet corner, but she was more than ever tongue-tied and embarrassed when he walked with her to her own door. A dread of being alone with him, a terror of what he might say under these circumstances, was strong within her when she went out of the vicarage gate. But she need not have been afraid, Robert seemed bent on putting her at her ease. Nothing could exceed his quiet gentleness. He spake about the beauty of the night, and asked Rotha if she ever took long walks now. And he described an excursion Rufus and he had taken, which lasted till they had got to Byrn; and then he shook hands with her and bade her good-night, as though he had been doing so every evening for the last five years.

Rotha gave up her thoughts in despair when she reached her own room. To disentangle and arrange such a hopeless confusion of ideas was next to impossible. A sense of disappointment and regret—inconsistent regret—at Robert's callousness and brotherly kindness were the paramount feelings; it increased her admiration and respect tenfold, but it humiliated her. He had loved her for five years, and only three months ago had hinted at his despair. But now he was by far the calmer of the two, and she herself had been taken unawares, and had betrayed her embarrassment in a hundred ways. The calmer of the two! What if she had looked out that very moment and seen the lonely figure pacing up and down the sea-wall for hours?—could she see him standing in the moonlight beside Belle's grave, and leaning his hot brow against the marble cross, and could he hear him say, "Dearer than ever—the one face—the one woman in the world—to me. Oh, my God! to see her every day and not to win her, will be more than I can bear. I must—I will win her! Something tells me that I shall, Rotha."

The next day was that appointed for the school term, and Rotha had promised to be round at the vicarage as early as possible to help Mary and Aunt Eliza pack the hamper. But, early as it was, Robert had already started for Stretton, where he would probably be detained the greater part of the morning.

Rotha felt a little chill of disappointment, for she had quite made up her mind to be her old self with him to-day. It relieved her, therefore, and sent a glow of satisfaction to her heart, when the vicar casually remarked to Aunt Eliza that she would certainly have her wish to see Robert gratified that very afternoon, for he had promised him faithfully to take the four o'clock train from Blackscar, and to be present at the distribution of buns; and, as he always kept his word, she might be certain that he would make his appearance at the time specified.

Rotha said nothing, but she worked with redoubled zeal, and at the appointed hour joined the phalanx of teachers and children on the Blackscar platform, looking singularly appropriate to the occasion in her pretty spring dress—a soft blue—with her white clip hat. Dress always set off Rotha, but she never looked prettier than she did to-day, as Mary remarked to the vicar and to Aunt Eliza about half a dozen times.

There was nothing worth recording in the afternoon itself. As in most other school treats, the children were wild with pleasure, and ran all over the glens like a herd of young colts. Rotha strove once or twice, in quiet moments, to bring back the sweet and mournful associations of the place, but for once the effort was manifest. The day was so glorious, the sunshine so bright, the play of light and shade so delicious in the bosky dells and hollows, the little river ran underneath so brimming over with ripples and tiny gurgles of joy, the children's mirth was so infectious, the knots of eager, rosy faces such warm, vivid pictures set in the green, lowery depths, that a less happy nature than Rotha's must have expanded to the cheering influences; and more than one bright thought kept her pulses beating to a tune they had not heard for many a long year, as she walked up and down the shady walks, or sat on one of the tiny lawns keeping watch and ward over the little ones.

But about five o'clock, when the children were ranged in orderly files on one of the green lawns, and the vicar was called upon to say grace, Rotha's eyes often wandered to the little white gate in the hope of seeing a tall figure advancing from the road; but tea was over and the children scattered to their games again, and still no Robert made his appearance.

Mr. Townsend, the vicar of Burnley, had just entered the gardens, and Rotha was slightly surprised when, after a brief conversation, our vicar walked quickly to the gate with him. She was tolerably near them, and saw that both looked rather grave and anxious, the vicar especially; and the latter spoke almost irritably to some boys who surrounded him with entreaties to join their game.

"Run away, children, I can't attend to you now. Now, Sam, don't block up my way, please; Mr. Townsend and I have business in the town." And he swung round one small lad who was in his path so hastily that he nearly tripped him up.

"Elliot," said Rotha, addressing a young Sunday-school teacher who had been with the vicar most of the time, "what has Mr. Townsend been saying to make the vicar look so grave?"

"Haven't you heard?" returned young Elliot, eagerly. "All the teachers have been talking about it: there's been an accident to the Blackscar train—some collision, I believe; and two or three people have been killed. Murray heard it in the town."

Rotha turned suddenly white, and then began to shiver.

"What train, Elliot?"

"Why, the four o'clock from Blackscar—a goods train or something ran into it. There are not many people hurt—only the engine-driver and the stoker and one passenger were killed. The line will not be clear for another hour or two, and that's why the vicar has gone up to the station."

"No, no," returned Rotha, half beside herself; "don't you know his brother was to be in that train? Oh, Elliot, for mercy's sake, don't say anything to Mrs. Ord. Suppose anything has happened to his brother. There, go, go; don't you see Mr. Tregathan is calling you?"

"We are going to take some of the children on the pier," called out Mr. Tregathan; "the ladies and the younger ones can stop behind, if they like. You know there is no possibility of getting home for another hour or two."

Rotha heard no more. She was in a high winding walk, just under the suspension bridge and near the entrance to the gardens; and feeling giddy, and even her limbs tottering, she sat down, thankful that no one was witness to her violent agitation.

A collision, a railway accident, and he was in it—that was her first thought; he—Robert—Garton's brother, the man who had loved her so patiently and so hopelessly for more than five years, and whom, as she knew too well by this terrible heartache, she was already beginning to love in return. Poor Rotha! it needed this shock to reveal the real nature of her feelings for Robert. For months past—ever since his last letter—she had been fighting against her own heart, and hiding her eyes like a child from the destiny that was in store for her. This had been the secret of her trembling eagerness to escape a meeting. One word from him whose fidelity she had so severely tested might in a moment, she knew, overthrow the resolutions of years. And if she had doubted her heart even yesterday, one glance at Robert's face, with its evidence of suffering, would have undeceived her; and now—now, when he might be lost to her forever, mortally hurt, or even dead—now did she realize for the first time that, however she might have tried to blind herself, her heart was assuredly and entirely his.

But to have another lover destroyed in such a cruel way—impossible, merciful God, impossible!

(To be continued.)

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXVIII.

The hope founded on the virtues we possess, on our good deeds, on the plea that if the good and bad were balanced, and due allowance made for inborn frailty and ever-recurring temptation, the result would be favorable to us, changes the whole ground of confidence.

It surrenders all appeal to mercy. There is no room for mercy to those who have behaved themselves as well as a reasonable Master could expect under the circumstances. We cannot in one breath plead Not Guilty, and in the next ask for Clemency.

No; this Hope is founded on God's justice. If it fails, there is no falling back upon Pity. If your allegation be true, you have a right to immunity, if not reward.

Ah! my friend, you know better than any one the secrets of your own heart and your own life. Are you ready to defend them all at the bar of strict justice? Are you ready, in the presence of the Holy Ones, and in the clear light of the Judgment, to face your record and claim that in all equity it is all that a just God can expect of you?

One thing is certain. In so doing you sever your case from that of all those whom most we revere for saintliness of character and beauty of life. There is not one of them, from Abraham to St. Paul, but shrunk with alarm and dread from the prospect of defending his innocence from a just God. The language of Job expresses the conviction of them all:

"Now a thing was secretly brought to me, And mine ear received a little thereof: In thoughts from the visions of the night, When deep sleep falleth on men, Fear came upon me, and trembling, Which made all my bones to shake, Then a spirit passed before my face; The hair of my flesh stood up: It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof;

An image was before mine eyes, there was silence, And I heard a voice, saying: Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall a man be more pure than his Maker? Behold, he put no trust in his servants, And his angels he charged with folly: How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, Whose foundation is in the dust."

And, yet again, if this hope be safe, as you have parted company with the saints, so may you bid farewell to your Bible. Or, if you retain it, it must be in copies mutilated as with Jehudi's penknife, its most wondrous leaves crackling on the hearth where they have been ignominiously thrown.

A just God, who will make some generous allowance, is to inspect your record. You have done little harm and some good. The first table of the law will be tacitly ignored. Your violations of the second table have not been very numerous or flagrant. Thus you are entitled to a verdict of acquittal. That is the Hope.

Farewell, then, to the Bible.

There is no more Saviour—I will stand on my deserts and save myself.

No more atonement—there is nothing to be expiated.

No more repentance—I have nothing to reproach myself about, or to be sorry for.

Farewell to our Prayer Books, also. Let us hush those pleading cries: O Christ bear us, Lord have mercy upon us. Christ have mercy upon us. Lord have mercy upon us. One sentence will suffice for our Liturgy—God, I thank thee that I am not as other men.

Oh, it is enough to break a Christian heart to know, as we do know, and must know, that the men we see busy in their offices, or on their farms; parents of Christian children, or children of Christian parents; young men in the springtime of life, and old men almost ready for the sickle that shall reap them down, are hoping to be saved, whereas, if the Hope shame them not in the end, it is because the Gospel of the Lord Jesus is a shame and a delusion.

But let us now consider the Hope that neither disappoints nor puts to shame. The Hope which is the Helmet in our Christian armor, and which has covered the head of God's warriors in the day of battle.

The Hopes of which I have been speaking centre all in ourselves. There is nothing outside to lean upon. The Hope is in our ability to make a fair showing and to offer a satisfactory defence.

But listen to St. Paul. "Paul an Apostle of Jesus Christ by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope" or again "Christ in you, the Hope of Glory."

How does the horizon all at once brighten at such a word!

My Hope is to be saved not of and by my own frail self, but by the strong grasp of one outside of me, one who, standing serene upon the shore, can reach out a hand to me, struggling in the deep waters.

I am not to be held answerable for my indebtedness. Another has already discharged it.

I am not amid curses and banishment to be made a terror to evil doers and to expiate any crimes. Another has vindicated the law and made it honorable, assuming my penalty, and exhibiting to the universe a proof of the inexorable justice which will not tolerate iniquity, more portentous, than all the pains I could endure in the Gehenna of fire.

I am not to stand without counsel at that tremendous bar. I have an advocate. And Thou shalt answer for me, O Christ, my Hope. I am not to be tried according to the rules of strict justice, but under the terms of a special covenant of amnesty and mercy, whose benefits have been secured to me by deed and contract.

Three books shall be produced: and the dead shall be judged out of the things written in the books. There is the book of God's law settling forth what I ought to have been. And another book which tells all that I have actually been. I have no hope that there shall be such correspondence in these as shall entitle me to acquittal. But there is a third book, the Lamb's Book of Life. And if my name be written there, justice is disarmed, the law hath no terrors, mine accuser no indictment. I shall have right to the tree of life and may enter in through the gates, into the city.

Is this a hope to disappoint, a hope to make ashamed?

But it is not the mere naming of this Hope that can rightly assure and comfort us. It is available for all, and yet we sadly confess that of some, Christ our Hope will be ashamed and say, I never knew you.

On what reasonable ground, then, may we hope that Christ our Hope will not be ashamed of us and disown us?

The Christian's answer is very simple: I hope that I have come to Him, the Hope of sinners. I hope that by His grace I am abiding in Him. That is all—and it is all-sufficient.

And here arise two questions, which, if we can rightly answer, may relieve us of all the amazing fear which hangs around the great Assize.

Have we come to Christ, not in some vague, unreal, fanciful sense, but in the way that He has bidden us to come?

He has not left it to each one of us to devise a manner of approach. He has given us a definite faith which we must accept—a distinct confession to be made with the mouth—a religious discipline to be accepted. The gifts of His Spirit are not bestowed accidentally or capriciously, but come to us in the discharge of well-known duties; in the use of various instruments, and chiefly through the Holy Sacraments, which through the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves.

Have we come to Him just as He has bidden us to come? He told us to believe, to repent, to be baptized; to ask, to seek, to knock at the door of His compassion. He has told us to do somewhat habitually in remembrance of Him, seeking therein the bread that came down from Heaven. Have we thus come to Him in penitence, in prayer, in earnest endeavor, in high resolve; in the closet, in the congregation, joining the open confession to the heart belief; bearing the Church, submitting ourselves to those who are over us in the Lord, devoutly using sacred ordinances and Holy Sacraments?

If we have thus come, there stands His own word to strengthen our hope—Him that cometh unto me I will in nowise cast out.

It is thus that the past is assured. But how about the present? You have come to Him—are you now abiding in Him?

Is your choice unchanged, your mind the same? Do you abide in Him, as the tempest-tossed bird abides in the shelter of the cliff until the storm has passed? As the long-lost child abides in the loving arms that have recovered him? As the branch cleaves to the vine from which it has derived all its strength to put forth buds of promise?

To abide in Christ is to think of Him, and to speak to Him. It is to cherish loving thoughts of Him, and to strive to pattern after Him. It is to hasten to the door when He passeth by, to covet the falling of His shadow, to touch the very hem of His garment, in all the means and instances whereby He blesses men.

It is, in a word, the honest endeavor—far from being so successful as we would desire—but still the honest endeavor, to live the prayerful life, the unworshipful life, the life of gentle charities, the churchly and sacramental life, the life of watchfulness and holy expectations.

It is not that we have once had an experience, as men say, or once in our lives afflicted ourselves and mourned and wept.

It is not that we come with decorous seriousness to Church and to the Lord's Supper. The true hope grows out of the patient abiding of the soul in Christ, seeking daily to drink in more of His spirit, cementing our union with Him by prayer and vows, by acts of praise, by works of mercy done after His example.

Let the aged Apostle, the Apostle of love and gentleness supply our last thought: "And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming."

THE POWER OF FAITH.

BY W. D. GROUND.

III.

It can hardly need proof that anyone who firmly grasps and holds a conception so large as that of a life on the scale of a Moses will, in virtue of such a faith, start away from all the men of his generation, and will begin to build up his inner life of thought and aspiration and emotion on a far greater scale than they. Whilst they wish to become the foremost men of the day, he is wishing to become one of the foremost men of all time; whilst they are aiming at a local success, he is aiming at a world-wide influence; whilst they think of exerting a force that shall last a few years after they leave the earth, he is seeking to make his mark deep and broad, and to wield a mental and moral sovereignty for thousands of years. Now, it must be plain, I think, that the mental framework of such a one differs from the framework of even the very greatest men of the day in a very marked degree—differs in that it is indefinitely larger and grander, is of far more majestic compass and build, is set up on the scale of Eternity, and spheres a soul to whose strength and scope no limits can be set. That seems to me the necessary result of such a daring idea as that of rivalling a Moses—it cuts one who holds it away from the narrowing influence of his age, it sets him free under the open heaven of God, it introduces a fresh factor of unmeasured force and scope, brings influences to bear upon him of incalculable strength. For myself, when I grasp the conception, I soon become conscious that an enormous force is pouring into me, that, under its power one is carried through vast regions—I had almost said empires—of thought, that it makes one's mind dilate to a degree which causes all the greatest thoughts of all but the greatest men to appear but trifling, and that it seems to be a power to which all things become possible.

When the mind has thus been dilated by the firm grasp of one idea of very vast extent, it requires a breadth that is competent to contain all the greatest generalizations that man has ever fashioned. Instead of having to master these carefully in their details, and to mount up by slow, painful steps to the larger and broader truths, and to leave the largest and broadest truths not grasped at all, as is the manner of most men, a mind of such a stamp will, on the contrary, see first and most plainly all the greatest and broadest aspects of truth, and will feel most at home in dealing with those vaster matters. In other words, whilst most men are shut up in narrow areas, and can see only the little struggles in their own locality, a mind thus heightened occupies a higher standpoint, and from this higher place can see over the whole region, can see the true aspect of things, can see all the broad features of the land, and can fit all the details each into its appropriate place. This great breadth gives very special facilities for mastering the realms of Science, Philosophy, Theology; for becoming acquainted, indeed, with all the thoughts that have moved mankind. It brings a many-sided nature, a nature vast and varied, with thoughts and sympathies and aspirations wide as the race of man.

It seems probable that to build up such a universality of soul is the object of our Lord—is the "divine idea"—in our present generation. The gathered thoughts of the world, the religions of the East, the fulness of present day science, contributions from every nation under heaven, are pouring in upon us in bewildering variety. To what purpose? Surely it is that we, the servants of God, may take from all this proffered wealth whatever is lovely and of good report, whatever will help us to build up a greater nature—a nature more distinctly after the scale of universal man. The Christian is to show that he is the king of the universe, the sceptred sovereign of every department of thought. As the great apostle of the Gentiles challenged all humanity to point to one single thing in which he did not excel, so Christ means His Church to show that it can attain a breadth and grandeur of nature, a richness and volume of holy humanity, that no other systems can hope to rival. We are to be divine men—men in whom God is really living—men who in the strength of that indwelling are able to do all things.

I have a notion that the two main types of life which were the ideal of the Greek race in the childhood of the world, Apollo and Hercules—genius and strength—were shadows which our Lord employed the great minds of Greece to fashion in order that they might adumbrate the grandeur of nature man should finally attain, and that now, in our generation, our Lord is calling on all the best and greatest of His people to carry out His idea, and to show the lofty Greek ideal actually realised in living man. Obviously such a majesty of nature as I have shewn will result from the largest faith would go very far to realize that ideal. A man of such a stamp might easily be an Apollo, lord of many lands, master of the whole mental realm.

It would not surprise me to learn that America is called upon to play a great part in realizing this ideal of universality. Already it may be you have realized it in some of its lower types. Men like Mr. Vanderbilt and Mr. Jacob Astor show a remarkable breadth in matters commercial, and it may be they only shadow forth the dimensions which the children of light are to attain. "They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we are incorruptible." Those upon whom the glory of the spiritual realm has dawned, who see a soul to be greater than an empire, who hold that to be great and Godlike in soul is a more worthy object of ambition than the most colossal fortune that millionaire ever acquired, will be able to use the doings of such men to serve as the mental framework on which they build a spiritual creation that will endure for ever and ever. Their greatness we want to use in our Master's cause; their riches they may have for themselves.

Enough has now, I think, been said to show that a great faith will bring about such an enlargement of nature as to make possible many things which without such faith are impossible. It will make any man as great and as powerful as he wants to become. I have preferred to shew its working on the very largest scale, and as conducting to the very highest elevations, partly because that comes most naturally to me, but also because in proving that the highest can be reached, there is included a portion, the proof that any lower elevations can be attained. If a great faith can bring a Mosaic greatness, it can assuredly bring any lower degree of power any one may desire.

Thus it seems to me the principle is proved. It is universally true that the measure of a man's faith in heaven determines the measure of his soul, his life, his destiny. This then throws down the wall of unbelief which ever since apostolic ages the Church has chosen to set up. She had no authority so to do. It was nothing but her worldliness which made her do it. She never dared to formulate it. It was only a mist, intangible, but blinding and benumbing. We now revise this decision of unbelief. We set it aside as a thing of darkness, having no right in the Church of God. We all are free to aspire to, and in the strength of heaven to attain to, the supreme elevations of mortal endeavor. When once the Church of God accepts this truth I venture to think her foremost sons will actually attain these elevations; and God's mightiest champions, men who through faith can subdue kingdoms, will actually be living on the earth. And in one generation from the time those men get to work, I prophecy that the whole world will be prostrate at the feet of Christ. Now, then, Americans, to your work. If what I have said be true, then act upon it, discuss it, make use of it, carry it out in life, and drive it home by your faith and fervor until all Christendom is rejoicing in the light thereof.

In future papers I hope to show some of the practical applications of this truth.

HENRY FRANCIS LYTE.

BY THE REV. A. J. TARDY.

In chapter xxxvii. of the charming story, "Robert Ord's Atonement," now being published in THE CHURCHMAN (and which has interested and delighted so many of the readers of your journal), the beautiful hymn 335 of the Church Hymnal, "Abide with Me," is spoken of as Keble's glorious Evening Hymn. The celebrated Evening Hymn of John Keble is the 336th of the Hymnal, "Sun of my soul," etc. The author of "Abide with Me" was Henry Francis Lyte, a clergyman of the Church of England, and it has been appropriately called a "Hymn for the Dying," as will be seen by a brief account of the sadly pathetic circumstances under which it was written, and which have much to do with the tone of the hymn and the sentiments it breathes forth.

The author, being in bad health, was compelled to seek for strength in travel.

Before leaving home, although scarcely able to do so, he dragged his attenuated form into the pulpit and delivered his parting address to his beloved flock, and also administered the eucharistical feast to his dear spiritual children. After this, wearied and tired, his heart still beating with emotion, he went home, and the old poetic inspiration coming over him, he wrote the words of what proved to be his last hymn—a hymn for the dying, written by the dying.

He had prayed that his last breath might be swan-like—"In songs that may not die"—and so, in answer to his prayer, his death at the foot of the Alps was like that of those Christian poets, Charles Wesley and George Herbert, singing while his strength lasted, and then quietly and calmly falling asleep in Jesus, his sweet spirit awaiting the glad resurrection morn, when rising from the sleep of death he should join the hallelujah of heaven.

MINISTERING SPIRITS.

BY I. M. C.

"You must not be discouraged in this way; these little dozems will come. Don't think about yourself. Haven't you something cheerful to read—something light? Try to get out of yourself. I wouldn't attempt to sit up to-day," Dr. Raymond continued, as he felt his patient's quick, feeble, nervous pulse. "Keep perfectly quiet, and you'll be all right in two or three days. It must be the weath—." No; that threadbare excuse would not serve this time. The weath was faultless. Not even a kindly-disposed doctor could pick a quarrel with it on behalf of a nervous patient. "Go on with your tonic as I told you, and keep your courage up. Good morning. I'll see you to-morrow," and Miss Duncan was alone.

Oh, the utter wretchedness of the last three days! Not that they had differed materially from most other days in the past year since she broke down suddenly with nervous prostration—"went all to pieces," as their family physician had said with a "told-you-so" tone in his voice. That was just before their dear old home in Central New York was broken up, before her brother's removal to this new home in a Pennsylvania village. It would take a year or two to get back to anything like her ordinary health, her old doctor had said; and she must not expect to get well in a hurry her new doctor has assured her. "You had been speculating with your nervous capital till you were almost bankrupt. You must be willing to give a long time to suspension, then you'll be ready to resume payment on a safer basis," he had added with a most unamiable smile.

Was not a year a long time? It seemed so to the invalid now as she lay on the bed quivering in every nerve of mind and body.

How could she "get out of herself?"

Her home was with a brother immersed in business cares; with a brother's wife engrossed in household worries and perplexities. They were still among comparative strangers in the village, for circumstances had not been propitious to forming friendships or even making acquaintances.

"Read something light, something cheerful." The Doomsday Book itself would seem painfully frivolous in her present frame. "I could patiently bear the physical suffering," she had written to a dear friend two days before, "and even this unutterable weariness and prostration, were it not for the awful depression that is so much worse than anything I could have imagined. My whole soular system seems out of order. There is no longer any star by which to guide my course; blazing meteors of dread and apprehension dart across the darkened horizon—the Sun of Righteousness is obscured, eclipsed—there is no light anywhere." How could she bear it? she asked herself now as she turned wearily on her pillow and resigned herself to another day of unmitigated nerves. Of what use was it even to try to get better? What difference did it make to anyone whether she were ever better or not? Of what importance was her life in any respect? Had it not been an utter failure from beginning to end, and would it not really be better if she were out of the world and no longer a drag on those who had the care of her? She was of no use; no one would miss her. She was no better than she was at the very beginning, and she never would be. It was cruel in the doctor to tell her she could help herself more than any one could help her. She was utterly incapable of helping herself or any one else, and there were so many needing help in this world of sin and sorrow. How dare she lie there day after day in idleness! It was enough to drive one wild to see everyone overtaxed because she was not up and doing her share of this life's work. How tired dear John had looked when he bade her good-by that morning, and how sweet Jessie had been when she came up to ask her if she had slept, saying nothing of her own wakeful night with the fretful baby. Were ever brother and sister more sympathizing and appreciative?

Dear little Miss Duncan! At the end of an hour her mind felt like a hotly contested battlefield. But common-sense had gained the victory. She could at least try to bear her love spirits cheerfully; she could hold her mind open to all helpful influences, and be ready to brighten at the first opportunity.

Oh! for something to lift her out of herself, to float her in these deep waters; and she looked helplessly around upon the painfully familiar objects in the room, turning with a sick revulsion from everything associated with the like effort of the last few days—the scrap-book she was making for little John—the ball she was knitting for the baby.

Ah! there was mall-time yet to come—there might be a letter! That was something to look forward to, and with renewed determination she lay quietly back to try to wait patiently till her brother should come up from his office at one o'clock, two whole hours hence.

"Come in," in a spiritless, lifeless voice (the struggle had been a hard one). "Come in," with an effort at resuscitation as the knock was renewed, and a bright-faced young girl entered—Jennie Markham, a teacher in the neighboring academy, whom Miss Duncan had met a few times on the rare occasions of her noon constitutional, and with whom a friendship was fast forming, notwithstanding the disparity between eighteen and twenty-eight. "Bridget was minus, and Mrs. Duncan had her hands full of the ba—, had the baby I mean, so I came right up. I stopped at the office and brought your mail. Four letters and a postal to answer, and a package to acknowledge! I would rather it were you than I. Letters are a horrid nuisance, I think." Had she noticed the quick change in her friend's expression? No, for she continued: "What people can find to write about, I cannot imagine. I should have nothing to say but 'Bessie Turner behaved like a witch all the morning,' or 'I haven't yet found the temper I lost in the algebra class yesterday,' etc., etc., and I cannot conceive that anyone would be interested in such information as that."

"That is because you do not belong to the modern army of martyrs," Miss Duncan answered, with kindling eye, as her trembling fingers busied themselves with the string about the package. "Wait till you are a nervous prostrationist and see what you will say. Oh, the little darling! the beauties!" she exclaimed, as some exquisite lilies of the valley revealed themselves among their damp cotyled wraps. "Who could have sent them? Here is a letter in the same hand; why it is Ellen's, our good Ellen's; a servant who married two years ago and went to Virginia to live. Will you put some water in those vases on the bureau while I see what she says? How did she happen to think of me—and the lilies?" she continued, half talking to herself, and opening the letter she read aloud:

"MY DEAR FRIEND, MISS SARAH.—It is with great pleasure I write you these few lines to let you know that I am well, hoping to find you in the same. Mr. John he wrote asking me what kind of a girl was my cousin, Maggie, for to wait on you, miss, and then I knowed you was sick it made me feel lonesome like to think of you stopped and quiet as used to be always so busy doing everything for everybody. I felt like I did last year when the mill where He works stopped all on a sudden I missed the sound of the noise and the life like, but the engine was all sore out they said and they put in a new one and now it is as good as ever it was, and I'm thinking it'll be the same will you, miss, for Mr. John says it is the nerve as is the matter with you, and I see so many advertises in the paper I'm sure they'll find something to make you new ones and it is a pair of little twin babies I have this time, and little Sarah not well out of my arms yet. They was very delicate, no one thought they could live, they slept for three weeks and never woke but when I would wake them. I had them baptised when they was only 2 days old, I was afraid of them dying and without names, but now they are all stirred up and He held them for me whiles I done up the lilies for you this morning, miss. You mind I brought some roots from the old home when I come they done splendid and when I looked at them so cool and fresh and clane like I says miss Sarah must have some of them. I says she was always sending them to every sick body she knowed and I knowed just how to do them up from seeing you doem them so often, miss, don't think I have forgot you miss, there are not a week that I am not talking of you, and not one but all I could make no exceptions, so no more at present. From your friend, ELLEN DOLAN."

There was a twinkle in Miss Duncan's eye as she closed with the stereotyped "no more at present." She had been likened to a steam engine before!

"How sweet of her to think of me with her hands so full," she said, noticing with pleasure Ellen's carefully dotted 's and crossed 't's, the result of many patient hours of labor on her part as well as Ellen's. "I shall miss the lilies this spring; those must be fully a month earlier than ours," she added, her mind reverting to times and seasons at home. "If you would care for them you can have as many as you wish to send away; we have plenty of them in our garden. I should never have thought of sending them by mail; I didn't know they would carry."

"Better than almost any other flower. See, they have been two days coming, and they will keep fresh three or four days yet. Was there ever anything lovelier!—so 'cool and fresh and clane like,' as Ellen says; the darlings!" and Miss Duncan almost caressed her new found treasures.

"I mustn't stay another minute. Ah! one of your letters has a foreign post mark; will you read it to me some day if it is from your niece? Good-bye; how bright you look this morning! Can you spare them?" as Miss Duncan held out to her some sprays of her precious lilies. "There, I'll wear them just here and think of you all the afternoon. I'll look up some empty boxes and some cotton, and we'll have a little flower mission all to ourselves. Good-bye in earnest this time," and once more Miss Duncan was alone, but in such good company!

She lay quietly back upon her pillow, in no haste to enter upon the enjoyment yet before her, for well she knew that treasures were yet in store for her.

The postal next. This was merely a few words from the Rev. Mr. R., in Montana, thanking her for a Seaside copy of Farrar's "St. Paul," which she had recently sent him. Her thoughts went back to the day her first letter had come from him—a day similar to the present one; and then to still another day when still another time the doctor had told her to try to get "out of herself," and she had cast about in her mind for some means of doing so by doing something for some one else. Suggestions always come to those ready to receive them, and she had remembered having read of a call for papers and magazines for Western missionaries who were without the means of obtaining reading matter for themselves and their families. A postal was sent to Miss E., the Secretary of the Women's Auxillary, asking for the name of any missionary to whom a copy of an illustrated paper would be acceptable after it had done duty in an Eastern home, and in a few days had come an answer giving Mr. R.'s name. The paper had been mailed to him with a little note of explanation, and she would never forget the help Mr. R.'s letter of acknowledgment had been to her.

"Much of the encouragement and success of the missionary on the frontier," he had written, "are due to the consideration and constant kindness of ladies at the East, as manifested by the enormous aid given by the different ladies' societies, and to the watchful, ever generous help of loving Christian individuals." And then had followed a full account of his interesting field of labor.

From then till now the paper had been sent regularly, and there had been an interchange of expressions of kindly friendliness, till she had almost grown to feel that she possessed a personal proprietorship in the jurisdiction from which her postal had just come.

Was there actually a smile on her face as she lay with her hands clasped over the three yet unread letters, her thoughts travelling from Virginia to Montana and home again in a pleasant round? So Maggie, coming in with her dinner, found her; and when her brother came up to say a word or two before returning to his office, there was the pair of twin babies to tell him about, and a spray of lilies for his button-hole, in return for which she received a loving kiss and a cheerful "I'm so glad to see you so much better than yesterday."

Then came the necessary after-dinner rest, and then she took the first letter her hand fell upon; any one of them was sure to be a treat. Not a letter, after all, but some "Thoughts" from dear Mrs. P., an invalid friend, with only their internal evidence and the initials K. J. P. to tell of their authorship:

"Special opportunities for development of character arising from the limitations of my life.

"1. An opportunity never to make things worse than God intended them to be.

"2. For much more versatility of character than I could possess were I permitted to work in the direction to which my inclinations prompt me.

"3. An opportunity to make apparent interruptions in what appears to me my appointed task, guide boards to the real work which God wishes me to do.

"4. For leisure to do many odds and ends of work in ways impossible to a person whose duty calls to unbroken lines of occupation.

"5. An opportunity for cultivating a habit of thoroughness in doing many little things which would otherwise necessarily be done slightlyly.

"6. An opportunity to learn how to rest.

"The habits we are forming, rather than the actual work we are doing, are educating us for the work awaiting us under different conditions hereafter. Camille Urso worked cheerfully for months on a dumb violin to learn positions and motions. So can we work if we have equal confidence in the Master. Who places before us our daily duties as the best present training for the music that will accompany the new song. All impediments may help us to gain the right positions and motions."

It was many minutes before Miss Duncan even thought of the remaining letters. Her mind was filled with the one glad thought that she was not necessarily idling as she lay there day after day doing nothing; she was really "working together with God," if her spirit were acquiring the right positions and motions. She could no doubt, she reflected, have gotten the same idea from the many helpful little books upon the stand beside her; she had, in fact, gotten the same in substance from her text for the day; but coming from one whom she loved, and to whom she knew just how much they meant, these "Thoughts" seemed so personal, so individually helpful, that her heart went up in gratitude to Him who had spoken to her through her friend.

Nellie's letter from Mentone was full of pleasant generalities, such as most tourists write now-a-days, followed by particularities told in her piquant fashion, as only she knew how to tell them, and then came a few lines which almost took away the invalid's breath: for, by some occult rule of psychological mathematics, the truth of the intelligence imparted had increased in force in inverse ratio to the square of the distance it had travelled.

"Mamma has been so good as to leave it for me to tell you the very best news that ever was heard. She has had such a nice letter from Dr. Raymond—I will tell you in his own words. 'Notwithstanding the very slight apparent gain, and the great need for care for some time to come, your sister is making steady progress towards recovery, and every probability is strongly in favor of her being restored to her normal health in the course of the coming year.' That means—Oh! do you know what it means to us all, you darling, darling auntie!"

At this opportune moment Mrs. Duncan walked in, leading one baby and carrying another (the nurse had suddenly departed the day before). To sympathizing ears was the good news imparted, and then again Miss Duncan was left alone, for though the crowing and squealing elicited by the baby's unsuccessful efforts to swallow his little brother's head did not disturb the invalid in her present state of elation, the fear lest they might do so was more than the young mother could bear with equanimity.

Half an hour later Miss Duncan opened her last letter, glancing at her watch as she did so. Four o'clock, and she had actually twice forgotten to take her medicine, the only recollection left her she had thought that morning.

This was just one of Mary's dear home letters, quiet and restful, with its record of daily duties and interests; little snatches about the books she was reading; church news; loving inquiries as to her friend's condition; words of sympathy and cheer; accompanied by some clippings from their local paper that were so irresistibly ludicrous that the hearty laughter which followed the reading of them could not be restrained.

When Mr. Duncan came up to say good-night to his sister before her early bed time, he found her lying upon the lounge, an atlas opened at the map of France on the table beside her, and in her hand the latest magazine containing a delightful article on Mentone, the very one to which he had directed her attention in the early part of the week, but at which she had not had the spirit to look till this moment. All talking must be postponed till morning or sleep would be an impossibility, but the good-night kiss was given with her natural brightness, and a few minutes later when the sound of merry laughter came up from the parlor where Mr. Duncan was reading to his tired little wife the newspaper cuttings which Mary had sent, an unmistakable echo might have been heard from the invalid's room.

And this was the day which had seemed so hopelessly endless at its beginning.

THE VALUE OF THE REVISION.

Mr. Martin F. Tupper, the well-known author of "Proverbial Philosophy," has written to the London Times his impressions of the Revised Version. "Revision of King James's Bible was needed," he says, "only in very sparse instances, enough for the whole book to fill a small page or two of errata and corrigenda, with, perhaps, additionally a short treatise to explain; this thin pamphlet, in various sizes, to be gummed into or bound up with our own family and pocket Bibles, thus saved from being obsolete, and still our most revered possessions. So should we have a perfect Bible at a minimum of cost and trouble. As things are, after enormous expenditure and some fifteen laborious years, the issue of all seems to be that practically the faith of the nation has been shaken by the innumerable needless changes in the letter of Scripture, which almost passim has damaged the rhythm of our best and grandest classic, without adding to its clearness, (especially as the familiar volume is now by these revisers systematically despoiled of those headings to chapters and pages so useful to the eye,) and that our theological pundits have unwittingly aided the normal scepticism of the age by their feeble imitation of the sin of Uzzah." This is rather strong language, but in effect it is a perfectly valid criticism.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THREE JIMS.

"Uncle Harry, I'm so glad you've come at last! I want to show you my birthday present!"

"Which one, small Hal? I heard that you boasted of having a dozen this year."

"Yes, so I did, and they were all nice. Here's the smallest of them in my pocket; see, uncle, little Nellie sewed this round pin ball for me with her own cunning little fingers; wasn't she a darling!

"And I had three books; and a box of papers; and a new ball; and some games and goodies. But the best of all is Jim.

"Here, Jim, where are you? Come and see Uncle Harry! Why where is the scamp!"

"I guess he is asleep in his old box!" laughed little Nellie.

"Oh, yes. I dare say. Come and see him, uncle, please.

"Here's the little rogue; isn't it funny that he has laid claim to this old hat-box? See, he has made a doorway to suit himself. Hi, Jim!"

The four-footed treasure roused at this call, and stood gravely surveying the new-comer.

"Isn't he cute, Uncle Harry? Don't he look knowing? Oh! I mean to teach him lots of funny tricks! He's just the kind for a performing dog; don't you think so, uncle?"

"I dare say he will learn easily," answered Uncle Harry.

"A very promising pup, you are, Jim; but you will need to be wide awake to deserve your name!"

"Why, Uncle Harry? Do you know any other dog named Jim?"

"Yes, I have the honor to be acquainted with two of the name."

"Tell me about them, please!" coaxed Hal. "Here, Jim; come sit up and hear about your namesakes!"

"One is a bull-terrier; a funny fellow, who belongs to the family with whom I boarded this summer. We had great sport with him on the Fourth of July; he was so excited over the boys' fire crackers.

it his duty to put out the lighted crackers. Poor Jim! What a martyr to duty he was that day, to be sure!

"Jim has one particular chair, with a cushion in it, in which he sleeps at night. One evening I chanced to be sitting in this chair, reading by the lamp; I sat there until it was past Jim's bed-time, and he grew very uneasy.

"He came and looked at me, and whined; then ran and fetched his blanket, laid it down by the chair, whined again and pulled me by the sleeve. His mistress offered him another chair, but that did not suit; so, after keeping my seat a little longer to tease him, I was obliged to let him have the chair.

"Another time the cat curled herself up in it. Now Jim had been taught to be very respectful to Mrs. Puss, so he did not venture to disturb her. He stood still a few minutes, watching the intruder and whining, then he ran away and coaxed his mistress to the spot by pulling her apron; when there he looked beseechingly at her, and then at the cat, as much as to

"THE FOUR-FOOTED TREASURE STOOD GRAVELY SURVEYING THE NEW-COMER."

"They had a good stock of them, and Jim would rush after each one as it was lighted and thrown. He hawed and barked at them frantically, and even caught them in his mouth; we could not hold him back when he saw one lighted. The poor fellow's hair was burnt black in spots all over him, from his encounters with the exasperating squibs."

"What made him do so?" laughed Harry.

"Why, he had been taught to put out fire when he was a pup; and so he felt say: 'Do please make her get out of my chair!'"

"I think he was a good Doggie Jim," said little Nelly.

"Why, my wee girlie?"

"'Cause he worked so hard to put out all the fire, and 'cause he didn't hurt the pussy!"

"So I think. I'm afraid I cannot say as much for the other Jim. He is an English pug, and is a great pet with his master and mistress—in fact, he is a good deal like a spoiled child; but he is very funny sometimes. This Jim likes to be fed from a plate with a silver fork, and he is best pleased when his mistress feeds him herself. Sometimes, when she is busy, she asks Betty to feed him. In that case, Jim puts on a great many airs. He insists that Betty shall stay outside the dining-room door, in the kitchen, and feed him over the sill; she must get down on her knees, too, and hold the plate. Betty is generally very good-natured with his lordship's whims; but one day she got out of patience, and thrust a bit of meat into his mouth rather ungently. Away ran Jim, with his napkin about his neck, found his mistress, pulled her dress and whined, looking back toward Betty.

"What's the matter, Jimmy?" she asked. "Did Betty tease you? Tell her she mustn't do it."

"Jim went back to his dinner with a triumphant air, which plainly said, 'You'd better not try it again!'"

"There is one dog in the neighborhood to whom little Jim has taken a very strong dislike. When he is looking out at the window, if he is heard to give a peculiar, short, angry bark, one need not look out to be sure that that dog is in sight. One day the lady who owns the obnoxious dog called to see Jim's mistress, and Jim behaved so rudely to her that he had to be sent from the room.

"Jim's home is in the city, and he is not trusted out for a walk alone; so when he sees either of the family preparing to go out he is delighted, and begs and coaxes in his prettiest way to be allowed to go.

"When his mistress goes out without him, Jim invariably watches at the window until he sees her coming; then he jumps up and kisses her, frantic with delight.

"One day, when his mistress was returning from some errands, she saw a crowd of children in front of her house, gazing up at the window, highly amused at something. And no wonder; for there sat Jim, demurely holding in his mouth his master's meerschaum pipe!

"Jim's love for his mistress is very remarkable. He is a proud and happy daggie when he can find and bring her slippers, or any article she is inquiring for. When she is ill he will lick her hands and whine and cry piteously.

"If Jim sees his master start for the depot with a valise in his hand, he instantly sets himself to watch over his mistress with special care; he is very fierce towards any intruder, and no one can coax him away from his charge, until her proper protector returns home.

"He never spoils any of her belongings, in his most mischievous mood; and he does not like to see any one else wearing them; if she gives any half-worn garments away he always recognizes them, if he sees them worn.

"He dearly loves a frolic: he may seem to be asleep, but if some one says, 'Where's the strap?' Jim will rush to the drawer like a crazy thing, and whine until a leather strap is produced. He fastens his teeth in one end, and then they may slide him the whole length of the hall, upstairs and down, or whirl him round and round, and he will not let go his hold. If he wants a young lady of the family to frolic with him, he will rush into her room and seize something that he ought not to have, and wave it in her face to provoke a chase.

"Last winter poor Jim was very sick with pneumonia. Poor little fellow! there was no fun in that. He breathed so hard that a little child who came in exclaimed: 'Hear him sneak!' 'Sneak' she meant, Nelly.

"But Jim liked the petting and coddling which he received, and when he was better and able to indulge in some of his old antics, if any one said: 'Poor Jim is sick!' he would take a languishing attitude directly.

"But, dear me, haven't I told you enough about little Jim, the pug?"

"It's funny, Uncle Harry, I wish you could think of some more!" said Nelly.

"There, Jim," cried Hal, "have you heard what those other doggies can do! I want you to go ahead of them both by and by—but you must not be a 'spoiled child!'"

"Poodle Jim here put up his paws in a deprecating way, as if promising to try to be good.

"Uncle Harry, they did not have such nice, dear doggies as we have in the Bible days, did they?"

"I hardly think they did, Hal; but why do you ask?"

"Why, I don't remember the words, but some verses I've read speak of dogs as if they were ugly and mean."

"Yes, there are many such expressions. I think these refer to the wretched dogs which are still found in troops prowling about the streets of Eastern cities. They have no owners, and live upon the garbage which comes in their way. They know enough to keep out of the way of the strict Mahometans, who would feel themselves defiled if their garments should touch one of them.

"But the Bible speaks of shepherd dogs, Hal, and watch-dogs; and of dogs which fed under their masters' tables; so they may have had some that were as intelligent and affectionate as ours.

"The ancient Egyptians worshipped the dog, under the name 'Anubis.' The Greeks and Romans had valuable breeds of dogs, and they trained some of them for hunting, and for war.

"And now good-by, little Jim; you have led me into a long talk, and I must be off."

"Good-by, Uncle Harry, and thank you for the dog stories."

ART.

The twenty-eighth annual festival of the Worcester County Musical Association takes place September 31st-25th, inclusive, in Mechanics' Hall, Worcester, Mass. Carl Zerrahn is conductor, one of the most accomplished concert-masters living. There is a chorus of more than five hundred, representing the well-known selections of that most musical region. It stands shoulder to shoulder with the old Handel and Haydn chorus of Boston for exceptional intelligence, beautiful tonality, and splendid delivery. There are not more than three or four Boston singers among them. And yet Boston and Worcester are near neighbors, and can, without inconvenience, unite these great choirs in an ensemble at once unique and unapproachable. The value of such a conjunction was for the first time understood in New York at the great Thomas festival, in the double choruses of "Israel in Egypt." Such a chorus as this of Worcester, properly distributed in a suitable building, is adequate to the highest services of choral art, and incomparably better than a miscellaneous assemblage of twice its numbers.

There is room for reflection in the conjunction of such a chorus and society with a "Mechanics' Hall." The traveller's ideal of Worcester is a world of rattling machinery, belching chimneys, factories humming and throbbing with grimy industry, nests of railway stations and interminable tangles of railway tracks, and its musical symbol, if any, the "Anvil Chorus." But the hall, with its great organ, and the aesthetic annals of the city set to rights all such hallucinations.

Here is a society holding its twenty eighth annual festival. It lasts four full days. It presents eight concerts, remarkable for breadth of taste and culture, exquisitely-contrived chiaro oscuro of tonal contrast, and the largest general edification. There is an orchestra of more than sixty instruments, most of them celebrities, and this is reinforced by a great organ specially constructed for such occasions. Among the eighteen solo vocalists are: Soprano, Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mlle. Emma Juch. Mme. Blanche Stone-Barton, Misses Douglas, Howland, and Kehew; contraltos, Miss Clapper, Mrs. Belle Cole, and Miss Hall; tenors, Messrs. Mockridge, Pfueger, Parker, Want, and Webber; and basses, Messrs. Whitney, Stoddard, Babcock, and Metcalf. Among the solo instrumentalists are Teresa Carreu, Edward Perry, Frederic Archer, and Messrs. Lichtenberg, Loeffler, Listermann, and Heindl.

The days will be literally crowded. At 9:30 A.M. and 2 P.M. are daily rehearsals. At 3 and 7:45 P.M. are daily concerts. A season ticket, price five dollars, secures admission to all these events, with a reserved seat. Single admission with reserved seat, one dollar. We mention these particulars because they disclose the half mission spirit of the association.

An analysis of the eight programmes presents the following interesting results:

Selections are presented from thirty-two composers. Among them, Handel appears eight times, as the festival is commemorative of the two hundredth anniversary of the great master. There are Bach, Haydn, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Weber, Liszt, Raff, Rubinstein, Volkmann, Goldmark and Gade, and among the Germans; among the French, Guilmant, Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Saint Saens and Gounod; among the Italians, Donizetti, Verdi and Rossini; among the English, Henry Smart and MacFarren; and among Americans, one, distinctively, Mr. Arthur B. Whiting.

It would be easy enough, but not altogether wise or graceful to suggest grave omissions, for no festival can be made encyclopedic, and the range and test of such a long-lived associa-

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1885.

WHEN our Lord called His disciples they supposed that they had found the Messiah who was to restore the kingdom to Israel. They were His especial friends. He would raise them to honor and power, and they followed him gladly. But the time soon came when our Lord was tried, condemned and crucified, and they forsook Him. It is not an unmet representation of much of the religion of the day. It is a religion of luxury and ease, with room for the crown but none for the cross.

BISHOP HENRY CHAMPLIN LAY, D.D., LL.D.

The Church has heard with unfeigned sorrow of the death of the Bishop of Easton; he was one of the Princes in our Israel. There are few bishops on the long roll who were his superiors; there are none more widely and warmly loved. He was trained for his high office at the feet of one who has been called our St. John—Bishop Cobbs. He won men to him by his gentleness as well as by his force and strength of character, by the music of his voice as well as by the power and eloquence of his words. He was a popular preacher, but he was more. He was a man with a heart brimming over with sympathy and love, welcome ever in the home of sorrow as well as in the house of joy, a faithful shepherd and a successful priest. In Alabama his works followed him; as the chief shepherd in Arkansas and in Easton the growing sheep-fold was the speaking witness for him; in the House of Bishops he was the wise conservative counsellor whose wisdom always commanded respect. In his death it may well be said the mighty are fallen and the weapons of war are perished.

Bishop Lay was one of the very few men who have graduated Master in Arts at the University of Virginia, and this he did at the age of nineteen, proving thus at once the greatness and the early maturity of his mental powers. Taking orders in the Church, while yet a deacon he turned his steps to Alabama, then a frontier missionary field, and in that diocese, until his elevation to the episcopate, it is hardly too much to say that among her clergy he was primus inter pares. He was a favorite with her bishop; he was a strong man in her councils and in shaping her policy; he was her representative in the General Convention, and at Huntsville he built up a strong and vigorous parish.

Meanwhile he had made his mark upon the Church at large, and in 1859 he was made Missionary Bishop of the Southwest and took up his residence in Arkansas. In that field he did what he could with the means given, but it was stubborn and barren, and was little suited to his peculiar abilities. The Church said Go, and he went obediently, but he was thrown away as a weapon not suited to the warfare. His life was one of labor and self-sacrifice; he "crooned," (to use his own word) along the fences and floundered along the muddy roads; his work was not without results. In 1869 the Church's error was amended by the translation of Bishop Lay to the Diocese of Easton. There he lived and labored until he died, at the same time serving the Church in various commissions of the General Convention, especially on the Committee on the Revision of the Prayer Book and as one of the Trustees of the Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergymen, and of Aged, Infirm and Disabled Clergymen. In behalf of this institution he did a yeoman's work, and was instant in season and out of season. He appreciated its great necessity to the continued prosperity of the Church, and his eloquent appeals were often heard. The Church must provide for her clergy—the laborer was worthy of his hire—they could not without shame be left with their wives and children to the cold charities of the world. It was a vital question and he did not spare himself, and if that Fund shall ever be worthy of the Church it will be the fruit of the labors of Bishop Lay in its behalf.

Bishop Lay held the pen of a ready writer, his words were like "apples of gold in pictures of silver." Few excelled him in aptness of thought and felicity of expression, and there was a rhythm in his prose that pleased the ear and mended the heart. It was a talent that God had given him, and in His service he turned it to valuable account. He believed in the press and in its use. He published occasional sermons: "Tracts for Missionary Use," "Letters to a Man Bewildered among Many Counsellors," and for many years he had been a most valued contributor to THE CHURCHMAN. In these columns first appeared his "Studies in the Church," "Ready and Desirous," a work upon confirmation, which has had so large a circle of readers, "The Return of the Southern Bishops to the General Convention," and "The Quiet Corner," which was to have been continued through the current year, and which he took great delight in. By those works and his lectures at the General Theological Seminary on "Law, Liberty, and Loyalty in a Church National and Pure," being dead, Bishop Lay will long speak to the Church which he loved, as well as by the memory of a sainted life. He was but two years past sixty, but he had reared a lasting monument to himself, and left a fragrant name to the generations to come.

THE HILL MEMORIAL AT ATHENS, GREECE.

The Rev. C. R. Hale, D.D., of the diocese of Maryland, is about returning to this country from Europe, after a year of foreign travel of exceptional interest. He is the American Basire and has done much to make the American Church known and understood abroad, especially among Oriental Christians. Besides England, he has visited Norway and Sweden, and important points in Russia, such as St. Petersburg, Moscow and Kieff. The Russo-Greek Church has been a special study with him for many years. He visited it in comparative youth, and has maintained close relations with it, by correspondence, ever since. Dr. Hale has also visited the Holy Land, receiving marked and cordial Christian kindness from the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem, and other dignitaries. But, we notice this interesting tour chiefly because of a letter lately received from him, in which he speaks of his visit to Athens. He remarks: "What most interested me here was not the classical associations of the spot, but, above all, the Christian school here founded by the American Church, fifty years ago, under the care and by the labors of Dr. and Mrs. Hill. Nothing, even in Athens, is so well worthy of a Christian's admiration and thoughtful study. Here, ever since the overthrow of the Mohammedan tyranny, have daughters of Greece been trained in Christian morals and a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, till now all Greece feels the leaven of its influence. Bishops of the Hellenic Church are numbered among the sons of those whom Dr. Hill has educated. Reflect on what that imports. As for the results of this work, and its far-reaching influence, 'the half had not been told me.'"

Such is, in substance, Dr. Hale's testimony, and it confirms all that has been written before by eminent English and American visitors. The late Bishop of Lincoln corroborated a like eulogium from the very different stand-point of a professor of Harvard, the late accomplished Mr. Felton. Of all the foreign work ever yet undertaken by our American Church this must be allowed the most extensively fruitful, and certainly the most successful, in earning for us the respect of our fellow-Christians in all parts of the world.

Now, is "the Hill School" to be given up? An effort is in progress to purchase the property (leased at present) for a permanent foundation, and to make it the "Hill Memorial." We do not learn how the subscription comes on, but we understand that a most benevolent lady of Hartford is very earnestly engaged in promoting its object, and that the Rev. F. Goodwin of the same city is the treasurer, to whom funds may be remitted for this noble and most interesting form of making this Christian school "a memorial forever." We shall be glad to record more of the history and progress of the project.

RENAN'S ROMANCE.

A man of genius often concentrates the principle of all his views in one pregnant sentence. In a word he may reveal his whole position.

In a report of a late familiar talk, by M. Ernest Renan to his fellow Bretons, occurs this sentence: "They (the Bretons) were a very religious people, but were quite willing that everybody should compose as he pleased his romance of the infinite."

Alas for Renan, and for the multitudes in both hemispheres whom he represents! Only a romance! The one only source and means of definite hope for this life and the next, only a fragment of the imagination, something for the mind to create and contemplate! Nothing for the other faculties of the complex person man? Especially nothing for his complete, yet single, whole ego to rest on and dwell in, with "the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope!"

Is it madness, or the "foolishness of wisdom" that is taking possession of the current literary and scientific evolution? Can they who follow it not see that Renan has spoken for them all in using the word "romance"? This should be the last stage of mental devotion. When religion, the only channel of true wisdom, ceases to be real to their convictions, and becomes a mere variable product of men's own conceptions, then is time to "eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Are the "wise men" of the day ready for this practical result?

Or, if they scorn such a test, and demand consideration for the mere argument of their position, what have they to say to their confinement of such a vast subject as religion not merely to the mind, but even to one faculty of the mind?

One thing, at least, Christians can congratulate one another upon. Their religion is no romance to them. It supplies the imagination, indeed, with pictures, such as eye hath not seen nor thought conceived; but at the same time it satisfies the reason, fills the heart, and assures even the body of its own resurrection. Moreover, it is not confined to the future. It promises future perfection. But even now it enters into the whole complexity of the unit person, and enables man to know God in the assurance of present companionship. Christianity does not paint a portrait of One absent, and let hope alone dwell upon the delineation in anticipation of hereafter seeing the Original. It is not a mere art. The Christian religion is now as it ever was, not only catholic for all the world, but the same for every man, inasmuch as it fills him full of the Divine presence, and makes his whole natural constitution religious. If it did less than this it could not be the religion for man.

THE MERCERSBURG MOVEMENT AND CHURCH UNITY.

IV.

We have reached, by elimination, the plan of the Muhlenberg Memorial. That seems thus far to have been acted upon only in the House of Bishops, but it was addressed to the bishops "in council assembled." The former body, harnessed to a denomination by the side of an assembly of mere legislators always tempted to sectarianism, cannot do that "work of an American Catholic Episcopate" asked for in the Memorial, and pertaining to a College of Apostles.

Were the bishops to appear in their apostolic character, it is altogether probable that denominational legislatures would be slow to acknowledge them, and that individuals would often be prevented from accepting their offer by a sense of obligation to municipal authority. Those whose sense of obligation to the Catholic Church should lead them to persist might be ordained without impropriety, for while apostles need not make war on denominations, they can hold no truce with sects. In such a case the candidates, and the local churches which might receive them, would drop for the time into congregationalism, or the system of local autonomy, and that system might play a great part in the work of unification. But should a movement of this sort assume larger proportions, the various legislatures would undoubtedly adapt themselves to the new situation, and devise methods for receiving the episcopal element without fatal consequences. This is quite possible in every case, it would be easy to show, with support from high authority, were there time for it, that even the principle of party need not be compromised even by reordination. As far as Presbyterianism is concerned, the rapid disappearance of the old Puritan theory of an unalterable polity (applied also to Congregationalism in the Cambridge Platform) is removing the one insuperable obstacle in that quarter. And though episcopal government is not here in question, it is worth observing that an approach even to that has been made (in one case avowedly) by the appointment of missionary superintendents at the West. The (German) Reformed Church has lately taken this step, and may yet take another by making the president of the classis (elected for a term of years), chairman of an executive committee, having "general supervision . . . within the bounds of the classis."

But what concerns us just now is the probable attitude of this Church toward such an Apostolate as Muhlenberg pleaded for. On this point no "outsider" is entitled to speak confidently, but any man may tell what he knows. First of all, then, in a Church of continental origin the insular, or Puritan theory above referred to, has no historic root, and probably need not be reckoned with at all. Dr. Nevin, indeed, a Puritan born, at times showed traces of it, but he, as well as his German associates, habitually treated the whole question of polity as of secondary importance, to be settled after there should have been a general return to "the Catholic life of the Creed," and to a worthier conception of the Church itself, as Christ's living Body. Furthermore, the historical temple of the Mercersburg school enabled them to acknowledge from the outset not only the great antiquity, but the other and perhaps higher merits of episcopacy as an institution. Such men have no such inherited dread of bishops as would make them shrink from accepting the gift of unity at their hands, should bishops prove themselves able to bestow it. And while such men would be the last to endanger internal unity, the exercise of their legitimate influence in behalf of any action which should promise a great reunion seems not too much to hope for. And were their influence to be exerted in favor of Catholic ordinations, it can at least be said that no other Presbyterian body is so unlikely to drive its members into Congregationalism in search of Catholicity. It is true that there has been less talk about unity in later years than during the first period of the Mercersburg movement. Prolonged dissensions, the absence of proposals at once Catholic and Apostolic, the failure of various well-meant efforts for union, the natural influence of renewed denominational vigor, and of the absorption of energy in a recognized denominational mission, all help to account for this. But early convictions and aspirations have not perished, and both were vigorously expressed thirteen years ago, in words which, should occasion call for it, would doubtless be repeated now. They also furnish valuable testimony about the permanent attitude of the Church as a whole. In 1872, when the proposed union of the Dutch and German Synods was under discussion, the former synod was addressed by the delegate of the latter, Dr. P. S. Davis. Dr. Davis is editor of The Messenger, the principal newspaper of the (German) Reformed Church, published in Philadelphia. His whole address is most interesting, but a few sentences will indicate its drift. The italics are his. "For the oneness of life which would express itself organically in one body, my synod has an undiminished craving. . . . While we may not be as sanguine in regard to movements in this direction, which we see being initiated, we do not regard ourselves as standing in the way of a true organic union of all the members of Christ's mystical Body. No Church would go farther than my own, if that higher union could be authenticated to her consciousness as something about to be practically realized. Clear and distinct and positive as her life is, she would not hesitate to surrender her individuality to such a blessed consummation. That is saying more than others could say; but any branch of the Church that cannot say it, after all, puts its denomination above the one Holy Catholic Church, and with it the unity of the Church may mean nothing more than absorption into its own narrow bounds. To such a thing we could not submit, nor would we ask it of others. . . . We have no uninspired symbol except the "Heidelberg Catechism," which sets forth, as the articles of faith, "the Apostles' Creed, that grand old symbol, broad and catholic enough, not only for our own Church, but for all the confessions of Christendom. . . . The Person and work of Christ . . . is the first thing for us, and this will be a point to the key-note that our synod would sound on the question of union."

Some statements of this address are bolder than a stranger might be warranted in making, and promise more than a Catholic episcopate need ask. It would have been worth much to hear them from the platform of the congress, and pleasant to see there some representative of the Mercersburg confessions for Catholic unity. And this all the more, that the spiritual presence of Horace Bushnell was in a manner invoked, and his serene face was there, as if to welcome one of the "vast assemblages of believers flowing together in a sublime concourse of brotherhood," which he foresaw. For his career presents a striking parallel to that of Dr. Nevin, widely as they differed, and the latter was one of the first orthodox divines to perceive that the former was "struggling in his spirit towards great truths."

The Mercersburg movement and the Memorial movement are both alive, and neither has ever ceased to act powerfully within the communion where it originated. The Directory of Worship is scarcely more a fruit of the one than the Book Annexed is of the other. Consciously or not, the congress, so generously conceived, conducted with such skill, energy, and success, betrays the influence of the former as well as of the latter, and is, perhaps, a sign that the two are acting together in behalf of the Church Universal. It will be well if we, on our part, shall confess that our indispensable contribution to reunion has to be made in the way which the Memorial indicated. If we cannot yet make this confession, those who long for unity must wait till we can. Prophets often see farther beyond their own time than either they or others suppose, and barely a generation has passed since "the Word of the Lord came" to William Augustus Muhlenberg.

Note.—In the first line of Article III. of this series "purification" should have been printed "pactification."

USE OF THE SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE IN SCOTLAND.

In the canons of the Scottish Church the Scottish Communion Office is excluded from all consecrations, ordinations, and synods—that is to say, whenever the Church wishes to engage in an act of unusual dignity and solemnity, she must leave her national liturgy at the church door.

At the late synod, the Rev. Mr. Danson introduced a resolution to do away with this restriction. His remarks in support will, we are sure, be interesting to our readers, especially because the Church of America has modelled its own Communion Office on the Scottish. Mr. Danson said:

"We may learn something of the true nature of this enactment by the way in which it strikes strangers. Not long ago a famous American liturgiologist, Dr. Harison of Troy, remarked to me, 'Well, what queer folks yon Scottish Churchmen are! We sent over last October a lot of our men to glorify the Scottish Office which we had received as a precious gift from you; and after you had all assembled in St. Andrew's church, which we thought was the home of this Office, and everybody was expecting to see a genuine Scottish service, they were told by the bishop they could not have it, because the bishops were meeting in synod.' Now, it strikes me that the proposal made by the Bishop of St. Andrew's in 1863 was the one that would have exactly met the difficulty: 'At synods, ordinations, and all other special occasions, the ordinary use of the church in which the synod or ordination is held shall be followed in the administration of the Holy Communion.' If this wise suggestion had been adopted, there would at the present time most likely have been at least five dioceses in which the Scottish Office would be used at all the episcopal functions specified by the canon. Some may ask the question, Upon what do you base your hopes of effecting the desired change in the canonical resolutions of 1863? My lord, I think there are three grounds of hope, which I will briefly recite. The first is in those silent and gentle changes which are wrought by death. Of the eight bishops who signed the canons in 1863, six are now dead, and of the thirteen presbyters who were then delegates, ten are now dead.

With a change of men there comes a change of sentiment. Heat and passion are only mortal, and when a controversy has ceased to rage, there comes a time of peace, in which men are willing to take a calm and intelligent view of truth. My second hope is founded in the deep effect produced by Dr. Dowden's learned and admirable treatise on the Scottish Communion Office; and my third is based on the high honor in which our American visitors declared, in eloquence whose glowing periods we shall be slow to forget, that the Office is held among Trans-Atlantic Churches. The words of the Bishop of Albany were not spoken in a corner. No member of the vast assembly gathered in the Music Hall could fail to carry away with him food for deep reflection upon the wisdom and duty of treasuring for ourselves what Kilgour and Petrie and Skinner commended to Seabury and his flock. My lord, I will not sit down without avowing my sincere conviction that upon three grounds we are entitled to have the prayer of our petition acceded to. You owe it first of all to the great Church of America that after they have done your bidding in adopting your Office as the basis of their own, you shall not leave them in the lurch by leaving unremoved the badge of inferiority which your present canon affixes to your national liturgy. Some Churchmen there may be who attach little value to the doings of 'the new and democratic communion' of the West; but I would remind everyone that the American Church, with that adaptability to which Dr. Walker has just referred, is the Church of the city and the prairie; that she has enfolded in her strong arms the culture of Boston and the rugged simplicity of the Indians of the Western plains. She is the living mother of a living household. You owe it, again, to our hopes of ultimate reunion with the great orthodox Church of the East. I remember that Mr. Palmer, of Magdalen, in his 'Appeal to the Scottish Church,' tells us that when he was attended at St. Columba's, Edinburgh, by a Russian Admiral, his companion remarked, after the celebration, upon the substantial identity of the Scottish Office with the one of his own communion, truly recognizing the lineaments of the parent in the face of the child; and, lastly, you owe it to our own children, who under the influence of the clearer statement of Scriptural and Catholic truth contained in the Scottish Office, grow up in habits of reverence and intelligent love of sacramental truth, acceptable to God and edifying to man. After the beautiful charge which your lordship has just given us, inculcating so forcibly right principles in worship and conduct, I leave with confidence the petition in your hands."

The bishop had great pleasure in receiving the petition, and he said nothing would be wanting on his part to urge its prayer upon the Episcopal College at its next meeting. He might simply state, for his own part, that when they took part in the Seabury Centenary, and when at the Synod the American members specially thanked them for the gift of the Scottish Eucharist Office, which gift they thought even greater than that of the episcopacy, it did seem outrageous that the Scottish Church should be unable to use that Office, and he felt certain that the doom of that canon, as it stood at present, was sealed.

THE CONNECTICUT OFFICE OF INDUCTION.

The Rev. John S. Beers of Natick, Mass., has presented to the Archives of the Diocese of Connecticut a copy of the rare pamphlet entitled, "An Office of Induction, adopted by the Bishop and Clergy of the Diocese of Connecticut, in Convocation, at Derby, November 20th, 1790. By the Rev. William Smith, D.D., Rector of St. Paul's Church, Norwalk. Printed at New Haven, by Thomas Green & Son."

This office, as is well known, is that on which the "Office of Institution" was based which was set forth by the General Convention in 1804, and which, as amended by the same authority in 1808, is now printed at the end of our Prayer Book. Prefixed to it is the seventeenth canon of the General Convention of 1790, entitled, "Notice to be given of the Induction and Dismission of Ministers, and prescribing the form in which the Bishop should be notified of the election of a rector or assistant-minister." Then follows the form of the Bishop's letter of Institution, as (in modified form) at the beginning of the Office in the Prayer Book. This copy of the service is made particularly valuable and interesting by the fact that the words "Trinity church, Newton," are once interlined in this letter, and were written in a blank left for the name of the parish in which it was to be used, while the blanks in the date are filled out so as to read, "At Derby, this 21st day of November, A.D., 1799, and in the third year of our consecration." The writing is evidently in Bishop Jarvis's hand, who also signed the letter as "Abram. Bp. Con." As the date is at Derby, and but one day later than the adoption of the service, it would seem that this was the first occasion of the use of the Office, this very copy being the first one employed.

The service differs from that now in use in a few particulars. The first lesson is I. Chron. xxiv. 1-20. The junior warden is instructed to read the prefixed canon before the officiating priest reads the letter of induction and the senior warden presents the keys. No form of words is provided for use at the presentation of the Bible, Prayer Book, and Book of Canons. The anthem is pointed for chanting, each verse having the musical colon in the middle, while the mediation and the cadence are printed in italics. Dr. Smith had somewhat peculiar, if not original, ideas about Church music, which seem to have influenced him in his arrangement of this anthem, for it is not easy to see how to chant a verse thus pointed:

"O praise the Lord, laud ye the name of the Lord:—praise it O ye ser-vants of the Lord."

The verse, "Who is God over all, blessed forever more," is printed as to be said by the minister alone, and then by the people as a response. At the end of the "new inducted rector's supplication for himself," after the words "excellency of Thy holy Word," is the petition: "Grant me the help and comfort of all good men; and from wicked and unreasonable men, good Lord deliver thy servant who putteth his trust in Thee." Between the closing prayer of the service and the rubric relating to the sermon and the administration of the Eucharist is this rubric: "Then turning to the congregation, he shall read I. Cor. xii. 4.—There are diversities of gifts, etc.—v. 28 ending with the words 'thirdly teachers.' Or Eph. iv. 1 to 17." There is no provision for the bishop's performing the induction in person.

The following extract from the minutes of "A Convocation of the Episcopal Clergy of the State of Connecticut, holden at Derby on the 20th November, 1799," Bishop Jarvis presiding, and the Rev. Dr. William Smith being secretary, gives an account of the presentation and adoption of this Office of Induction:

"The secretary presented an Office of Induction for the consideration of this House.

"The Convocation resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Dr. Bowden in the chair, in order to examine the proposed Office, paragraph by paragraph.

"The chairman of the committee reported to the president of Convocation that the committee approved of the proposed office.

"Voted, that the proposed Office of Induction be adopted by this House, and that the thanks of the same be presented to Dr. Smith for the same, that it be printed without delay, and that the Bishop be desired to transmit a copy of the same to the several Bishops in the United States, and to the Standing Committees of those States in which there are no Bishops." S. HART.

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH ON THE CHURCH.—The Bishop of Peterborough (Dr. Magee) has made the following appeal:

"To Churchmen: Brethren, you who are devotedly attached to our Church, let that attachment be an increasingly, intelligent and religious attachment. Let Church and State be linked together in your mind, not as men join them over their cups, but as men join them in their prayers, in fervent and solemn entreaty that 'peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us.' Learn to value your Church, her rights and privileges, not because they are hers or yours, but because she holds them in sacred trust for the good of all the English people. Stand up for the defence of your Church, because you believe in your hearts and consciences that she is set for the defence of the Gospel in this realm of England. Love your Church for the principles which she inherits from our reformers and our martyrs; for the scriptural doctrines she has embraced in her Creeds and her Articles; for the battles she has fought in days past for truth against error, for liberty against despotism, for England against Rome. Love her for the good fight she is fighting now against the sin and suffering, the ignorance and the crime, that must be fought with and conquered if England is to be saved from an invasion infinitely worse than that of any foreign foe. Show your love to her, not only by upholding her on the hustings or in Parliament, but by helping her in the great work for which she is even now girding herself and going forth in the name and the power of her Lord and Master. Do this, and you need have no fear for the result. The Church of England has not yet become in this country 'as the salt that has lost its savor' that we should dread her being 'cast out and trodden under foot of men.' Never was there a time when she displayed more vigor, more zeal, more spiritual life and activity. Never was the Spirit of God seen more visibly, more mightily working in her, moving her to still greater and greater effort in the cause of Christ. Day by day we see her regaining lost ground and conquering new. She is to be seen standing, as she was ever wont to stand, in the forefront of the great Christian battle with the error and the unbelief of the day, opposing to the enemies of truth the shield of her spiritual creeds and ritual, and the sword of her learned and able theology; she is making her voice to be heard among the rich and the great, and winning them to enlist with her in works of piety and charity; she is sending out her ministers to tell the story of the Gospel of Peace among the poor and the ignorant and the outcast. All over the land she is being more and more felt and recognized as a great power for good and for God. Let her but continue steadily in this career of self-improvement and of noble and strenuous effort. Let her but go on as she has been doing of later years, increasing her efficiency, removing her defects, spreading wider and wider the boundary of the influence she wields, and of the blessings she conveys, and you will soon cease to need Church defence associations. The defence of the Church will be the good sense, the justice, the piety of the English people. The strong, deep current of a nation's reverent love will flow yet deeper and stronger in the old-accented channel; the blistering breeze of agitation may ripple its surface, it never shall have power to turn back the tide. From the country at large will come the demand for her preservation; from the throne, to which she has been ever so unwaveringly loyal; from the legislature, whose best ends and aims she is so faithfully promoting; from the learned and the great and the good she has trained and nurtured; from the poor to whom she has ministered; from the outcasts she has reclaimed; aye, and at last, even from many a generous and converted opponent, there will come, in answer to those who may demand her overthrow, one universal, loud, united, grateful voice—'Destroy her not; she is a blessing in the midst of us.'

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT OF MAGDALEN COLLEGE.—The Rev. Dr. Frederick Bulley,

President of Magdalen College, Oxford, died in Fairford on Thursday, September 3d. Dr. Bulley was the first president under the new statutes, having succeeded the late Dr. Routh in 1855. He took his degree at Oxford in 1829, and shortly afterwards became a Fellow of Magdalen. The Oxford University Herald says of him: "His strikingly handsome figure was for thirty years one of the chief features of the procession of 'Heads' at University sermon. It is remarkable that Magdalen should have lately lost several of its senior members. Mr. Henderson and General Rigaud died a little time ago. Mr. Hopkins, one of the best known of the Fellows, died but a few days since, at the age of fifty-three, and now the venerable president has followed the others to the grave."

SCOTLAND.

BISHOP WORDSWORTH'S OBJECTION TO THE MORAY ELECTION.—At the Annual Synod of the United Diocese of St. Andrew, Dunkeld, and Dunblane, the bishop, (Dr. Charles Wordsworth,) in his charge, gave his reasons for not approving Bishop Kelly's election, as follows:

It is with sincere regret I have to say that I cannot think that the course taken in the election of a coadjutor-bishop for the Diocese of Moray has been a wise one; consequently, I have been unable to concur with my episcopal brethren, in confirming that election: and for these reasons. The form of confirmation, prescribed by our canons, is in these terms:—"We, the undersigned bishops, approve and confirm the election," etc. Now, it is impossible for me to say that, in the present circumstances of our Church, I approve of that election. On the contrary, I strongly disapprove of it. Again, looking to the canonical form of the mandate issued to the electors, which states plainly what their duty is, and also what is the duty of bishops under the responsibility imposed upon them of either confirming or setting aside an election, I cannot think that "the peace and harmony and good government" (not of a single diocese, but) "of the whole Church"—the objects which the bishops are told to look to,—have been sufficiently consulted in the choice of Bishop Kelly. Knowing as I do, and as you must all know, both from public and private sources of information, the strong and very general feeling which exists that (however excellent the character and qualifications of the bishop himself, and, though I have not the pleasure of his personal acquaintance, I quite believe they are excellent) the time has fully come, when, as a general rule, some previous service in our Church, and some practical knowledge of its peculiar circumstances, cannot be dispensed with in the appointment of its chief officers, without the risk of serious injury to "its peace and harmony and good government." In short, the simple truth is, that these essential ends are not to be hoped for, if, not once only, but again and again, our most deserving and most experienced clergy are to see strangers brought in and put over their heads who, however estimable and meritorious in other respects, have done no service and acquired no experience in our Scottish Church. Moreover, it is now nearly forty years since the foundation of our Theological College at Glenalmond, and surely, after such an interval, our Church ought to be allowed to show that she has been able, at least in some instances, to train up bishops for herself. Otherwise, how can we expect that, with so many difficulties and discouragements to encounter, as all our clergy have to do more or less, promising young Scotsmen, the very instruments whom we most require, will come forward and cast in their lot for life with our sacred ministry!

GERMANY.

COST OF THE RESTORATION OF COLOGNE CATHEDRAL.—A statement has appeared in the Cologne Gazette of the cost of restoring and completing the great cathedral at Cologne, from 1823, when the work was resumed after a neglect of nearly three-quarters of a century, down to the 1st of April of the present year. The amount, including a contribution of 350,000 marks from the cathedral tax, was twenty-one millions of marks, or $5,250,000. This is quite independent of gifts of valuable objects for the religious services or the decoration of the building, and of a large number of private donations and funds for pious foundations.

INDIA.

THE ENGLISH CLERGY IN INDIA.—The Calcutta correspondent of the Guardian writes of the English clergy in India: "I have been much struck since my arrival in India with the amount of work done by the English clergy. I think I shall be right in saying that almost every chapel in this city is in charge of a church and parish which at home would be offered by a vicar and (at least) two assistant-clergies. I wish to hear this testimony, because I heard only recently of a community of sisters in England who tried to prevent a suitor from coming out with a chaplain's wife, because (so said they) the Indian chaplains are neither good Churchmen nor good workers. I confess that I could hardly believe that such advice had been given. Let me give you, to illustrate my assertion, the work done by a chaplain single-handed on Easter Day last: Morning Prayer and sermon in the jail at 6:30 A.M. (this includes playing the harmonium and leading the singing, as prisoners as a rule are not very musical); 8 A.M., celebration, with thirty-five communicants; 10:30 A.M., Morning Prayer, celebration and sermon, forty-six communicants; 6:30, Evensong and sermon. These last three services in the church of the parish. Four whole services, with three sermons, and the thermometer at ninety degrees in the shade, is not a bad day's work for one man, and this is but a specimen of what is done all over India—at least I can speak for the metropolitan diocese."

SWITZERLAND.

CONSECRATION OF AN ANGLICAN CHURCH.—On Sunday, August 23d, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol consecrated, under the commission of the Bishop of London, the new church of Christ church, Eggenhorn, Switzerland. The church, which has been vested in the Colonial and Continental Church Society, is 7,200 feet above the sea, and is mainly intended for the English and American visitors at the Mountain Hotel, the nearest village, Fisch, being nearly 4,000 feet below.

SOUTH AFRICA.

THE SCOTTISH SUPPORT OF AFRICAN MISSIONS.—The Quarterly Paper of the St. John's Mission, Kaffraria, states that the Scottish Board of Missions (Episcopal) has found the stipends of both the bishop (the Rt. Rev. Henry Callaway) and the coadjutor (the Rt. Rev. Bransby Lancelot Key) of the diocese, besides contributing a very large share toward the other expenses of the work. Progress is recorded among both natives and European immigrants. The Pondo part of the mission is becoming as hopeful as the rest.

VERMONT.

MANCHESTER—Zion Church, Factory Point.—Some new chancel chairs have been placed in this church, the gift of the children of the parish. A pretty hymn-tablet, presented to the parish as a memorial of a devoted communicant, was used for the first time on Sunday, September 13.

The Rev. Francis Gilliat of St. James's church, Arlington, has for a year and a half had charge of this parish very acceptably, and after faithful service has been permitted to withdraw at his own request.

By the authority of the bishop of the diocese, and at the request of the vestry, Mr. James C. Flanders of White River Junction, a candidate for Holy Orders, has taken charge of the parish, commencing his labors on Sunday, September 20. Mr. Flanders has been a successful teacher, and gives up a lucrative position at Holderness, N. H., to undertake this work. While teaching he has had charge of several mission stations, so that the work is not new to him.

RHODE ISLAND.

PROVIDENCE—Church of the Epiphany, Elmwood.—There was dedicated on Sunday, September 20th, in this church (the Rev. Henry Bassett, rector) one of the finest organs in New England. It was built by Jardine & Son, of New York, the makers of the organs in the Roman Catholic cathedral, and St. George's church and Dr. Hall's Presbyterian church, all in New York. There is no other Jardine organ in this part of New England, and those who have been admitted to examine and play on it are unanimous in the assertion that it has no equal in Providence. One of the great features of the instrument is the large number of metal pipes in lieu of the wooden ones ordinarily used. There are two manuals of fifty-six notes, and pedals of twenty-five notes. There are thirty-three stops. The Great Organ has five hundred and sixty pipes, the Swell Organ, five hundred pipes, and the pedals two hundred pipes. There are seven couplers and seven other mechanical accessories.

In a printed description of this organ prepared by Roosevelt, the well-known organ builder of New York, he says: "Its tone is good throughout, both as regards individual stops and the combined whole, which is powerful and brilliant without harshness. The speech of the diapason is round and full; that in the pedal organ being particularly ponderous and pervading. The bellows has inverted ribs; the swell organ is of full compass (not stopping at tenor C, as is commonly the case); the swell keyboard is of the overhanging type; the draw stop knobs are patent oblique faced, arranged in terraces at either side; and the whole instrument is well laid out and everything rendered easy of access."

To the above, written by a rival builder, may be added, that the open diapasons of this organ possesses the true "cathedral tone," being round, rich, powerful and sympathetic; and entirely free from the reedy, fuzzy tone so common in American church organs. The pipes of the Viol d'Amour and Viola di Gamba are all of the Bell Gamba type, and the tone is delicate and beautiful. The treble pipes of the stopped diapason are of the so-called chimney form, being much more expensive than the commonly used plugged wood pipes, and are more clear and ringing in tone. The trumpets are made from the same scales used by the celebrated French builders, and their tones are clear, prompt and grand. The chorus stops are smooth and brilliant without harshness, and the tone of the entire organ blends beautifully with voices. The opinion of disinterested experts who have examined this organ pronounce it second to none in this city, and in all it contains, as a whole, superior to any other they have heard.

The organ is supplied with wind by independent feeders operated by a Shriver hydraulic motor, attached directly to them, without the intervention of levers, crank-shafts, or any other medium, usually so prolific in squeaks and thumps; and is absolutely noiseless in its operations, and positively reliable in its action; advantages never yet attained in any other reciprocating water organ.

The case is rich in its simplicity and avoidance of all attempts at flagree work, the wood being of substantial black walnut, with a wainscoting of lighter hued wood in Gothic design. The pipes were painted in part by McPherson, of Boston, and finished by Mr. Barton, of Providence. The colors are subdued, the ornamentation very simple, yet just enough to relieve the pipes of stiffness. A private exhibition of the organ was given by Mr. L. T. Downes, on Friday, September 11th, who was especially pleased with the excellent tones of the instrument, and who pronounced its general features to be the best he had found in any organ of its size in this country.

At the formal dedication the sermon was preached by the Rev. G. H. Patterson, applying entirely to Church music, the writers and renowned interpreters, and at intervals during the delivery there were illustrations given by Mr. Downes and a choir of selected voices, who sang several of the old hymns.

HARTFORD—Meeting of the Society for the Increase of the Ministry.—The twenty-ninth annual meeting of this Society was held in Hartford on Wednesday, September 16th. The treasurer's report showed that the total receipts for the year had been $14,656.53. The ordinary expenditures of the year amounted to $12,338.25. The sum of $2,318.28 was restored to the contingent fund, and there is a balance to new account of $1,327.28, which includes $1,000 for investment. The report of the Executive Committee showed that the following legacies have been received: By the will of the late Edwin E. Curtis of Meriden, $1,000; of Mrs. Abby Harris Man, late of Providence, R. I., $500; of Mrs. Martha W. Starr of Watertown, $21.60. A bequest of $10,000 is also expected at an early day. The following officers and managers were chosen for the ensuing year: President, the Rt. Rev. John Williams; vice president, the Rt. Rev. B. H. Paddock; recording secretary, the Rev. Dr. T. R. Pynchon; corresponding secretary, the Rev. Elisha Whittlesey; treasurer, James Bolter. Managers: the Rt. Rev. F. D. Huntington, the Rev. Dr. A. B. Goodrich, the Rev. Dr. Thomas Gallaudet, the Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, the Rev. Dr. Francis Lobdell, the Rev. Dr. W. A. Snively, s. t. d., the Rev. George J. Magill, the Rev. Dr. H. W. Spaulding, the Rev. J. H. Watson, the Rev. Dr. E. H. Jewett, the Rev. S. O. Seymour, the Rev. Dr. Edmund Rowland, the Rev. A. T. Randall, the Hon. Elisha Johnson and John S. Blatchford.

GAZTON—Seabury Memorial.—At this place, under the monument commemorating the battle of Fort Griswold, in full view of the home of Bishop Seabury and of St. James's church, New London, where his remains lie buried, stands a beautiful chapel, erected in memorial of the life and labors of the first bishop in the United States. The position, size and appointments of this memorial chapel are of the most satisfactory character. The building was reared and finished by private munificence, and is free from every pecuniary incumbrance. It is, however, without a resident minister. The population of this attractive and growing village is five thousand, largely of New England origin, intelligence, and culture. During the rectorship of a recent incumbent an interested congregation attended the services. The chapel is still opened every Sunday by a temporary supply. There is a small Sunday-school, with teachers devoted to their work and scholars to their studies.

The former congregations can be again gathered, and in time greatly increased and permanently established, with the pastoral care now imperatively needed. The Diocesan Board of Missions cannot attempt, unaided, the supply of this want. It is obvious, however, that the Church cannot make that impression here that she would do were there a resident minister. The sum of one thousand dollars, at least, is needed to supply one. It is thought that, as Bishop Seabury first brought the episcopate to America, the maintenance of a clergyman at his memorial chapel for at least one year might be considered a matter of national Church concern. Contributions to this good purpose would gladly be received by the treasurer of the Diocesan Board of Missions.

NEW YORK—The Seaman's Mission.—All departments of this mission are in successful operation, the services being well attended. The congregation has already outgrown the Mission House at West and Houston streets, which was occupied for the first time last year.

The attendance of the Sunday-school is so great at times that some of the children have to be turned away. It is very much to be desired that the church and parsonage may be erected in the near future. The land occupied by two or three buildings fronting on Houston street, was some years ago bought for this purpose. Plans for a church to accommodate about three hundred people have been drawn. The estimated cost of the church is $30,000, and of this amount there is nearly $10,000 in hand. If the society had the additional $20,000 it would build forthwith, but being now free from debt does not purpose to incur any liabilities. The room below in the Mission House is now used for a reading room, which last month was patronized by more than a thousand sailors. The services are held in the room above, but on the completion of the church the upper room in the mission house will be turned into a reading room, while it is intended to turn the room below into a coffee house.

Services are held morning and afternoon by the missionary, the Rev. Thomas A. Hylsund. Immediately following the afternoon service the sailors are invited to remain, when the missionary makes a short address, as, also, calling upon others. He then asks any who wish for prayers or to take the temperance pledge to signify it by rising. A short prayer follows, this informal service being enlivened by the singing of one or two familiar hymns. Then comes a distribution of hymnals, Testaments and other books, these books being given for free distribution by a prominent layman of the church. In giving the total abstinence pledge, for three, six or twelve months, the missionary reads it aloud from a printed card, each person taking the pledge feeding it after him, sentence by sentence. Of the persons so taking the pledge, about half keep it.

At the Floating Chapel, at the foot of Pike street, services are conducted morning and afternoon, by the Rev. Robert J. Walker. Mr. Walker has been connected with the mission twenty-seven years. Like all the missionaries, he is allowed a vacation, but never takes one. At the afternoon service there is a distribution of books as in the case spoken of. The books are supplied by the same layman, and are in seventeen languages. On a recent Sunday the service was attended by a Slav, an Icelander, a Finn, four Spaniards, two colored men from the West Indies, and several Swedes, Danes and Norwegians. At the Mission House there is a reading room, at which also, the Missionary holds a temperance meeting each week. Its membership numbers five thousand, and the good accomplished has been very great.

At the Mission held in Coenties Slip the services are conducted morning and afternoon by the missionary, the Rev. Isaac Maguire. The services are held under a tent in summer, the congregations sometimes numbering two or three hundred. In winter they are held in the mission room at the corner of Coenties Slip and Water street. The shortened service adapted to the congregations have been used ever since the time of Bishop Wainright, who, indeed, used it for the first time. This is called the Mission at Large, and though the missionary labors under great difficulties, much good is known to be accomplished. As in the other cases, there is a free distribution of books, while the mission room also serves for a reading room. For the first time in thirteen years, the missionary this summer took a short vacation. The whole cost of carrying on all departments of this work was last year only $10,000.

NEW YORK—Church Temperance Society.—The Assistant-Bishop has written the following letter to be sent to each of the clergy of his diocese: "Permit me to remind you of the important work of the Church Temperance Society, and to ask that, if consistent with your views and engagements, at some service on Sunday, November 8th, you will, by a sermon or otherwise, call attention to the need of united effort, by means of the society and every other tried and approved agency to stay the scourge of the great and grievous moral pestilence of intemperance. If it were cholera or yellow fever that threatened us to-day the whole land would be on fire with efforts to arrest it; and yet this dread disease slays its millions for hundreds that perish in other ways. I pray that you may give us your help in confronting and checking it."

The Bishop of Pennsylvania has also addressed a letter saying he cordially approves of having sermons preached in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and authorizes the secretary of the society to say so. The Bishops of Connecticut and Albany have written with like effect.

It may be said in this connection that the Church Temperance Society and the National Temperance Society have invited Archdeacon Farrar to speak on temperance at Chickering Hall, on Thursday, October 29th. The Assistant-Bishop will preside. The Archdeacon will be in New York from October 23d to the 30th inclusive.

NEW YORK—Church of the Holy Cross.—Some additional particulars concerning the consecration of this church which were received too late for last week's issue, are here-with given. At 10 A. M., the appointed hour on Monday, September 14, the procession passed out of the robing-room into Fourth street, and from thence into Avenue C, from which it entered the church. The procession consisted of about twelve or fifteen clergymen, the assistant-bishop, the Bishop of Central New York, and the Bishop of Springfield. These were followed by the Sisters of St. John Baptist dressed in the habit of their order. The bishops, etc., on entering the church, were met by the wardens and vestry, and on passing up the central aisle took their seats as provided, and, with the large congregation present, nearly filled the church.

The service of consecration at once began, Mr. Folsam, a vestryman of the church, reading the instrument of donation. This was received by the assistant-bishop sitting in his chair, who then said the appointed prayers. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, rector of the church, and handed to the assistant-bishop, who laid it upon the altar.

Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Warren C. Hubbard, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Edmund D. Cooper, and the Rev. J. O. Davis.

The Communion Office was said by the assistant bishop, the Bishop of Springfield reading the Epistle, and the Bishop of Central New York the Gospel. The sermon, from St. John xii. 32, was preached by the Rev. Dr. G. H. Houghton.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Luke's Church.—The rector of this parish (the Rev. George R. Van De Water) has been during the summer in Garden City, actively engaged in promoting the interests of the cathedral schools, by the appointment of the bishop, and with a success which promises to make them soon self-supporting and flourishing. The services at St. Luke's have not been suspended, but have been sustained by the rector and his efficient assistants, the Rev. Messrs. Foster and Davis. The distinguished organist and choirmaster, Mr. S. Lasar, has been gaining needed rest in the White Mountains, but has now returned to duty, prepared to render the music, through the large surplised choir, more than ever beautiful and impressive.

The energies of the parish are now enlisted in effort to secure a new parish hall, to be called the Woolsey Memorial Building. Funds are steadily increasing for this purpose. With the view of promoting this object, the Women's Auxiliary of St. Luke's propose to open in the month of November a room in the present parish building, 515 Vanderbilt avenue, for the sale of fancy-plaid, and useful articles, cakes, preserves, etc., the proceeds of sales to be added to the funds in hand. It is intended to continue this enterprise through the season. In November a Church Mission is to be held at St. Luke's, some of the plans of which have been previously referred to in these columns. The effect of these special revival services, it is hoped, will so deepen the spiritual life of the congregation as to carry the entire parish and all its work and projects forward to a gratifying success. Every Sunday, after the first of October, a children's service, with a five minutes' suitable address, will be held. The choir will be composed of Sunday-school children, properly vested and in the stalls, the boys having been already well trained for this purpose by Miss Bolton. Honor scholars among the boys will take up the offerings. The entire service will occupy but twenty minutes, and will be followed by recitation and instruction in the Sunday school room for an hour. The carrying out of this plan will enable the children each Sunday to worship before the altar, and receive pulpit ministrations adapted to them.

The work of enlargement of St. Luke's chapel, on Bedford avenue, spoken of in THE CHURCHMAN at the time of its incipency, is still progressing, and will be completed by October 15th. The new chapel will be formally opened on Sunday, October 18th. It is believed that with this important addition, and every facility for a proper service, the success already attained in establishing worship in that quarter will be all that can be desired.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

DIOCESAN COUNCIL.—The forty-eighth annual council met in St. Peter's church, Geneva, (the Rev. Dr. James Rankine, rector,) on Tuesday, September 18. Morning Prayer was said at 10 A.M., and after a brief recess, the procession of the bishop preceded by the clergy, moved from the adjoining chapel, and entered the church repeating antiphonally, Psalm 123. The bishop then made a bidding prayer in which the pastor, Bishop DeLancey and the Bishop of Easton were specially mentioned, after which the bishop proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Dr. L. Van Bokkelen. The sermon was preached by the Rev. S. R. Fuller. The offerings were for the Hill Memorial Mission House in Athens, Greece.

The council organized by the re-election of the Rev. T. M. Bishop as secretary.

After a recess, the council reassembled at 3 P.M. The bishop presented the Rev. Dr. James A. Bolles, who was present at the primary convocation of the old diocese of Western New York. Dr. Bolles was received by the council standing, and conducted to a seat by the president.

The report of the Standing Committee was read by the secretary, the Rev. C. W. Hayes.

The bishop then read his annual address. In the evening the bishop read his charge to the clergy, which has already appeared in THE CHURCHMAN.

[NOTE.—Owing to the non-arrival of our report, the above is all we are able to give of the proceedings of the council.]

ATON SPRINGS—Zion Church.—During the past summer, in this delightful resort, this parish (the Rev. Dr. H. F. Darnell, rector,) has not been inactive, though somewhat fewer visitors than usual have attended the excellent sanitarium and hotels. Several most successful garden parties have been held in the grounds of the different Church families, and the proceeds of the annual fair given by the Ladies' Aid Society and the Guild were very satisfactory. The results of the season's efforts may be set down at about $400.

During the rectorship of Dr. Darnell the congregations, morning and evening, have largely increased, the Sunday-school has been restored to its former efficiency, the rectory has been renovated and occupied by the rector, after a lapse of some thirteen years, and the finances of the parish have been placed in a sound condition. It is a matter of congratulation that this parish, organized about sixty-five years ago, and this church, the pioneer in all this district, should be showing so much vitality and be once more enjoying the privilege of regular ministrations and a permanent rectorship.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

PATERSON—St. Paul's Church.—A new and beautiful window has just been added to those already in this church (the Rev. E. B. Russell, rector) and is placed in the conventional north side of the chancel. It is given by the Hon. William Prall, a vestryman of the parish, as a memorial to his wife, Lillian Porter Clapp, and their daughter Lillian, who only survived her mother something over a year. Mrs. Prall was a young and beautiful woman, of great nobility of character, unaffected religious devotion, and widely beloved. Her unexpected death was deeply felt by all who knew her. At her funeral, on the Feast of the Annunciation, in 1884, and which was preceded by a celebration of the Holy Communion, the altar was vested in white and the chancel filled with rare flowers and a profusion of lilies, in honor both of the holy day and in correspondence to her name.

In the exquisite window to her memory and that of her little girl, the scene of the Annunciation is represented, and the borders are composed of lilies. The glass, made by J. & R. Lamb, is very rich in color and very delicate in treatment. The faces of the angel and St. Mary are beautifully done. The general effect of the window is like that of the best medieval specimens, with the richness of color found in the old early English work. It forms one more of the costly memorials, which are filling the old parish church of Paterson with lovely and affectionate tribute to those at rest in Paradise.

PHILADELPHIA—The Northwest Convocation of Philadelphia.—In this convocation a different system prevails from that of some of the others. The business meetings are held on the third Tuesdays of September, January and May, while a missionary meeting is held once a month, from October to June inclusive, at the various churches in rotation. That for September was held on the afternoon of the 25th, at the Church of the Epiphany. The Committee on Claims to Seats presented a report, in which they stated that the question was before them of the eligibility of a member to a seat in this convocation who was at the same time a member of another, whereupon it was resolved that in the opinion of this convocation no person being a member of another of the convocations can at the same time be a member of this convocation.

In the report of the rector of the French Church of St. Sauveur it was stated that 798 persons are now inscribed on its register; that it is really a mission to the French-speaking people, and not a parish, as many suppose. It deals with a floating population, many of whom are scattered throughout the land. Roman ecclesiastics frequently seek counsel and guidance from the Rev. Dr. Miel, the rector. Fourteen have already joined us, either in their ministerial office or as communicants, and several are now preparing to do the same. Three Armenians had their names entered on the Sunday before the meeting of the convocation.

The rector of St. Ambrose reports much to encourage him in his work. He has a large choir. A claim against the church has recently been paid. He has just secured additional teachers for his Sunday-school, and the Young Men's Guild are taking steps to put up a guild hall. If the ground upon which the church stands could be sold and the church placed in a more eligible situation, nothing would prevent the very rapid advance of this parish, as the city is building up very quickly in its vicinity.

PHILADELPHIA—Convocation of Germantown.—The regular meeting of this convocation was held in St. Mark's church, Frankford, (the Rev. E. C. Booth, rector,) on Tuesday, September 15th. Morning Prayer was said by the rector, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. R. E. Dennison, J. De Wolfe Perry, and J. Thompson Carpenter. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Samuel Uppjohn. At the business meeting in the afternoon the convocation authorized the president to draw $150 for the maintenance of the services at the Centreville Mission. Appropriations for the already existing missions were continued upon the existing basis. By amendment to the by-laws the stated meetings were fixed for the third Tuesdays in October, January, April and May. The assistant-secretary, the Rev. R. Bowden Shepherd, having removed from the bounds of the convocation, tendered his resignation, and in his stead the Rev. J. T. Carpenter was elected. In the evening a missionary meeting was held, at which addresses were made by the missionaries within the convocation.

PHILADELPHIA—The Divinity School.—The exercises of the Trinity Term of the Divinity School began on Friday afternoon, September 17, in the temporary chapel, where, after Evening Prayer by the Rev. Messrs. Peters and Bartlett, a most admirable sermon was delivered to the students, clergy and others, on "The True Preparation for the Ministry," by the Rev. Dr. J. F. Garrison, in which he set forth the importance of having a proper understanding of their duties and obligations as clergymen, that they would "so minister the doctrine and sacraments, and the discipline of Christ as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Church hath received the same." He urged that we have a far higher view of the Church and her work than we have, not the mere tinsel of vestments or the mere performance of a service, but the presentation of her as the divinely appointed means of lifting up humanity. He urged deep, broad and loyal learning, and above all faithful and true study of the Holy Scriptures. It was a masterly production of a master mind, and if it is published and broadly circulated it will be productive of untold good, and give to those who read it a far truer conception of the work of the ministry in Christ's kingdom, the Church.

The last year has fully realized what was hoped to be accomplished in for the school. The opening sermon was but one of the few features that have been proposed, and which it is hoped will soon be carried out, such as lectures by leading clergymen and laymen upon such topics as will help to supplement the regular course. By the efforts which are so earnestly being put forth it will soon become better known, and receive the confidence and support of the Church as it richly deserves. It begins the new year with all the classes larger than last year, though there is room for more in its finely equipped hall and dormitories. The new chapel is rapidly approaching completion, and will, when finished, add very much to the school's efficiency. A post-graduate year has been provided for, which will be of much benefit to those recent graduates who can find time to avail themselves of its privileges.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—An Interesting Collection.—For twenty-two years a Churchman of this city has been collecting autograph letters having an historical value, and is now the possessor of what is undoubtedly the most valuable private collection in the country. One hundred and thirty-nine bishops, and three or four hundred presbyters and deacons are represented. The letters of the bishops include a letter of Bishop Seabury, dated October 26, 1792, and a letter of Bishop Ferguson written in the present year. There are thirteen letters of Bishop White, (one of them a twelve-page document on the Revision of the Prayer Book, republished in THE CHURCHMAN of December 27, 1884.) several of Bishop Provoost, (one the certificate that he had admitted Philander Chase to deacon's orders, a fine document, with pendent seal, dated June 10, 1798.) several of Bishops Claggett, Benjamin Moore, Parker, Hobart, Griswold, Dehon, Kemp, Coes, Richard Channing Moore, Bowen, Philander Chase, Ravenscroft, Meade, B. T. Onderdonk, Hopkins, McIlvaine, Otey, G. W. Doane and Polk. There are over fifty letters of Bishop Whittingham and a number of Bishop Green, including one on non-episcopal ministrations, several from Bishop Payne, one of them in eight folio pages giving an account of an inscription among the natives in Africa, when the missionaries were compelled to take refuge in vessels. All, or nearly all the late bishops, are represented in the collection. Besides this array of patiently collected original history, Mr. Hollinson Colburn possesses about one hundred portraits of bishops, engraved or photographed. In addition to these there are autograph letters of Archbishops of Canterbury, York, and Dublin, Bishops of London and other English sees, and letters of such distinguished clergy as Drs. Samuel Farmer, Jarvis, Harry and William Crowell, F. L. Hawks, John Gardair, T. W. Coit, William Farquhar Hook, and others too numerous to mention.

SHARPSBURG.—Consecration of St. Paul's Church.—This church (the Rev. Henry Edwards, priest in charge), was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese on Wednesday, September 17. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. W. Nott. A large number of clergy were present from this and the adjoining counties in Maryland and West Virginia.

The cornerstone of St. Paul's church was laid in October, 1871, and it has just been completed. The present church stands on the site of the old church that was destroyed during the late war. It is of Gothic architecture, and will seat about two hundred persons. In the bell tower hangs a bell that was imported from England for the use of the old church in 1820.

EASTON.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP.—The Right Rev. Henry Champlin Lay, D.D., LL.D., first Bishop of Easton, died at the Church Home, in Baltimore, Md., on the afternoon of Thursday, September 17th, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and the twenty-sixth year of his episcopate. His illness began during the last spring while he was delivering a course of lectures before the General Theological Seminary, and the cause of his death was a dropsical affection, complicated with heart disease.

Bishop Lay was born in Richmond, Va., December 6, 1823. He was graduated from the University of Virginia in 1842, and from the Theological Seminary of Virginia in 1846. He was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Meade July 10, 1846, and served six months of his diaconate in Emmanuel church, Lynnhaven parish, Va. In 1847 he took charge of the Church of the Nativity, Huntsville, Ala., where he was advanced to the priesthood July 12, 1848, by Bishop Cobbs, and became rector of the parish, which position he retained until his consecration to the episcopate. He received the degree of Doctor in Divinity from Hobart College in 1857, and that of Doctor of Sacred Theology from the University of Virginia. He was a member of the House of Deputies from 1850 to 1859.

Dr. Lay was consecrated Missionary Bishop of the Southwest during the General Convention in Richmond, Va., on October 23, 1859, by Bishop Meade, assisted by Bishops McIlvaine, Polk, De Lancey, Whittingham, Elliott, Cobbs and Atkinson. In 1861 he resigned the portion of his jurisdiction lying outside of Arkansas, but the resignation was not acted upon. During the Civil War, in November, 1862, the Diocese of Arkansas elected him its diocesan, but the election was not accepted until 1864. During the war he acted as a general chaplain to the Confederate forces in Georgia and Tennessee.

Bishop Lay's services in 1865 will never be forgotten. He attended the General Convention in Philadelphia as Missionary Bishop of the Southwest, and it was largely owing to his efforts among his Southern brethren, seconded by those of Bishop Atkinson, that the return of the Southern bishops and their dioceses to the General Convention, at the time and in the spirit in which the return was effected, was brought about. At this convention Bishop Lay's title was changed to that of Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and Parts Adjacent. In 1867 he was one of the bishops attending the Lambeth Conference in England, and in common with the other American bishops received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from the University of Cambridge.

In 1868 the Diocese of Maryland was divided, and a new diocese created, formed of all that portion of the State lying east of the Chesapeake Bay and the Susquehanna River. The new diocese adopted the name of Easton, and on April 1, 1869, Bishop Lay was elected diocesan, and was translated to his new field.

In his new diocese Bishop Lay's work has been very laborious, and faithfully attended to so long as his health permitted. For some time past his health has precluded his giving the diocese the careful attention he was accustomed to bestow on it, and this fact added much to the distress of his illness. A few weeks ago he appointed the Standing Committee as the Ecclesiastical Authority, in order that it might provide episcopal ministrations for the diocese.

Bishop Lay was universally respected and generally beloved for his nobleness of character and the sweetness of his disposition. His labors will be felt throughout the whole Church, as a defender of Catholic Truth, as a true Apostle, and as a true Christian man.

Bishop Lay's writings were numerous. Among his sermons may be mentioned that on "The Anglican Church and her Longings after Unity," that at the Centennial of the Diocese of Maryland, and that before the Provincial Synod of Canada, in 1883. Among his miscellaneous writings are "Letters to a Man be widened among many Counsellors," "Studies in the Church," "Tracts for Missionary Use," "The Lord and His Basket," "Ready and Desirous," published in THE CHURCHMAN in 1873, and recently in book form, and "The Return of the Southern Bishops," published in THE CHURCHMAN in 1883. His last work was "The Quiet Corner," published in these columns, which he continued up to the time of his death, and the last number of which appeared in THE CHURCHMAN of September 19th.

Bishop Lay married, in 1847, a niece of the late Bishop Atkinson, and leaves, besides his widow, three sons and one daughter, Henry Champlin, a civil engineer in Deaver, Colorado, the Rev. George S., a clergyman in deacon's orders, Beirne, and Louisa.

INDIANA.

DIOCESAN ITEMS.—The diocesan paper gives, among others, the following interesting parochial items:

LAFAYETTE.—St. John's Church.—The memorial altar recently placed in the chancel of St. John's church, presented by Mrs. Mary L. Curtis, in memory of her daughter, Mrs. Matie Curtis Frey, who died so young and so early after her marriage, is very beautiful. It is greatly admired by all who see it. The work was done by R. Geisler of New York City, except the three brass panels in the frontal which are three handsome pieces of hammered brass, by Miss Jessie Levering, of this place. This parish has also just put in a beautifully carved eagle lectern of black walnut, the gift of Miss Levering; also a handsome and most convenient preaching desk, the gift of the Young Ladies' Guild, which, under the management of Mrs. George B. Williams, is doing good work and prospering. Both of these pieces of furniture are from Geissler. The singing in this church has become now quite an attraction. The music is churchly and well rendered. Plans for new church and general improvement of the building have been adopted.

MICHIGAN CITY—Trinity Church.—A parish school was opened August 31st, with upwards of sixty pupils. It consists of kindergartens, intermediate and advanced departments, and has three teachers. The tuition fees will pay all current expenses, thus making the furnishing of the school the only outlay.

NEW CASTLE—St. James's Church.—The new St. James's church building has been used for service every Sunday since the formal opening. This has been done by the help of lay readers, Mr. Edward Olcott, of Muncie, and Mr. James A. Duthie, of Indianapolis, having rendered acceptable service. The Sunday-school numbers over forty scholars. The foot, for many years in the bishop's church, in Minneapolis, was used for the first time on August 24. Money has been raised for the purchase of a bell.

On August 1st, the Rev. W. D. Engle held a service in the Christian church, at Cadiz; and on the 15th, one in the school house at Kenard, a new and growing town of about one hundred and fifty inhabitants, eight miles west of New Castle, in which there is no church building and no regular service of any kind. Quite a delegation from New Castle attended this service. The missionary has another appointment there for September 5th. August 29th, he also held a first service at Wilkinson, thirteen miles west of New Castle, a place of three hundred inhabitants, without church building or regular service by any one. The New Castle people again assisted, and did much to make a good impression by the proper rendering of the service.

FOND DU LAC.

EPISCOPAL VISITATIONS—Ashland.—August 30, the Thirtieth Sunday after Trinity, the bishop visited St. Andrew's Mission, the Rev. Edward B. St. George in charge. In the morning the bishop celebrated the Holy Communion, preached, and, at the request of the missionary, baptized two children. Later in the day he made a brief address to the children. The new church is inclosed, and promises to be a commodious and comely building. It is a little larger than demanded by the needs of the present congregation. But Ashland grows so rapidly that it is likely that soon the church will be found too small, rather than too spacious. It is not always easy to forecast the future of a Western city, but the signs are that Ashland will be of much commercial and manufacturing importance, and possess many inhabitants. Hard work and liberal measures now may produce good results of the greatest spiritual value in the future.

Bayfield.—The bishop, with the Rev. Mr. St. George, crossed Chequamegon Bay after the service at Ashland, arriving at Bayfield in good time for Evening Prayer. The missionary said the prayers, the bishop reading the Lessons and preaching. The church was crowded, and the service spirited. Bayfield is not "booming" like Ashland, but is as exquisitely beautiful and pleasant as ever. Two Swedish services have lately been held in the church, the Swedish forms being used by a Swedish reader. It is hoped that this proper courtesy may lead on to the closer relations recommended by the Archbishop of Upsala.—Diocean Paper.

IOWA.

MISSION REPORTS.—The dean of the Northern Deanery, in compliance with the action of the Board of Missions, has issued a form for the quarterly reports of the diocesan missionaries, comprehending the statistics of baptisms, changes in the communicant list, particulars of Sunday-school and general mission work, and adding pertinent queries as to the payment of the diocesan dues, the representation of the mission in the diocesan schools and other matters of a general interest. These reports, carefully filled out and sent to the secretary, will be forwarded to the bishop, who will thus have a constant oversight of the whole mission field.

DAVENPORT—St. Katharine's Hall.—The Dubuque Herald has the following appreciative notice of this excellent diocesan school:

"The educational institutions of Iowa, aside from her excellent common school system, stand in equal rank with those of the older States, the matter of age alone excepted, and as time goes by they are rapidly elevating themselves to a first-class grade in all respects. The boys of Iowa, who have an ambition to push beyond the limits afforded by the public schools, have been pretty well provided for. The girls of the State, however, have not been so well looked after, except in the institutions affording educational facilities. But even this want is being rapidly supplied. Among the institutions lately established and devoted to girls alone, which promise well, is St. Katharine's Hall, at Davenport, which was opened last year by Bishop Perry, of the Episcopal Church. It has jumped at once into immediate success, so much so that at the end of the first year it has been necessary to build a larger addition that will more than double its accommodations. The principal of the school is Miss Rice, who has been so popular at Fairbault, and its active business manager is Mr. N. P. Richardson, a brother-in-law of Bishop Perry. Those who have examined the school closely are loud in commendation, declaring it to be equal to the best of the eastern schools. Its advantages are many, its drawbacks none, so far as heard from. It is a school of which Iowa will hear more one of these days."

KANSAS.

MIDLOTHIAN—Mission.—Several years ago a number of families came from Peoria County, Illinois, and settled in Harper County, in this State. They have since been joined by some English people. They were all Church-people, but, as they started out upon new lands and with but little means, they were not able to sustain regular Church services among them. For a short time they were favored by visits from the Rev. J. S. Chamberlain, who was sent there by the bishop. There are a number of very interesting children growing up in the settlement. The people have been anxious for services and a place of worship, but did not feel able to build a church and sustain a minister. They have had some money laid aside to help them to build, and have received some gifts from England. Last year they determined to build according to the means on hand and their ability to give. They called on a missionary (the Rev. P. A. Johnson) to visit them, and desired him to reside in the vicinity, teach the children on Sunday and hold regular services, and they purpose giving all that they are able to give.

The church building has recently been enclosed. It is well and tastefully built. Great care has been taken about expense, and thus far everything is paid for. An organ has been lent until it can be paid for. A stove, plastering and seats are still needed. In this church services and Sunday-school have been held for several weeks.

The church is situated on a prairie, near where most of the people live. It is a monument of their zeal and good will. Persons desiring to aid this purely missionary enterprise can send contributions to the bishop of the diocese, or to the missionary.

COLORADO.

DENVER—Emmanuel Church.—This church was built in 1876, and has just paid off the last of its debt. The congregation is very small and has labored efficiently to master the troublesome problem of liquidating the debt that has weighed upon the parish. This successful clearing of incumbrances is largely due to the efforts of the ladies, who have been indefatigable in the work. The last cent of the debt was paid off on Saturday, August 29th, and the next day the gratifying fact was announced to the congregation.

The late rector, the Rev. C. E. Dandridge, resigned in June, and from that time, until the coming of the present rector, (the Rev. A. B. Hunter,) Mr. A. Dupont Parker acted as lay reader. The new rector was given a reception on Tuesday, September 8th, and earnestly welcomed by the congregation. Mr. Hunter will be formally instituted by the bishop on the first Sunday in October. The prospects of the parish now appear very promising.

ANNUAL CONVOCATION.—On Sunday, August 23d, the fifth annual convocation met in St. James's church, Bozeman. Two morning services were held: Morning Prayer at 9:30, Holy Communion, with ordination, at 11. At the second service the Rev. Wm. Horsfall preached the convocation sermon, and the bishop advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Hector E. Clowes, deacon. At 8 P. M. Evening Prayer was said, and the bishop delivered his annual address.

On Monday, after Morning Prayer, the convocation was organized for business, eight clergymen being present, with lay representatives from one mission. The reports of officers and committees were presented, and such action taken as seemed necessary. These are all interesting and important papers, and very suggestive. The Committee on the Missionary Enrolment Plan stated their proposed scheme of action, and it was heartily endorsed by the convocation.

Monday evening a short missionary service was held, the report for the Woman's Auxiliary was read, and brief addresses made. The convocation then adjourned.

In his annual address the bishop made the following general review of the work of the year:

"It is well to take in brief review the general aspect of the whole field. In that way we shall be able to see what progress we are making. The result will not prove disheartening. In one place there will be increase; in another we stand still; and in a third we seem to go backward. It must be so always.

"It has been a hard year financially; and financial depression affects Church enterprises. But on the whole, there has been improvement. We have been eleven workmen, including the bishop. Services have been maintained with more or less regularity in twenty-six places, and occasional ministrations have reached eighteen more. No churches have been built, but some debts have been paid and some improvement in Church property accomplished. The remnants of debt on the churches in Butte, Benton and Miles City have been extinguished. The rectory debt in Helena has been paid, and that in Boseman reduced from a thousand to three hundred dollars. In Livingston, a small building has been purchased and fitted up into a neat chapel. The churches in Helena, Butte, Dillon, Benton and Miles have been improved. In all cases, except-one, the money to pay for the improvements has been raised before they were made. I wish this might always be the case. The parish schools in Helena and Miles have done good work and have been carried on without expense to the Church. St. Peter's Hospital, in Helena, has proved a useful institution, and has progressed so far that it seems certain to become a permanent agency in our work. The amount contributed for domestic missions is probably more than twice as large as we have ever given before. From this summary I gather courage for the future, while I am thankful for the past. In every place the women are organized for work and are working with a will. The clergy find in them their most helpful encouragement. It must be that as the years pass, the number of those willing workers will increase and results will multiply before our eyes."

SCOTLAND AND AMERICA.

The following resolution has been sent by the Bishop of Aberdeen to the Bishop of Connecticut:

Extract from the minutes of the Annual Synod of the United Diocese of Aberdeen and Orkney, held in St. Andrew's church, Aberdeen, on Thursday, August 27, 1885.

"That this synod, while rejoicing in the recent happy meeting with our brethren of the American Church, at the celebration of the Seabury Centenary, trusts that such happy meetings will be less rare in the future, and that our Church will respond readily to the evident desire of the American Church for a more frequent interchange of visits between American and Scottish Churchmen."

ALEX. HANPER, Synod Clerk.

St. Mary's, Inverness, August 29, 1885.

BAPTISM in the Greek Church generally takes place at home. The font is filled with warm water, and the priest takes the child, which is nude, and plunges it three times in the water. He then anoints the eyes, ears, hands, and feet with sacred oil, and a sort of ointment out of a silver box, and cuts three little bits of hair from the head. The priest finally places round the child's neck a little gold chain, from which is suspended a date cross, inscribed with the name and the dates of birth and baptism, and then a tonic which has been blessed is put upon it.

MRS. MARY RICHMOND ADAIR.

Entered into her rest, Mrs. MARY RICHMOND ADAIR, late of New Brunswick, N. J. We laid in the beautiful Cemetery of Christ church, under the shadow of the cross, familiar to all, in the 67th year of her age, the remains of one to whom Providence had granted a long and useful life.

Born in the year 1800, she had seen many changes in her pilgrimage of nearly eighty-six years. She was, as a venerable bishop of the Church said, who knew and admired her, "a lady of the widest time." Inheriting her strict Church principles from a long line of English ancestry, she passed nine years of her life in the "mission" school of Miss Hay's boarding school, "one of the most renowned in this country. Granted the privilege of planting every tree, and gifted with rare intellectual powers, she found her sphere in the domestic circle, and made her earthly abode "her home." A good wife, a devoted mother, earnest in prayer and good works, her life flowed on, calm, even, and uneventful, full of sweet amenities, and the charity "that thinketh no evil," self-denying, ever considerate of the health and welfare of others, ready at all times to give and forgive, her homely virtues brought her many friends. Her Heavenly Father, "In His wise providence," thought fit to cloud her last days with heavy shadows, and she became gradually blind. None but those nearest and dearest to her knew how many months, say years, of mental torture and agony of prayer were needed to bring her mind to such a state of resignation which made her countenance so beautiful. She bore her heavy trial with so much fortitude and cheerfulness, that one almost forgot to pity her. She was a consistent, cheerful Christian. In our Father's house are many mansions, God grant a mansion to our friend, one whose light perpetual may shine upon her."

JAMES GOODLOE BOWMAN.

Entered into rest at Brownsville, Pa., September 1st, 1885, JAMES GOODLOE, eldest son of Nelson B. Bowman, in the 74th year of his age.

In the death of the above named his family has lost a loving and dutiful son, a kind and affectionate brother, his association a true friend and amiable companion; the community a good and patriotic citizen. Although his illness was of long duration, he bore the sufferings with that fortitude and heroism which only the true Christian can show. He was a lover of the good, the true, and the beautiful. In manners courteous, and though his earthly pilgrimage was short, he left behind him innumerable friends, and we believe no enemies. Let us trust that although the tomb has closed within its precincts a noble and true man, yet his noble and his deeds have created such ties of friendship with the living, that his memory will be a lasting monument to the living. Let us know him. Let us know him. "For every deep sorrow was an Adwayer pilgrim A blessing is given when we cry heaven"

Who waits at the gate of the far away city When the tides under the laden, the worn, and the weary. To that happy land."

IN MEMORY OF THE REV. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D.D.

Immediately after the impressive services at the funeral of the Rev. Dr. Tyng, on September 5th, in St. George's church, were concluded, the clergy in attendance, to the number of more than a hundred, assembled at the invitation of the assistant bishop of New York in the chapel adjoining the church.

Bishop Henry C. Potter took the chair, the Presiding Bishop, the Rev. Dr. Tracy, on September 5th, in St. George's church, were concluded, the clergy in attendance, to the number of more than a hundred, assembled at the invitation of the assistant bishop of New York in the chapel adjoining the church. Bishop Henry C. Potter took the chair, the Presiding Bishop, the Rev. Dr. Tracy, on September 5th, in St. George's church, were concluded, the clergy in attendance, to the number of more than a hundred, assembled at the invitation of the assistant bishop of New York in the chapel adjoining the church.

It was then decided that a committee be appointed to embody the sentiments of the meeting in an appropriate minute, and to convey the same to the family of the deceased, and through the Church papers to his many friends.

At the request of the meeting the chair appointed the following: The Rev. H. Dyer, D.D., chairman, and the Rev. Dr. William F. Morgan, William S. Eberhardt, Theodora A. Eaton, and George D. Wildes, and the Rev. Messrs. C. W. Bolton, G. Lewis Platt, and the Rev. Dr. Tracy, as members. The committee subsequently prepared the following:

MINUTE.

In the ordering of Divine Providence the revered and venerated Stephen H. Tyng, D.D., departed this life on Thursday night, September 3d, 1885. He had reached the advanced age of seventy-two years, six months, and three days. His work was done; at the hour of midnight the Bridegroom came, and he was ready for his many friends.

Dr. Tyng was born March 1st, 1800, in Newburyport, Mass. At an early age he graduated from Harvard University, and for a brief period was engaged in business in Boston. While thus employed there came to him religious convictions so deep and strong that he felt impelled to give up his worldly career. He was converted, and he was at once called: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" And the answer was: "Follow me." He was baptized in flesh and blood, but from that day forth consecrated himself to the service of God. He had been bought with a price, and was no longer his own.

While pursuing his studies under Bishop Griswold, preparatory to Holy Orders, he made himself especially useful in such missionary work as a layman could do. Upon his ordination he entered at once on the duties of his sacred calling. For several years he was in charge of the parishes of Georgetown and Georgetown, D. C. He often said he learned to preach the Gospel widely in his country parishes in Maryland, where a majority of his parishioners were colored people, and quite ignorant. He considered this experience as of the greatest benefit to him in all his subsequent ministry. He was ever ready to state the truth plainly and with much simplicity. Subsequently he removed to Philadelphia, where his first charge was St. Paul's, which was the church of the Epiphany. It was at this period that his fame as a preacher became so great. At the Epiphany, a new parish was organized, and a very large congregation, the largest Episcopal congregation in the city. The Sunday-school and Bible classes were exceptionally useful. His ministry in Philadelphia was a decided success.

In 1845 Dr. Tyng was called to succeed the Rev. Dr. Mitchell in the charge of St. George's, New York. Here he labored for more than the third of a century with unflagging zeal and energy and with remarkable success. He was ever ready to overflow, and his Sunday school and Bible classes numbered nearly two thousand children and young people. His church was a shining light and a tower of strength. It was indeed a great power in the Church and in the land.

By reason of broken health and the infirmities of age, he retired in 1878 from the active charge of the church, but continued his connection as rector emeritus to the end of his life.

In studying the life and character of such a man there are many features which attract attention, and which are worthy of special notice. His gifts, his almost matchless eloquence and power as a speaker and preacher, there was an supreme devotion to his duty, and a readiness to sacrifice his life for the truth, these were his chief characteristics. His attention from this one great purpose of his life. His reading, his thinking, his studies of every kind were directed to the glory of God and the salvation of his people was ever upon his heart. To them he gave his time and his concentrated energies. He knew and cared for the poor, the sick, and the sorrowing. His heart was ever ready to sympathize and struggling ones in all classes. These traits drew his people to him and bound them together in the most intimate and interesting ties, and gave him great influence over them.

Then again, Dr. Tyng had very clear and distinct views and the opinions of his own mind. These truths, as he understood them, he set forth with great boldness and plainness. The Divinity of Christ, the atonement, redemption and salvation through Christ, the holiness and the glory of God were his constant themes. He never tired of preaching Christ and Him crucified. Such like character and life were his chief characteristics, and mightily in winning souls to Christ. While differing from many of his brethren upon theological and ecclesiastical questions, and from many of his own views, yet he ever retained the cordial respect and command of his admiral on all classes of his people.

Such was the man, the minister of Christ, to whom we would pay this, our affectionate tribute of respect and love. We would say, as he himself said of one of our old: "There is a prince and a great man fallen in Israel." The death of such a man rarely occurs in a church, and he is a remarkable figure. He has passed forever away from our sight, but his example and memory remain. May they inspire us to follow him as he followed Christ.

To his stricken, sorrowing family and mourning friends our deepest and tenderest sympathy. May the God of all grace have them in His holy keeping.

THE REV. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D. D.
At a meeting of the Vestry of St. George's church, held September 5, 1865, senior Ward David Dow, Esq., announced the death of the Rev. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D. D., rector of the church, and greatly affected by the fact that the following minute be entered upon the records of this Vestry, and published in the Church Journal:

"The presence of God was called to mourn the departure from this world of the Rev. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D. D., long the honored and greatly loved pastor and rector of this church. He was taken to his rest on Thursday night, September 3, at the advanced age of 84 years, 3 months and 3 days. At the close of midnight he fell asleep in Jesus and was not, for God took him."

Dr. Tyng's ministry in this city commenced in 1827, when he was called to succeed the venerated Dr. Minor, as the rector of St. George's church. The church building was then in Beekman street, and consequently a new site was obtained on Broadway square and Sixteenth street, where a very large and imposing building was erected. His untiring labors, his untiring care and labors of the rector were very great. It was a venture of faith. The new church was built by subscription, and the subscription was not without much delay. But Dr. Tyng was equal to the emergency. His indomitable energy and untiring labors soon procured the completion of the administrative ability—and aided by a united vestry—removed all doubts and difficulties, and rapidly carried the matter forward to a complete close. In a brief period the great church was full of overflowing, and the Sunday school building was erected. The vestry and scholars of the metropolitan Sunday-schools were established, and two chapels, one in East Nineteenth street, and one in the city, were built. His labors were of the most extensive and noble character. His services were held. This rapidly-growing work was under the supervision of Dr. Tyng, and with all its details he kept his hands in it. His example inspired every important movement. The result was, in a few years, St. George's had the largest congregation, the greatest number of children and youth under Sunday-school and Bible class instruction of any church in the city, if not in the country, and the most prominent foremost in all benevolent and Christian work. The contributions to missionary and other charitable objects were unusually numerous. From this portion of the city were under his the legitimate fruits of the message and teachings the people received from his rector.

As a pastor, Dr. Tyng was unceasing and untiring in his labors. Personal convenience or comfort never stood in the way of his ministerial duties, and all who needed his service. Among the poor he was always warmly welcomed visitor. They felt he was their friend and helper. With the children and youth he was a special favorite, for he entered most fully into their thoughts and feelings, and identified himself with their interests. From this portion of his people he had very large additions to the communion of his Church. In a word among all classes, the people of the great city were under his most cordially welcomed and his ministrations were gratefully received and most highly prized.

His earnest and effective advocacy of their claims on public occasions. The announcement of his name as a speaker was sure to draw a crowd. As a preacher of the Gospel he had few equals in his day. His views were distinctly evangelic, and he never failed to preach Christ and Him crucified as the only hope of a lost world. He was clear and emphatic in his presentation of the truth, and his ministry was greatly honored of God, and through the instrumentality of his labors, the souls of many were brought to the comforts and joys of His great salvation.

Such briefly was the man, the preacher and the man of God, for so many years minister of the great church. In 1874, when age and infirmities had disabled him, he retired from active service, but retained his connection with the church as rector emeritus.

In placing this minute upon its record, the Vestry desire to express their profound gratitude to Almighty God for the gracious providence which has preserved to this church such a gifted and faithful minister of the Gospel. He has sustained him through many years of arduous labor.

Resolved, That this Vestry desires to express its deep sympathy with the family of their late beloved rector.

Resolved, That this Vestry desires to take charge of the funeral of the late Dr. Tyng, and that the treasurer be instructed to pay all the expenses of the same.

Resolved, That the Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D. D., Presiding Bishop, be requested to deliver the address at the funeral; and that the Rt. Rev. Gregory T. Bedell, D. D., Bishop of the Western States, be requested to deliver the address commemorative of the life of Dr. Tyng at a service to be held in St. George's church at such a day as may be fixed by the vestry.

Resolved, That the amount heretofore paid to the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D. D., be continued to the 1st of November next, and that the same be paid to his widow.

W. S. RAINSFORD, Rector.
W. H. SCHIEFFELIN, Clerk.

THE REV. THOMAS FREDERICK CORBELL, M. D.
At a meeting of the Vestry of St. Stephen's church, Brooklyn, held August 28th, 1880, the following minute was adopted:

"Whereas, It hath pleased our Heavenly Father, in His inscrutable providence, to remove from us, by the hand of death, to the place which He hath prepared for His children, our beloved rector, the Rev. Dr. FREDERICK CORBELL, M. D., of the parish, his happiness and companionship in the society of those to whom he ministered, and, above all, his fervent zeal, his faithful and eloquent presentation of the Word of Truth, and his earnest desire to employ the last strength of life in the service of his Heavenly Father, and many grateful memories that will ever retain an abiding place in our hearts; And, further,

"Resolved, That we, the vestry, express to the afflicted widow and family of our late rector our heartfelt sympathies, praying our Loving Father, through His dear Son, that He will bestow upon them daily such an abundant measure of grace and strength as will enable them to bow in humble trust and resignation to His will, and to be sustained in their affliction."
Resolved, That these resolutions be entered upon the parish records, that a copy be furnished to the family of the deceased, and that a copy of the same be presented to the afflicted family.

JACOB REESE.
At a meeting of the Vestry of St. Bartholomew's church of the City of New York, held on September 22nd, 1885, the following resolution was ordered to be placed upon the records of the vestry:

"At a meeting of the senior wardens and trustees of our church, at Jacob Reese's, has been taken from our counsels and from his place in the Church and in the world."
Resolved, That he has a longer personal and official relation to St. Bartholomew's church than any of us who survive him. He was the only one of us who was a member of the vestry when the present rector was called, and was doing his full share in the work of the parish for some years prior to that time. His active interest was never manifested in any other way; his place on the most important committees and at the head of the Sunday-school, his untiring labors as father and grandfather.

"The changes which the coming in of a new rector necessarily brought about, among other things, had there was no change in his interest and his interest in the parish or in his willingness to work. As, with the lapse of years, one and another of us have come to our present condition, and never wearied in or complained of any form of work that was laid upon him. He was the one to whom we all came in our deliberations to guide us by his knowledge of our affairs, and to carry out our resolves when action was required. His kind nature, his willingness to please, his gentleness, his selflessness, the warm heart that loved us all individually, as well as the cause which we sought to serve, all these things are to be remembered and cherished by him, while the ability with which he discharged all his trusts gave us entire confidence in his wise and judicious course in the management of the church, which we have lost almost as much personally as our church has lost in wise management and constant love and effort."

"But his record was so long, and good, and complete that we feel that the benediction of the Master: 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord,' came none too soon for him, and that we can say no more for our beloved one, for he has left us no more than that it may prove a stewardship as full and acceptable as was his."
Resolved, That we, the family, the assurance that we give with them, and trust that they will find strength and blessing in their review of a life so full of truth and goodness.
Clerk pro tempore.

Rev. Dr. Langford:
REVEREND AND DEAR BROTHER: I am pleased to state that since my last report I have lost more than half my income—viz., that derived from the labor of my own hands—by the loss of my hands in a week. My employers informed me in August that they could no longer afford to give me work. I was struggling hard to secure the means of subsistence, and my own unflinching self-supporting, and with good prospects of success.

Now this terrible blow comes upon us at a most critical time, and, unless we receive prompt aid, I greatly fear that all we have done and paid to secure our home will be for naught. If our friends and children to support and edify me must be secured to secure the home, which I cannot possibly do on a salary of less than five hundred dollars per annum.

Our beloved bishop fully understands the situation, and has, we have the highest confidence, and great that all who read this, to whom He has given the ability, may at least contribute something, and that promptly, to secure the home. All remittances should be sent by draft or P. O. order on Racine, Wis.
Faintly yours for Christ and the Church,
E. H. WOLF, Missionary.

WESTERN UNION, RACINE COUNTY, WIS.
The bishop of the diocese wishes to commend most heartily this statement and appeal. He knows the faithfulness of Mr. De Wolf's work and the serious character of the present affliction. Hoping that there may be a response to this urgent call, he is sure that all who are that their offerings will be most wisely bestowed.
K. B. WELLES, Bishop of Wisconsin.

MISSION AT LAWRENCEVILLE.
We have not been blessed with the required amount of money to complete the rectory, which is so badly needed in the mission at Lawrenceville. The work has already gone on for some time, and for this object, yet we confidently believe that our constant friends will not suffer us to fall short in this worthy object. If our kind friends in the North would like to help on this good work please send us a contribution for the rectory.
To finish the rectory we will, pale in the yard and garden, and make the necessary improvements about the lot, it will require between $40 and $500. Are there any of our friends who would like to send $25 each, that the work may be completed by old weather. Any amount very acceptable.
Bishop Randolph has written me that he will gladly do all in his power for the appeal.

MUSIC AMONG THE CLERGY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

Does it not seem strange that in a Church like ours whose various services depend so largely for their full effect upon the use of music, the subject of the art in its relation to those services should receive so little consideration as to arouse almost no general interest and lead to no improvement in the usual way of performing divine service? Can it be truly said that the mass of the clergy are any better informed in this part of their education than were generations before them? Is anything being done at all commensurate with the growing importance of the subject? These queries are not inopportune. Recent letters to THE CHURCHMAN, and remarks appearing from time to time, coupled with the wretched quality of hymnals and chant books that come now and then from the hands of clergymen who seem to be regarded as leaders, go together with every one's experience to prove that the average clergyman has been left at the end of his divinity course wholly ignorant of one of the most important things in his future service. While we may be pleased at the spread of a better class of musical works through the Church; while there are a few places witnessing by their beautiful musical services to the generous provisions and wonderful possibilities of the Prayer Book, still we cannot avoid confessing that whatever improvement is noticeable has come not so much from the clergy as from the importation of English talent, and the following of the fashion which has taken up the works and ways of men on the other side in music as well as in everything else. The pointing of canticles and psalters more often apparently made on whim than on principle, the shocking use for hymn tunes of parodies on secular airs, the bad taste in which hymns are rushed and chant-cadences and amens drawn, the miserable track to which the Te Deum and other canticles are often sung, and the all but universal subordination of the minister with his people to the organ gallery, show how foreign the present position of a rector is to the conception of him formed by the Church.

The canon says it shall be his duty "to give order" concerning the music of the services; but the Church leaves him without anything on which to base an opinion that gives him reason for any discrimination.

"It shall be his duty to suppress all light and unseemly music." But the Church nowhere shows a way he should be able to discern between good and bad in music without going through that to which others give years in order to reach a like point. The minister has a duty to perform. Those of his cure who stand possessed of sensitive feelings have rights, indeed they have interests that—if aesthetics are anything at all—are at stake when bad or frivolous music is performed. But he is helpless to protect them. He can suggest nothing. No matter what outrages on taste are perpetrated that the vanity of the musicians may be gratified, he must stand still and submit. He cannot rebel because he can give no reason for his position if once taken. Very likely the circumstances of his education have been such that his musical knowledge is less than that of his people. He cannot criticize, because he knows nothing of the subject. His inmost soul may abhor the self display of his choir as they cut up the stately Te Deum into interminable solos, which sound more like love songs than psalms. But how shall he express the difference between love song and psalm? It does not suffice to say they seem thus and so to him. They are, they are to the choir. Where shall he begin, who may be at any moment less more helpless still. A clergyman is generally very cautious about meddling with the organist or the choir. These people know their advantage. The service can be read. They were hired by the clergyman and the music committee. The clergyman confesses that he knows nothing about the matter.

The committee always consists of the least musically inclined of the vestry. And so in church after church all over the land, the worship of God is marred and oft-times ruined, and the feelings of sensitive and devout souls lacerated because not only the commonest dictates of common sense and taste are outraged, but the sacrilegious works and performances of incompetent musicians are offered up as a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, and no word of protest is heard. Such a state of things exists. It is a fact. The present luxurious race is hardly one in which church organization will demand a plain service. The country church with a wheezy organ and an asthmatic choir will do everything that Westminster or St. Paul's will attempt.

Occasionally some little church with a few boys and men doing plain things "decently and in order," makes a veritable Pentecost of every service. The lamentable results of such lack of provision by the Church are seen in other denominations. The Church exercises more influence in music among other Protestant denominations than any other body. The ignorance of any Church clergyman on the subject of Church music is a loss to every other church in his town. Must such a state last forever? Surely there are enough unfortunate things resulting from it to argue for the placing of music among the studies of the theological course. That it can be successfully included has been proved elsewhere. I have not yet learned that anything like the needed attention has been given it in the Church; but a case in another denomination might be cited, with which to point the argument. Without going too far into details, let me mention the course pursued in the Congressional Theological Seminary, called Hosmer Hall, in Hartford, Conn. On his entrance into this institution, the student begins a regular and exhaustive study of the whole subject of sacred music, with a thoroughly competent musician who has his regular place in the faculty, and whose work is never intruded upon. The student is furnished with a good knowledge of the elements of harmony and the principles of melody; he goes over in the most careful manner the whole history of sacred music; is grounded in the construction of chants and hymns; is instructed as definitely as possible in a school not professedly musical on all matters pertaining to voluntaries and interludes, and in the performance by a chorus of nearly two hundred voices, with full orchestra and organ of all the greatest oratorios, masses and cantatas he finds the opportunity of judging how, in the master-pieces of the art he has studied, the principles taught him have been applied. This is all purely technical and can be measured. Who can measure the far-reaching effect of this noble training in matters of taste? Has the Church, with wealth of music at her disposal and requirements meant to be exacting, with a service that demands much because it offers nearly everything, any provision whatever comparable to this? Ought it not soon to have such provisions everywhere?

THE HOUSE OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

I believe that something has already been said in your columns about the House of the Good Shepherd, but the great importance of the missionary work being done there will be my excuse for calling your attention again to this field of our domestic missions.

I shall simply attempt to enumerate briefly some of the chief phases of the Rev. Mr. Gay's work, which it was my privilege and pleasure to witness during the past summer.

First and foremost, a few words concerning the house itself. This institution, or perhaps more properly home, is intended principally for the orphan and destitute children of the neighboring mountainous country near Tomkins Cove. There are at present some thirty children, both boys and girls, who are being trained and cared for within its walls. They are educated on principles which tend to send them out into the world strong and healthy Christian men and women. There is no danger here of moulding boys and girls as if by machine after one pattern, but just as in a family, room is left for the development of each individuality. The spirit of independence and self-reliance is taught as well as obedience and submission to authority, so that when the time comes for leaving the shelter of their childhood they are able to grow like strong and sturdy plants, instead of fading away like plants raised in some hot-house. They are under the best influence mentally, morally and physically, and resemble more a happy family than the children of any of our other typical orphan asylums.

This feature of Mr. Gay's work could and ought to be made the central point of missionary work in that part of Rockland County. For perhaps the best and only way of influencing permanently for good the ignorant and wretched people of the neighboring mountainous country is by sending them from such homes as this young men and women to live in their midst, reflecting some little at least of the light which they have absorbed. If Mr. Gay were able to do so, he would on a more extended scale attempt to influence the basket makers of that region in this way.

Now, a few words about missionary work proper, and perhaps first, no better way can be found of presenting a clear idea of its extent than by an outline of the services held on Sundays.

In the morning, at 7 A. M., there is Holy Communion, at 9 Morning Prayer and Sunday-school of the children of the house and neighborhood. At 10:30 Litany, sermon and Holy Communion on first Sunday in the month. All the services are held in a large room fitted up as a chapel, which must serve for this purpose until a sufficient amount is raised to complete the Church of the Holy Child Jesus, in process of erection. At 2:30 P. M. there is Sunday-school at the little chapel at Caldwell's (two miles from Tomkins Cove), and at 3:00 Evening Prayer and sermon. At 7:30, Evening Prayer and sermon at Grace Chapel (about a mile from the House of the Good Shepherd.) At 8:00, a religious concert is given, but by none of these are the people living back in the mountains directly influenced. They live at too great a distance, and are unable to attend many of these services. There are living, scattered here and there among the mountains, within a radius of ten miles of Tomkins Cove, many of the so-called basket-makers, earning their living by attempting to do so, by making and selling wicker baskets. One could little imagine that within a distance of forty miles from New York City a class of people in such poverty, and of so low an order of civilization, could be found. For the most part they are ignorant, and very poor, engaged in the hard struggle of earning enough to keep themselves from starvation. The care of these people falls upon the House of the Good Shepherd.

Mr. and Mrs. Gay spend as much of their time as they can afford in ministering to their wants, material as well as spiritual. Many of the basket-makers travel as far as ten miles to the rectory at Tomkins Cove, bringing baskets, for which they can obtain in exchange clothes, blankets, and other necessities. They are often made paupers of, but, whenever able, are expected to give pay in baskets for what they receive. Women sometimes bring their babies down from the mountains, carrying them all the way, in order that Mr. Gay may baptize them. This is one way in which some good is done among the basket-makers. But, in addition, Mr. and Mrs. Gay go back amongst them frequently, holding services, baptizing children, visiting the sick, and ministering to bodily wants. This summer, on every other Sunday afternoon, Mr. Gay held what he calls bus meetings, some six miles back in the country—a simple out-of-door service, held in a grove of trees, attended by fifty to a hundred men and women.

It is a noble example of a great and important work. The possibilities are vast, but, as too often the case, the means only too small. The burden of all this work rests upon the shoulders of one man, the means wherewith to carry it on depends mostly on voluntary subscriptions.

Would that I might think that perhaps some one reading this feeble attempt to give an account of the missionary work at the House of the Good Shepherd might be impelled to help, and stir up others to help, in strengthening and supporting this missionary in this true work for Christ and His Church.

LECTIONARY OF THE REVISED PRAYER BOOK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Whilst no one would advocate any slavish or purposeless identification of our revised Prayer Book with the English, yet I would suggest that it would be convenient if the lectionary of the two Churches could be assimilated. Churchmen pass over from Canada to the States, and vice versa. Many of our sermons are based on the lessons for the day, and it would be a point of approximation and of unity which could be made without any sacrifice of any principle, and would be very convenient to travellers. The English Church revised her lessons some fifteen or twenty years ago, and could not very well change again. If we are now to have a revised Prayer Book we could move in the direction of assimilation more easily than the Church in England.

MOVEMENTS TOWARD UNITY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In the closing sentence of the article on "The Mercersburg Movement and Church Unity," in your issue of September 12th, the Rev. Dr. Andrews says: "Our General Convention and the Methodist General Conference have each been waiting since the year 1868 for the other to speak first"—presumably, from the tenor of his article on Unity. May I ask Dr. Andrews through your columns, what was the nature of the communications between the two bodies, to leave them both in this expectant attitude? I know nothing of such communications, and perhaps many others do not. But if there was anything looking toward unity that passed between these two bodies, there are very many, doubtless, who will be glad to have it restated.

BELIEVE "ON" OR "IN."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The inquiry of "Bible Student," in your issue of September 12th, p. 14, is important, I think, as sermo in is used first by our Lord and Himself, and the revisers ought always to have translated it "in," and not "on." In the LXX, we find generally the dative, rarely "and, never, I think, "in."

NEW BOOKS.

AMERICAN COMMONWEALTHS—MICHIGAN. A History of Governments by Thomas Melstrey Cooley. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., pp. 378. Price 1.15.)

History has been too exclusively confined to imperial topics. Especially the history of the United States has been treated from the federal point of view, even where their colonial beginnings have been noticed, and from the War of the Revolution State matters have been overlooked. This series of "American Commonwealths" is an effort to repair the omission. As is well shown in one portion of this volume, the real interest of Michigan for a considerable time was purely in its local legislation. Except in the matter of postal facilities nearly every direct concern of its people was with State political action. The history of Michigan as a colony wrested from France by the great struggle which ended with the fall of Quebec, as a territory till after the War of 1812, and as a State to the time of the War for the Union, is one of great interest, and Mr. Cooley has told it with considerable interest and power. Pontiac's conspiracy, Hull's surrender, the "wild cat" banking episode, the rise of the University of Michigan, are all matters which the general reader may have heard, but probably not one in twenty could speak intelligently upon these topics. This book supplies the want in a great measure, and is a valuable contribution to American history. We must here recall Miss Kirkland's very graphic and amusing volumes, the first of which, "A New Home. Who'll follow?" was widely read and universally enjoyed when it appeared. Re-read in connection with this book, it would give a very lively and useful picture of the development of the new State. And no one can understand North American history without learning something of the peculiar life of each Commonwealth. The differences which make each what it is to-day are differences going back to the foundation period. And no one can rightly consider general legislation without also taking into account the varieties of life which have arisen under State rule.

Michigan took the impress of its early history. Some flavor of the early French settlement was long perceptible in its ways and thoughts. It is peculiar, too, in possessing the longest water front in proportion to its area of any American State. It has a fertile soil, rich also in mineral deposits, and it is placed where much of the traffic of the Northwest must necessarily pass over its territory. Its population is largely of New England origin, while its close proximity to the more English part of Canada brings it in contact with other influences which are peculiarly its own. There is much in this history which it is well for the citizens of other States to read, especially its financial experiments. It tried more than one of these, and their failure on a small scale ought to point a moral to the theorists who would renew them on a larger field.

There is another motive for this book that we must briefly touch upon. History is always most interesting and most instructive when it treats of limited communities. Almost all past history is of this sort, because it takes the representative city or State when it would write of the fate of nations. Paris has for centuries been France, London in a few degrees was England. On the other hand, while the history of the German States is full of incident, nothing can be drier than the story of the German Empire as it is usually given. There is a good map given at the beginning of this volume, and a convenient index.

Mr. Cooley is indebted (and freely acknowledges it) to the charming works of Parkman, and if this volume should lead young America to give the time spared from dime novels to the true story of Indian warfare it would not be the least of its merits.

REPRESENTATIVE ESSAYS. Selected from the series of "Prose Masterpieces from the Modern Essayists." Containing twelve unabridged Essays by Irving, Lamb, DeQuincy, Emerson, Arnold, Morley, Lowell, Carlyle, Macaulay, Froude, Freeman and Gladstone. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 55.

These Essays are many of them well-known to the general reader. The first is from the sketch book of Washington Irving, viz., his dream in the library of Westminster Abbey, on "The Mutability of Literature." For Lamb is the paper on "Imperfect Sympathies" from the Essays of Elia. DeQuincy furnishes the first and second part of his paper on "Conversation." Ralph Waldo Emerson's characteristic lecture or essay on "Compensation," comes next. Quite unlike it is the next, which has given its author no small portion of his fame. Matthew Arnold's "Sweetness and Light." John Morley's lecture on "Popular Culture" follows for a striking example of the variations in views and expressions among men who are essentially akin in thought. Next comes Mr. Lowell's delightful paper "On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners," perhaps the best specimen extant of a well-bred retort. Carlyle and Macaulay both follow on "History," J. A. Froude on "The Science of History," and Mr. E. A. Freeman, who perhaps understands better than any of the three what history should be, contributed an admirable essay on "Race and Language," and Mr. Gladstone his review article "Kin beyond the Sea." One cannot help feeling that here is a very admirable collection of modern prose-writers, whether judged as specimens of style or of thought. There is a certain benefit which does not lie wholly on the surface in the essays of such writers as these. They introduce one to many things beyond their immediate scope. For a young man to take a paper of Lord Macaulay's, to look up and write out conscientiously all the allusions in it, would be almost an education in history and letters. To read one of Mr. Freeman's articles is to get a new light upon all history. We might say much more, but why praise individual dishes, when the bill of fare is so expressive.

NEW YORK AND THE CONSCRIPTION OF 1863. A Chapter in the History of the Civil War. By James R. Fry. Retitled "The Draft." New York: The Rank of Colonel, Brevet Major General United States Army, Late Provost Marshal General of the United States. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 85.

General Fry has issued this pamphlet, which is a defence of those in charge of the draft measures of 1863, and an attack in some sort upon ex-Governor Horatio Seymour. We presume few people will read it, and we confess that we do not greatly see the necessity of its publication. It is directed against practically irresponsible publications, which might rather be let alone. Of course it is not pleasant to be misrepresented, but the probability is that not one man in a million now believes the charges recklessly made at the time in the height of partisan feeling. No doubt there were those who honestly supposed that Governor Seymour was opposing the draft from secret hostility to the War for the Union. No doubt there were others who regarded the draft as a needless and cruel measure directed against New York and Brooklyn, because from those cities had come the anti-Republican majority. All this has passed away. Had men on either side no doubt imagined evil things, and freely uttered them. But the great majority can now calmly weigh the real and honest differences of opinion between those whose thoughts were fixed on saving the Union, or those who were anxious to have a Union worth saving. Therefore we cannot feel that this pamphlet is called for quite as strongly as General Fry (who feels himself censured) appears to think. He can afford to leave his justification to posterity, just as Governor Seymour can afford to leave his. There were men in that day to whom oblivion would indeed be mercy, but we hold that neither the one nor the other of the names named above have need to justify themselves.

JERRY McAULEY, HIS LIFE AND WORK. With Introduction by the Rev. S. Ingersoll Prime, D.D., and Personal Sketches by A. S. Hatch, Esq. Edited by the Rev. R. M. Oford. [New York: Mrs. Jerry McAuley, 304 West 82d Street, Ward & Drummond, 119 Nassau Street.] pp. 327.

We have no prejudice in favor of books of this sort. We are not wholly unsuspecting of that kind of enthusiasm which makes much of an interesting covert, and is disposed to parade pious talk as the proof of a changed heart. But we are free to say that we do not think this criticism will apply to the story of Jerry McAuley. Not only does it show him as thoroughly sincere, but after fairly admitting that his religious methods were open to improvement, we cannot but be struck by the practical shrewdness and genial common sense which were at the bottom of his work, and no doubt contributed much to his success. He seems to have understood his field, and to have gone into it in the right way to make an impression. At the same time we say frankly that there is much about the book which does not wholly please us. We do not believe in the rough and superficial ways which savor of the Salvation Army and which have a still earlier prototype in the doings of the mendicant friars, as satirized in Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims. There is a tendency to confound noise and excitement with real religious feeling, and a roused imagination with a changed heart. But the one fact remains that there is a great moral cesspool into which nice tastes and delicate susceptibilities will not venture, and with which they can do nothing if they try. Our own view is that vigorous police work is the first thing needed, but as that is hopeless in a great American city, probably such work as that of Jerry McAuley is the next best. Best of all would be the shutting off of the influx of a degraded foreign element.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE OPERATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES LIFE SAVING SERVICE. For the Fiscal Year ending June 30, 1884. (Washington: Government Printing Office.) pp. 78.

As this is a "Congressional document" we suppose its coming to our readers must mainly depend upon their political relations. But we venture to suggest that if some enterprising publisher would take these books and have them put into popular shape they would furnish reading at once more fascinating and more useful than nine tenths of what goes over their counters. The public ought to know the greatness of the work done and its exceeding value. There are twelve districts, with two hundred and one life saving stations. Of these one hundred and fifty-six are on the Atlantic, thirty-seven on the Lakes, seven on the Pacific, and one at the Falls of the Ohio. The work done in a single year is as follows:

Number of disasters, four hundred and thirty-nine; amount of property involved, over ten and-a-half millions of dollars. Of this nine millions were saved. Number of persons on board, four thousand, four hundred and thirty-two. Out of these only twenty were lost, the rest saved—nearly all by means of the Life Saving Service. Take the superintendent's account of the more dangerous and disastrous wrecks and it is as exciting as anything of Mr. Clark Russell's writing. It is a story of heroism, self-devotion and manly courage which cannot easily be surpassed. It is the story of what is going on all the time, unnoticed, unpraised, almost unappreciated except by those who get the immediate benefit of it. There is much the public might do, in aid, outside the proper government work, and there is no call for the work of benevolence which is more wholly unexceptionable than this.

A WALK OF FINE. By Arto Bates. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] pp. 205. Price $1.00.

There is shown in more ways than one that the author of this story is a student of the old English drama. While the dress is all modern—Boston of the latest—the idea is that of a Shakespearian play. There is that double tide of tragedy and comedy which flows through most of the Elizabethan stories. We do not think the book altogether pleasant, though it certainly is powerful. It seems to us that the ending should have been entirely different in order to justify the sorrowful picture of mental conflict, so skillfully and so tryingly drawn. In the lighter half of the book, the loves of the doctor and the coquette, all this subtle analysis is very pleasant to follow. It is a foregone conclusion that "the novel of the period" must be a character story. The old plots are all exhausted. The man who can write an historical novel no longer lives—perhaps because history is now written by telegraph and newspaper—so that unless a novel is one of character exposition it has no raison d'être. But since this is so, it surely ought to be the care of the novelist to avoid morbid anatomy. There are a great many capital points about this book, touches so delicately clever that we were inclined to accept the title-page name of the author for a nom de plume, and to question whether it covered a male or a female personality. But since "Ario Bates" dedicates this book to his wife, and intimates that she was his critical "guide, philosopher and friend" as he was writing it, we must give the credit in part at least to the silent member of the firm. It is no small pity that some other of the stories which come under our notice should not have the same censorship.

LITTLE CHILDREN'S BOOK. For Schools and Families. By authority of the General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America. (Philadelphia: J. C. Fife.) pp. 169.

So far as we can discover, little Lutheran children require the same sort of musical and devotional provision as other little children not prospectively designed for consubstantiationists. They sing the same words to the same pretty tunes as all other children, save little Romanists and little Quakers, and possibly little Hebrews. It is mainly a question of difference of paging and order, and for superintendents of Sunday-schools to be able to say that they "use exclusively the books approved by the General Council," etc., but the article is at base just what will be furnished under any denominational flag whatsoever. We could moralize a good deal (if we thought best) upon this point, and our conclusions would probably be the very opposite of those which the cursory reader might expect. What the fact of unity being confined to the Sunday-school hymnology proves may possibly be that the Sunday-school (as an institution apart from the Church) has not vital Christianity enough to assert itself, and that compromise and weakness are often synonyms.

LITERATURE.

The September Musical Herald contains six pages of music and the usual variety of letter press.

We have received from Scribner and Welford the Monthly Interpreter for June and July, but no later numbers.

The colored plate in Vicks's September Illustrated Monthly is a group of Bouvardias. The number is specially good.

The Unitarian Review has a paper entitled a "Justification of Judaism," by Claudi G. Montefiore. It is one of a series.

GINN & Co., Boston, announce Wentworth's series of arithmetics for primary and grammar schools, with editions for both teachers and pupils.

ELECTRA for September (Louisville, Ky.) is promptly upon our table. It is a magazine devoted to pure literature, and nearly all its contributors are women.

The September Homiletic Review contains much matter that is valuable, but the chief contributors to its various sections are persons unfamiliar to the Church.

WRITE, STOKES & ALLEN have issued in red and black a descriptive catalogue of their publications, and among them will be found many new and valuable works.

"The City, a Study with Practical Bearings," by the Rev. C. E. Stevens, is published by J. J. Little & Co. The centralization of population is a very important problem.

"The Twelfth Annual Address of Bishop Paddock, of Massachusetts," delivered at the Ninety-fifth Annual Convention, has been published in pamphlet by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston.

ART AGE for September is illustrated by a design for a book-cover for Aulnay Tower, and a Portrait Effect in charcoal by J. C. Beckwith, who is the subject of one of the articles.

The latest of the alumni publications of the General Theological Seminary is entitled "The Rampton Lectures." It is a historical sketch of that foundation by Professor George W. Dean, D.D.

GOON HOUSEKEEPING for September 19, Holyoke, Mass., and New York, has an excellent bill of fare, and if it was generally digested we should have homes instead of boarding houses.

"PURGATORY Not Known to the Bible, the Early Liturgies, and the Christian Fathers, but a Modern Invention," by Dean Hart, of Denver, Colorado, in pamphlet form, is worthy of wide circulation.

The October Lippincott contains a great variety of light and pleasant reading, and should satisfy the tastes of many readers, and it takes them from a "Sheep Ranch in Texas" to a "Jaunt through Palestine."

The colored plate for the Art Interchange of September 10, is a "Shore Sketch," by H. Chase. There are other interesting designs in the number, and a supplement to the notes and queries, and directions for treatment.

"THE Case of Non-Episcopal Ordination Fairly Considered," is the title of the charge of Dr. Wordsworth, the Bishop of St. Andrews, Scotland, delivered at the recent Diocesan Synod. It is published in pamphlet form.

The articles of the September Journal of the Military Service Institution, for September, are for the most part of a professional interest, but here and there will be found historical incidents that make pleasant reading for the lay mind.

The Bay State Monthly for September possesses a varied table of contents, and its illustrations, some of them on steel, are excellent. It devotes much space to historical reminiscences, and has a paper on "The House of Ticknor & Co."

The Journal of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis makes a pamphlet of some one hundred and sixty pages, and continues among its papers much that is valuable to Biblical students. It is published for the Society in Boston.

The Church Temperance Society has published in pamphlet for general circulation and criticism, a "Proposed Excise Bill for the State of New York." The subject is one of very great importance, and the bill has been carefully considered.

FRANK LESLIE'S October Sunday Magazine is already out. It has a great variety of matter and wood cuts, many of them devoted to English scenes and subjects. There is a large class to which the magazine and its pictures are most welcome.

In the Foreign Church Chronicle and Review for September Dr. Langdon continues his papers upon "Early Relations to Catholic Reform." The number contains much interesting matter in regard to Church work in Italy and among the Old Catholics.

"THE Book of Mormon; Is it from God?" a series of lectures by the Rev. M. T. Lamb, a Baptist preacher, has been published by the author at Salt Lake City. They are said to be a searching examination of the foundation on which that monstrous barbarism rests.

MACMILLAN for September, continues Mrs. Bitchie's (Miss Thackeray) serial, "Mrs. Dymond," and there is an interesting paper on "The Question of Drink in England," and one on "The New National Gallery at Amsterdam." Macmillan's is one of the best of the English magazines.

"THE Church in the Nation, Pure and Apostolic, God's Authorized Representative," Bishop Lay's last work, will be issued by E. P. Dutton & Co. next month. It comprises the bishop's lectures before the General Theological Seminary on the Bishop Paddock Foundation delivered last spring.

THE Sidereal Messenger, Northfield, Minn., is intended chiefly for astronomers and those who are interested in the study of the skies. It is a magazine of high scientific character, but as we see by the September number, it is not ashamed of a text of scripture upon its cover. "An undevout astronomer is mad."

AMONG the tracts left by Bishop Lay none have been more admired and more widely read than his "Ready and Desirous" and his "Studies in the Church." It is, we are sure, a pardonable satisfaction which THE CHURCHMAN feels in having been instrumental in placing these works, as well as "The Return of the Southern Bishops" and "The Quiet Corner," before the Church.

THE October North American has in its October issue a paper by William Waldorf Astor, on "America and the Vatican," and one on "George Elliot's Private Life," by Edwin F. Whipple, a difficult subject for satisfactory treatment, and which, with all his ability, Mr. Whipple has failed to give; he speaks of her union with Mr. Lewes as "violating no principle of absolute morality."

THE July Quarterly and the Westminster Reviews (Leonard Scott Publication Co.) are at hand. In the former is an able paper on "The First Christian Council, A. D. 50," attributed to Dean Burgon, and in the latter are papers on "Dogma in Masquerade," and "Church Missions to Mohammedans in the Turkish Empire." The other articles in both reviews discuss historical, literary and political questions.

THE September Portfolio opens with a continuation of the illustrated series of papers on " Windsor," and there is a full-page etching of Windsor Park, by F. Slocombe. "Giotto, the Franciscan Artist," is the subject of a second paper, by M. H. Conway, on "The Influence of the Mendicant Orders on the Revival of Art." Among the many illustrations is a heliogravure by Dujardin of the "Statue of Demosthenes," and "St. Paul's from Paul's Wharf," by J. Pennell.

SOME time ago, in the Magazine of American History, there was an article on "Puritanism in New York," in which it was said in the matter of the Rev. William Vesey's conforming to the Episcopal Church and becoming the first rector of Trinity church: "This gave the Episcopal Church the primacy in the city, which by right belonged to the Presbyterian Puritans." That is so refreshingly cool, that it ought to have been written in the late heated term instead of midwinter.

THE Magazine of Art for October contains five full page illustrations, including the frontispiece, which is "Chivalry," from a painting by Frank Dicksee. "Arnold Böcklin" is the subject of the opening paper, and there are three reproductions of his weird pictures. "Chloris" is the subject of one of the full-page illustrations, and is from a picture by Raphael Sforza. Two interesting papers are those on "Celtic Metal Work, Pagan Period" and "Burmantofts Faience," both illustrated.

THE September Decorator and Furnisher is a number of great excellence both in its letter press and illustrations. Nineteen of its articles are accompanied with designs or sketches, and many with more than one. Some of the illustrations are in colors. We call special attention to the design in colors for ceiling and side wall, combining fresco with tapestry panels and cabinet work, by Mr. V. G. Stepienich, and to the reproduction in color of the stained glass windows in the Duke of Westminster's Eaton Hall. Its designs are taken from Tennyson's works.

L'ART, No. 508, opens with an article upon "St. Mark's, Venice," by G. de Leris, and it is supplemented by another paper on "The Treasury of St. Mark," by Paul Leroy. The etching of the number is "Parisiennes," by Ringel, after his figure in clay in the Salon of this year. There is also a full-page "Le Souvenir," a heliogravure of Dujardin, after a statue for the tomb of Madame Charles Ferry. There are many other fine illustrations in the number. In No. 509 there is an etching, "A Love Missile," by A. Mongin, from a picture by Alma Tadema, and a portrait of "Madame L—," by Pignet, which was in the last Salon. Among the many engravings is a "Family Portrait," attributed to Frans Hals, and it is an illustration of the first article in the number. The Courier de L'Art, for July accompanies L'Art, and abounds with information in regard to the current art of Europe.

Plain Prayers for Children.

BY THE REV. GEO. W. DOUGLAS.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS.

32 mo. cloth, 86c. net; by mail, 86c.

This little work fills a want that has long been felt, for a plain, earnest, and practical book of prayers for children; for those who are too young to read, and for those not old enough to understand and use the many good manuals of prayer already published.

Extract from a letter from a SISTER OF MERCY, referring to "Plain Prayers": "I gave it to my little god-daughter. She is a very devout child for her age. Her mother writes to me that she is most careful in making use of it every night and morning, and puts it under her pillow when she goes to bed. This is all of her own free will. IT SHOWS THAT IT REALLY REACHES THE CHILD'S HEART."

A VISIT TO HURSLEY, KEBLE'S HOME AND PARISH.

A recent sojourn of several months in England afforded us the good fortune of a pilgrimage to three "shrines," which, if not so ancient as many other places in that land, are nevertheless, to thousands of persons, among the most interesting and dearest of England's fair sights, namely, Eversley, Bemerton and Hursley—the homes respectively of Charles Kingsley, George Herbert and John Keble. These places, not unlike in certain of their characteristics and surroundings, have also about the same population, two or three hundred persons each. The lives, also, of the three noted men have some marked resemblances.

To most tourists Eversley will doubtless be disappointing in some respects, but Bem-

The old "George Hotel" at Winchester opened its hospitable doors to us, and one was made to feel quite awed when learning that upon that spot an inn had been kept for four hundred years! Ancient ghosts, however, did not disturb our slumbers; on the contrary, it was soothing to reflect upon the antiquities of the spot, where, so many generations of mankind had slept, and from whence they had been sent on their ways refreshed for the journey and the battle of life.

Upon inquiring at Winchester, as to the way of reaching Hursley, we were directed to a grocery "shop," whose proprietor was an attendant at the Hursley church. The shop-keeper being out, inquiry was made of his son, a young man of perhaps twenty-five years of age.

"Can you direct me as to the way of long—and, when I was a little fellow, I would go to sleep."

It was on one of England's lovely autumn days that I enjoyed the ride from Winchester to Hursley, the distance being about five miles. The pleasure of the journey was not lessened because of the fact that the man driving us had known Keble. A more lovely ride, and more beautiful rural sights than those that day enjoyed it were not easy to have and to behold. On all sides, and away in the distance, was laid out before the eye that quiet, restful landscape which so bewitches the traveler in England.

About half way en route to Hursley is seen the pretty stone "Pitt Chapel," in Hursley parish, erected in 1858 by Miss Charlotte Yonge, authoress of "The Heir of Redclyffe." She expended about $4,000 (£800), upon the chapel, which is used as a erton and Hursley have a charm and fascination scarcely less potent and real than those with which these places had been previously invested in the visitor's imagination.

Hursley not being directly upon any railroad, the best way of reaching it is from Winchester. The latter city, indeed, invites the attention of the sightseer, and richly repays one for an extended examination. It possesses extreme interest for the antiquary, the educationist and the general tourist, as being the original capital of England, and as having in its midst the ancient St. Mary's College and Wolvesey Palace, the noble cathedral (the largest in England), and the interesting St. Cross Hospital.

Arriving at Winchester on Saturday evening, we impatiently awaited the pleasure of spending the following day at Hursley, being especially glad that a Sunday could be devoted to visiting Keble's church. Most visitors to Hursley, doubtless, see it upon a week day, getting to Hursley? Do you know at what hours they have services on Sundays?"

"I ought to know," he replied. "I go there, and my father is one of the 'sidesmen' in that church. Well," he continued, "they have 'church' there pretty much all day!—at seven, at half-past ten, at half-past two, and at half-past six o'clock."

Upon our speaking to the young man about the reputation of Mr. Keble, and observing that he was nearly as much beloved in America as in England, the youth remarked, in a business-like way, that Mr. Keble often used to come to the shop, and that "he was a very good man to do business with." I was told that Mr. Keble was very plain in his dress, even indifferent as to his appearance. A bystander in the store spoke with admiration of Keble.

"Yes, I liked him, too," remarked the young man before referred to. "No, I didn't, either," he quickly added, "he used to preach such awfully long sermons—an hour mission for the poor country folk of the neighborhood. A day-school and a Sunday-school are also maintained. Miss Yonge lives in Hursley parish, two or three miles from the vicarage.

A mile or so beyond Pitt Chapel is an old, large chalkpit, having a deep interest in connection with Keble. In the famous "Oxford Movement" he was the originator, and Pusey and Newman were the others of a noted triumvirate. The secession of Newman to the Roman Church was a lifelong grief to Keble, who had in vain endeavored to dissuade him from "going over to Rome." One day Mr. Keble received a communication from Newman which he felt was to apprise him of his friend's determination to "secede." Mr. Keble withdrew to the seclusion of the lonely chalkpit, two miles away, taking with him the letter, which he there opened and read with much emotion in his solitude.

As we rode through the street of the little, humble, narrow village of Hursley on that lovely Sunday morning, everything seemed to speak of the meek, yet noted man who was the spirit and the genius of the place. So restful, so poetic was it all, that involuntarily our delight voiced itself in declaring "This is, indeed, an ideal 'Hursley!' This is as it should be, for Keble's home." It was not disappointing. Some places associated with our heroes and heroines have a borrowed beauty or poetry added for the embellishment of the picture. Not so Hursley. The idealistic there is realistic, and the realistic is very idealistic.

With thoughts full of Keble all along the journey to Hursley—thoughts of his home, his church, his grave—it was grateful to hear, even before rounding the corner where the church comes into view, the sweet chime as the bells rang out upon the still country air. In a moment more the church appeared in sight, and the spire from whence the music of the bells sounded. Upon viewing the church I was disappointed, most pleasantly disappointed. Not knowing the character and size of the edifice I expected to find a humble, plain church, as Kingsley's is. Instead, one sees what is called, and not unfittingly, "a miniature cathedral." It is, indeed, "fair to look upon." When Keble became Vicar of Hursley, in 1835, an old church existed which was built in 1750. In 1848 Mr. Keble erected the present beautiful "miniature cathedral," defraying the expense out of the proceeds of "The Christian Year." The cost of the church was about $30,000, (£6,000,) for which sum in England a much handsomer edifice can be erected than in this country, labor and materials being much cheaper there. The old tower was allowed to stand, a new spire being built above it, but the rest of the church is entirely new. There are a clock and chime of bells in the tower.

The church (it is called "All Saints'") has three distinct naves and aisles, plainly indicated outside, as well as within, recalling to the visitor Keble's own words:

"Three solemn parts together twine,
In harmony's mysterious line;
Three solemn aisles approach the shrine:
Yet all are one—together all
In thoughts that awe, but not appal,
Teach the adoring heart to fall."
Everything about the church and churchyard betokens three facts: That Keble lived here; that a sacred regard is had to the fitting, beautiful preservation of all, because of him; and the fact that visitors being expected, it is determined that they shall find here a shrine worthy of Keble, from which

Of course, Keble's grave first engages the visitor's attention. Near the west end of the church, hard by the church porch and a walk leading into the beautiful vicarage grounds, are three monumental tomb, in which repose the remains of Mrs. Keble, who died six weeks after the poet's death. The next tomb is Keble's, corresponding with his wife's in size and pattern; and next beyond is buried his sister, who died about five years before him.

Keble's tomb is of purple and white marbles. A cross is carved the entire length. Upon one side of the top of the tomb is a chalice, indicating the priest; on the other side is a book, signifying the author and poet. Around the base of the tomb is the inscription: "Here rests in peace the Body of John Keble, Vicar of this Parish, who departed this life Maundy Thursday, March 29th, 1866. † Et Lux Perpetua Luceat Eis."

Upon Mrs. Keble's tomb are the words: "Here rests in peace the Body of Charlotte, Wife of John Keble, who departed this life May 11th, Ao. Dni. 1866." Lying upon the top of Mr. Keble's tomb was a wreath of fresh flowers.

In one corner of the Hursley churchyard is a very neat Sunday-school building, erected in 1835 (the year of Mr. Keble's entrance upon the incumbency), a tablet upon the building showing the date of its erection.

In the rooms within were about fifty children, in the midst of their Sunday lessons.

At 10:30 o'clock we accomplished a cherished purpose of attending a service in Keble's church, and worshipping with the people to whom he ministered and preached. A bulletin-board upon the door containing an announcement, that the sum total of the church contributions for 1883, was £185 (say $900), a modest amount, truly.

In this beautiful church of Keble's there is much to remind one, in his own words, that "Within these walls each fluttering guest

Is gently lured to one safe nest—
Without, 'tis moaning and unrest."

The church, it can be truly said, is all they shall take away only grateful memories. The church stands in the midst of a large, beautiful churchyard, in which are many fine lime and yew trees. The main entrance to the churchyard is by a pretty "Lichgate," erected by Mr. Keble.

that a church should be. Being seated some time before the service began, I attentively observed the beauties of the fabric, the excellent proportions, the striking reality impressed upon everything, the beautiful stone columns, the handsome pulpit, the fine cathedral-like choir, the elegant stained-glass windows, the tile floors, throughout the church, and the handsome, roomy pews. Everything portrays dignity, solidity and beauty. All is chaste and beautiful, (seemingly poetic, too), reflecting the poet's refined taste; and as well, serving as a worthy monument to the beloved man, priest, theologian and poet, who lived in this hallowed spot an humble, but eventful, illustrious life.

The beautiful stained-glass windows were not finished until the church was completed. They were placed in the church by Sir William and Lady Heathcote, by the mother of Sir William and by the Marchioness of Lothian.

In the centre of the chancel floor is a large marble slab, surmounted by an elegant horizontal brass cross, the latter seven or eight feet in length. The whole is a fine piece of work. It is a memorial to Mr. Keble by his parishioners, and marks the spot where his body rested during the service at his funeral, April 9th, 1866. The inscription reads: "John Keble, Vicar of Hursley, 1835-1866; fell asleep in the Lord, March 29th, 1866, aged 74 years. 'By Thine Agony and Bloody Sweat, By Thy Cross and Passion, By Thy Precious Death and Burial, By Thy Glorious Resurrection and Ascension, and by the Coming of the Holy Ghost, Good Lord, Deliver Us.'"

Upon the steps in the chancel, leading to the altar, are several inscriptions, on encaustic tiles. These inscriptions, and the manner in which they are placed, signify the gradual progress of a Christian in a holy life. As an old writer says: "By these steps the ascent of the virtues is sufficiently made manifest, by which we go up to the Altar, that is, to Christ, according to the saying of the Psalmist, 'They go from virtue to virtue.'"

Upon the first step, under the chancel-arch, is inscribed: "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the Tree of Life, and enter through the gates into the City." Upon the next step beyond are the words: "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." Inscribed upon the next step we see: "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." These words are on the foot-pace of the altar: "Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty, they shall behold the land that is very far off."

The pews in the church at Hursley are very striking in their arrangement, affording nearly twice the space usually seen in churches from one pew to another. Under each seat on the men's side of the church (the men and women sit on opposite sides) a unique arrangement is seen, contrived by Mr. Keble, for the holding of hats during the service. Four or five sets of brass rods, two in each set, are fastened under each pew on the men's side. One wonders that somebody had not before conceived some such contrivance. Mr. Keble's considerate arrangement will be appreciated by all who have observed (or suffered from) the operation of some female worshipper sweeping a hat through the aisle by her skirts, while moving to or from her seat.

The Hursley church seats about seven hundred persons. It is large enough to accommodate the whole village, and many from the surrounding country beside. The congregation was composed largely of plain country folk, but there was quite a percentage of persons from higher classes.

In the best pews, in the very front, were eight or ten old men from the "Union" (workhouse), in their simple uniform, to some of whom, doubtless, Keble preached. Speaking of the devotion of the latter to the old men of the "Union," the present vicar, the Rev. Mr. Young, says:

"Seating them in the front pews, Mr. Keble addressed himself especially to them, as he read the second Lesson, reading slowly and with pauses, almost as if he were alone with them and were speaking to them. He was rewarded not seldom by finding how much they learned of the Gospels in this way."

The sight of these humble old men, and the plain character of the bulk of the congregation, brought to mind the plainness of Keble's style of preaching to his people, as seen in his "Village Sermons on the Baptistical Office," which are marvels of simplicity and beauty. Yet a friend of Mr. Keble once complained to him that "he was preaching over the people's heads." He then meekly changed and simplified his style, and, in a letter to another friend, he alluded to his effort to render himself no longer amenable to the criticism of his friendly censor.

On the Sunday referred to the church was moderately filled. The services were rendered by the vicar and curate, the latter preaching, and by a surpliced choir of fifteen men and boys, the music, however, not being very good, the choir showing need of training.

After the service I strolled through the little village street, and with several of the parishioners spoke of the noted man known to them as their vicar and pastor. I told them how revered Keble was in America. "Yes," said a woman of the parish, "Mr. Keble was a very good man; very kind he was to the poor." Then, very quickly she added: "and so is Mr. Young; he gives away more than he can afford to do!"

Meeting the vicar, who is the immediate successor of Mr. Keble, I received from him a courteous invitation to dine at the vicarage. It was no small pleasure to "break bread" at Keble's table. The house, with its luxuriant ivy, its lovely flower-beds and the beautiful lawn and walks, seemed remarkably in keeping with the beauty and charm of all: an ideal picture, one might say. The vicarage was given to the parish for Mr. Keble's use, as vicar, in 1836, by Sir William Heathcote, then a parishioner, and formerly a pupil of Mr. Keble. In the careful, neat keeping of the vicarage and grounds exceeding taste is shown. While seated at a window in the library my attention was called to the spot as having been a favorite place with Mr. Keble when writing, because from the window he could see the church and churchyard.

At dinner the vicar referred to a visit made to Hursley by the late beloved warden of Racine College, the Rev. Dr. Koven. In the "Visitors' Book" kept at the vicarage were the signatures of Bishops Clarkson, of Nebraska, Doane, of Albany, and other Americans.

When leaving the vicarage an irresistible inclination caused us to pluck some pieces of the ivy, some of it for friends at home.

Apropos of this, an American who visited Mr. Keble a few years before the latter's death asked him to pluck with his own hand some of the ivy, that he might take it to America.

"You may smile at my request," remarked the gentleman to a friend, "but I assure you I know and could name the persons at home who would give me—" he mentioned a large sum, "for every leaf I have in my hand."

An opportunity of attending another service at Hursley occurred at half-past two P. M., when the vicar conducted a Sunday-school "catechising." About fifty children and twenty-five or thirty adults were present. A funeral was to take place afterwards, an open grave having been made near Keble's.

Such is the spot in which lived John Keble. Beautiful as Hursley is in itself, there is also much to interest the visitor in its cathedral-like church, in its quiet, restful churchyard, and in the beautiful vicarage, with its well-kept, lovely grounds and walks. Here, amid Nature's quiet, gentle voices, Keble learned to speak in language that moved the hearts of thousands far distant, and quickened the thought of his fellows. In his rural parish he contemplated the toils of his humble flock and shared their cares; but his horizon was not bounded by Hursley, for he was deeply observant of and a sharer in events that were shaping themselves in the outside world. The world is richer and better for the quiet living of his secluded life, and for his communing with Nature and with Nature's God.

Keble beautifully voiced his thoughts in a verse written by him on Ludwell Hill, a spot whither he often went, and where he often loved to linger when oppressed with care:

"To himself, we've heard him say,
Thanks that I may hither stray;
Worn with age, and sin, and care,
Here to breathe the pure glad air;
Here Faith's lesson learns anew
Of this happy vernal crew;
Here the fragrant shrubs around,
And the graceful shadowy ground,
And the village tones afar,
And the steeples, with its star,
And the clouds that gently move,
Tune the heart to trust and love."

Many admirers of Keble's character and writings, and many who have recognized his capacities for leadership among men, have asked: "Why was such a man allowed to remain in that humble station? Why was he not taken from his isolation, and placed in some centre of influence commensurate with his talents?"

And yet the sphere in which John Keble moved, at home, was not so circumscribed and little as many persons are wont to suppose. The cure of Hursley comprised three churches, besides Pitt chapel, namely, the Hursley, Otterbourne, and Ampfield churches. Mr. Keble had assistant curates helping him in his scattered charge. He gave $2,000 toward the erection of a new church at Otterbourne, during his incumbency; he also purchased ground and erected a parsonage there, the latter costing $7,000. At Ampfield a pretty church, costing $16,000, was built by Sir William Heathcote, who also gave the ground for a churchyard. The parishioners of Otterbourne have erected in the churchyard there a lofty monumental cross in memory of Mr. Keble.

In the minds of most persons Keble will always be associated with "The Christian Year," although he was a learned theologian and polemic and an able prose writer. Keble originally intended "The Christian Year" to be a posthumous publication. He always published it anonymously. Soon after the book was issued he playfully endeavored to evade an acknowledgment of its authorship, in a letter written in reply to a friend's inquiry. He says:

"I have seen the little book you mention, and I think I have heard it was written by an Oriol man. I have no wish to detract from its merits, but I can't say I am much in expectation of its cutting out our friend George Herbert."

In the first nine months after the author's death 11,000 copies of "The Christian Year" were sold. During forty years subsequent to its original publication 400,000 copies were sold, $70,000 being Mr. Keble's profit. He had originally offered the copyright to Mr. Joseph Parker for $100 (£20), the latter refusing the proposal.

The visitor to Hursley should also see the noble memorial to Keble at Oxford, Keble College, erected in 1876 by admirers of the poet in England and America. The fine chapel, rich in elegant mosaics, and costing $150,000, is the gift of Mr. William Gibbs. Keble College already ranks in prominence with the older-established colleges at Oxford. In the library of "Keble" are the original MSS. of "The Christian Year" and others of Keble's works, some being written on loose scraps of paper. The visitor will also be shown Mr. Keble's library, and the original painting "The Light of the World," by Holman Hunt. This great work of art, costing $50,000, was presented to Keble College by a gentleman who formerly owned it.

Most reluctantly did I leave Hursley, after a day of such real interest and deep associations. I cast not one look, but many "last, long lingering looks behind," often stopping on the way, loath to leave, and delaying as long as possible the moment when village, church and vicarage should be out of sight. Obligated to walk back to Winchester, we enjoyed the lovely landscape even more, if possible, than during the ride of the morning. On the way I stopped at the "Pitt Chapel," where very humble country folk were worshipping. Although greatly enjoyable was the evening choral service in the grand Cathedral at Winchester, and likewise a later night service at one of the fine parish churches: still, the richer, more abiding pleasure far was that derived from the pilgrimage to the home of the author of "The Christian Year."

A NICKNAME FOR THE REVISION.—Sir Edmund Beckett, who is the "funny boy" of the London Times's controversies, has made an attempt to fix upon the revised version of the Old Testament the nickname of "The Capber-berry Bible" (Eccles. xii. 5), because of an alleged doubtful rendering of the word translated in the authorized version "desire." But he is sufficiently answered by the Dean of Wells, one of the revisers, who shows that the new reading has the sanction of every great Hebraist and every important Codex.

UNFIT TO LIVE, AND AFRAID TO DIE.

BY THE REV. E. W. LOWRIE.

'Twas thus a friend wrote me the other day. I was pained, for she is a valued friend of now many years standing, and one, too, whom I have ever found to be as consistent to duty, religious and otherwise, as it really seems given to us poor frail mortals to be. Yet I grieved not as I might have done at an earlier time of life when I was more in the green timber of life's experience, and less mature as guide, philosopher and friend. For I was (and am) convinced that it was only the language of confidence in a moment of depression; moments, to which all are liable, and many subject. The heart is deceitful above all things, and nothing is less safe as a standard than its feelings. They ebb and flow by no fixed law; or, at any rate, by no law that we can fix, and no time-table by which we can calculate. Like the winds, they have, doubtless, real causes, and like the rain a father, but you and I cannot tell whether they come, or whether they go. . . . Yet, no doubt, my poor sad friend is not alone. Our deceitful hearts may have often said that to us, and caused us, gazing from the windows out upon life, to moisten and hlur them with tears that we could not, or cared not, wipe away. If any others be so, take courage as she did, and go on, and duty done gives strength duty to do, and "grace sufficient," not grace before nor grace more than, yet none less than the need, and "strength as the day," not above it nor at all below it, shall be, as it ever has been and ever will be, vouchsafed. David was frequently depressed. His heart was often heavy (and it had heavy cause to be at times) as he swept some of the Psalms from the strings of his harp.

Elijah was. Did he not pray God to take his life? He was in the depths of depression. The clouds were near; the sun afar off. Yet that very man—went he not up to heaven at the last, in a chariot of fire?

John the Baptist, incarcerated in walls of stone, was imprisoned too in walls of doubt and distrust. "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?"

There are temperaments which are as sensitive as so many thermometers; such are, of course, particularly liable to hours, nay, days and weeks of almost continuous depression.

Often, if it be from physical causes, it will remove itself, as any other disease. The liver has much to do with the conscience.

And, then, too, this state of feeling shrinks from notice and outward expression. Our deepest feelings are often our unuttered ones. There is a natural feeling of delicacy about laying our hearts open upon the dissecting-table before another. "Every heart knoweth his own bitterness," you know; and "no other heart, tho' next our own, knows half the reasons why we smile or sigh." Everyone has a holy-of-holies which he will not often allow any foot to enter save his own.

And I can partly sympathize with all this. There is a sacredness about the deeper phases of religious experience which would fain keep inviolable. Yet, while this is so, while there are thoughts too delicate for speech (ordinary speech, anyhow) and which, spoken, seem to become coarse, yet this state, if persisted in, may become gloom; and while I appreciate the answer of a man who was rudely accosted, "My brother, how is your soul to day?" rejoined, "My brother, it is none of your business," still, while not favoring a class-meeting-like violation of good taste and natural instincts, nor an encouragement of dissimulation, or the possibility of cant, or mere goody pietism; granting all this, I say, while counselling to avoid at once Scylla and Charybdis, a confidence like that of my friend may lead to a better understanding of one's self, and help clear up the sky and off the clouds as a moderate storm in summer often does.

And, in doing so, in seeking fit and delicate language, how excellent a vehicle the Psalms. Some one compares them to Joseph. Under an assumed personality, he asked after his father and blessed his brethren. The heart of Joseph the kinsman spake thro' the lips of Joseph the chief ruler. —(Robertson). "Why art thou so heavy, oh, my soul?" . . .

Possibly we can give no answer, no reason why it is "so disquieted" within us; but whatever the cause, the rest of David's sentence comes in as the remedy: "Put thy trust in God, for I will yet give Him thanks who is the help of my countenance and my God." In what a veil of delicacy, I may observe, following the same writer, does this enable us to clothe our most sacred thoughts. Poetical and dignified (as he well says), never over-familiar, all appearance of exaggeration is excused by such as do not enter into their spirit; and by those who do, the psalm-spirit is cheerfully appropriated, so that this latter class unbend their hearts, hardly suspecting that they are doing so, and without the least feeling of that invasion of sanctity which they would have had had they been using the ordinary speech of every day. The Psalms are surviving the rest of the Old Testament in popular use and love, and for this very reason. As Joseph spake for his other self, so David speaks for men this day. Religious wants are much the same one era as another, my friend. Some one thinks that one reason why the class-meeting is becoming abandoned is because it infringes on the delicacy of personal experience; but I note that, as if to save these meetings, the "use" has grown up on the part of the younger members, at any rate, of modestly reciting some snatch of a Psalm as their "testimony," a tribute to the Psalter second only to our "use" of it in public worship. But I wander.

A friend of mine, General —, silenced an adversary, who was disposed to be hypercritical, if not skeptical, by replying some nine and-thirty times to his doubts, in pure Scripture: "Only that, and nothing more." After the thirty-nine strokes the "party of the second part" surrendered, and in time was—confirmed!

"Unfit to live, and afraid to die!" "Put thy trust," etc. You pain me, oh, my friend—my friends, if others there be—but not so much as you would once have done. I have a wholesome dread of emotionalism. My word for it, you are fitter than you think, and less afraid than you imagine. At any rate, live on, and die only when the time comes. Don't "die daily" in the arms of your bad feelings.

THE REV. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D. D.*

The course is finished. The weary life-journey ended. The day, with its early brightness and promise, its meridian fervor and shaded evening is closed. The voice that has often echoed within the walls of this spacious sanctuary, and which has aroused many a slumbering conscience is now hushed, and the lips that had uttered thrilling exhortations are pallid and dumb.

Many affecting memories are awakened by this solemn funeral occasion in the minds of those who knew the departed rector of this church in years gone by. We recall vividly, not the decrepid, and exhausted invalid, but the powerful advocate for truth and righteousness, as he stood up in his manly and unimpaired vigor, an earnest, fearless ambassador for Christ.

The current of life at the present day flows on swiftly—old landmarks soon sink in the distance—the men who were prominent a few years back are now almost forgotten—names and events of a half century or a quarter century ago seem already historical. But if the world loses sight of well-known forms and the recollections of the Church grow faint and dim, the life-work of Stephen H. Tyng is not destined to perish.

"He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." His hand-writing was not upon the sand to be effaced by the returning wave—but is inscribed in an everlasting register, and indelibly stamped upon souls won for Christ. "I have chosen you and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain." What is done in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ is abiding and imperishable. There are those, not a few, now living unto God, active in the Master's service, who were brought under his ministry to the Saviour's feet, some of them, doubtless, in this assembly to-day. There are others, probably a still greater number, who have preceded him and have crossed the boundary line, and it may be now laid with joy his entrance into their blessedness.

Dr. Tyng was a man heartily engaged in many departments of Christian labor—a busy man while his working day lasted—"not slothful in business, fervent in spirit." He did with his might what his hand found to do, and never overlooked or neglected any of his pastoral duties. But it was pre-eminently as a preacher that he improved his talents, honored his Lord and served his generation. Those who listened to him in the culmination of his powers cannot forget the impression made by his sermons. Our Church at that period was small in numbers and extent compared with its present state; but its pulpit was adorned by a number of ministers who, we may assert without disparagement to the present day, have not been since surpassed. The sermons of such men as McIlvaine, Bedell, Hawks, the Johnses, Elliott, Burgess, Vinton and others whom I could name, were eloquent and instructive in a high degree, full of thought and beauty, and pervaded with an unction from above. Among these eminent and honored preachers of the Word, Dr. Tyng stood in the front rank. Each had his peculiar excellences, one distinguished in this respect and another in that. In some points our departed brother was not behind the chiefest. There was intense energy, burning zeal, direct and pointed application which powerfully affected his hearers. He was remarkably gifted as an extempore speaker. His words flowed in an unbroken stream, a torrent of thought and feeling that carried congregations with him. He never hesitated for a word—and sermons, and of his whole bearing, was fearlessness. If he was for many years, in the best sense, a popular preacher, he never sought popularity by concealment or compromise of his views of truth and duty. He never consulted the prejudices of his hearers, nor kept back aught that was profitable lest he should give offence. Under all circumstances his courage was unflinching. Those who attended his ministry must count upon being forcibly reminded of duties and being plainly warned against sins. To some persons his boldness might sometimes seem to border on defiance, but his governing impulse was the desire to be faithful to the Master whom he served, and to the souls over whom he watched as one that must give account. And with boldness of rebuke he always set forth redeeming love in the most full and persuasive representations.

He magnified the Lord Jesus in all His offices of power and grace. The living, life-giving, loving Christ illumined his appeals; and if he sometimes seemed severe, he could also be tender and affectionate, and such expressions from his lips came with great effect.

The subject of these remarks was indeed a strong man—strong in his native endowments, intellectual and physical—a quick, active, penetrating mind in a vigorous frame. Had he chosen another calling, embarked, for instance, in political life, he would have been one to sway by his impetuous and fiery eloquence great masses of men, as well as to command the attention of listening senates. He was strong in faith, decided in his convictions, holding the truths which he had adopted with wise-like tenacity. He believed, therefore he spake. He was strong in his apprehensions of the magnitude of his office and the everlasting results of his ministry. He was strong in his knowledge of men and discernment of character and direct application of truth to the heart and conscience.

The closing years of life, when laid aside by the providence of God from the duties of his calling, might suggest to those who knew him in his prime the exclamation, "How is the strong staff broken, and the beautiful rod!" But an aged and faithful servant of the Lord is not forsaken, nor less loved, because his strength faileth. The treasure is placed in an earthen vessel, and the vessel of clay is subject to deterioration and infirmity. But it is the casket that is impaired, not the jewel. In the glowing language of St. Paul, to which we have just listened, we find exceeding consolation for such an event as temporary eclipse and failure: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a the word used seemed always the most fitting—and his sentences were as well rounded and complete as if carefully elaborated at the desk. But while so fluent in utterance he did not become merely rhetorical or declamatory. His sermons were enriched by the fruits of patient study and previous preparation. He was a diligent reader, and specially a close student of the sacred Scriptures. "The law of the Lord was dearer to him than thousands of gold and silver," his occupation by day and meditation by night, and he poured forth out of his treasure things new and old. One main attraction and element of power was the scriptural character of his teaching, and his lectures and expositions were exceedingly vivid, clear and interesting. His hearers gained new and striking views of the beauty and fulness of the word of God, and went from the church to their Bibles with increased zest and profit.

A marked characteristic of Dr. Tyng's spiritual body." "And, as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." With the natural body we associated corruption, dishonor and weakness. Though so admirable in its structure, it may become a wreck. The harp of thousand strings, disarranged and out of tune, is no longer able to discourse eloquent music. But to the spiritual body are ascribed incorruption, glory and power. It shall rise from ashes and decay to immortality, fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. Such, to-day, is the hope that cheers us respecting our brother departed. The Lord grant that our part may be with him in the resurrection of the just.

RELIGIOUS INFLUENCE PRESERVING THE BODY POLITIC.

BY W. C. PRIME.

It is not often that a volume of sermons is good reading for a summer afternoon in the woods. But I have spent this afternoon and evening with such a volume, reading sermon after sermon. And if you be of thoughtful mind, teachable, and liking to be led by a strong thinker and a strong writer, a man of earnest faith and accomplished scholarship wherewith to uphold his faith, I recommend to you a volume, "Life After Death, and Other Sermons," by the late Professor Edwin E. Johnson of Trinity College, published by Brown & Gross, at Hartford.

The death of Professor Johnson was a severe loss, not alone to Trinity College and the Trinity parish of which he was rector, but to the American Church of whatever denominational name. For he was a man of might, and possessed an unusual combination of qualities making that might. He was a scholar and a student, a man with large intellectual possessions and constantly increasing acquisitions, a rhetorician of unsurpassed ability, clear in language, eloquent in diction, and over and above all a man thoroughly in earnest. You felt, when you heard him, that he intended what he said; that he desired most earnestly to teach you that which he himself knew to be truth. His voice, as all who knew him remember, was peculiar. At first hearing it was strange, and you hesitated whether it was or was not unpleasant. But in very short time it became peculiarly musical, and then very penetrating and winning. No one accustomed to hear him read the Litany will ever forget the melodious power with which, now in pathos, now in entreaty, now in tones that would not take a denial, he led his people to the very throne of majesty as petitioning subjects who had right to pray there, and plead their bill of rights. Few men, if any man, had ever such a way of holding his hearers close with him from beginning to end of his sermons. And this, perhaps, because he never uttered a sentence which was obscure, and each sentence followed on the previous one as a forward step in a line of thought, and as he approached the end he grew more and more anxious that you should follow along with him, and you could not resist the power which drew you.

I had but a very slight personal acquaintance with him, and was not very often in his church, and yet when he was dead I felt that a very important part of my life surroundings was gone; that I had counted on him, had thought a great deal about him, about his sermons, had looked to getting counsel, information, education from him all my life. This volume of his sermons is all I have left of him. But the Church and the world have much more. The works of such men follow them—do not go with them—follow long after, follow through the lives of those that remain, in public and in private life, from generation to generation, from age to age.

Are you who read this, my friend, one of those who regard the old orthodox religious faith as of no special account in the political, commercial, or social systems which surround you? You are in blind error if you so think. The work of the defenders of the faith lives in the body of our political and social fabric. It is not the blood, but it is that characteristic, without which the blood would be foul, would grow poisonous, abominable. Men talk a great deal about the permanence of republican institutions depending on the virtue of the people, and forget that the people are not virtuous. Whatever of the saving quality of virtue is in them comes from the religious faith of the fathers. They who are not profoundly sensible of personal responsibility to a divine law of right and wrong, which will reward merit and punish demerit, cannot be sensible of a personal responsibility to any human fabric of law. Men will either obey a God or follow the dictates of self interest. Exceptions to the rule are few. There is no natural law of humility, of self sacrifice. You will see this truth illustrated in countless ways. But a serious student of his country's history and condition needs no illustration. The truth stands out on every page of past or of contemporary history. The value of real estate depends on churches. The stability of society depends on the religion of those who are the actual leaders, the governors of society. The great charities of the day are founded by religious people.

The power of the Church in the middle ages, much despised and derided in modern literature, and without doubt having much evil mingled in its good, nevertheless, did establish in the minds of all civilized men in Europe the sense of a responsibility beyond this life, the fear of God even where there was no fear or respect for man; and this sentiment has been handed down from generation to generation, and remains in the soul of Europeans. No frenzy of infidelity among the people, no wild rush out of its restraining influences, as in the French Revolution, can eradicate it, so long as here and there the Church still preaches the doctrine of Immortality with future reward and retribution.

The Church has been thus far the salvation of this republic. Nor is there a sane man who reads this who can doubt that if the Church were suppressed, were to die of inanition, or become a mere rationalistic society, teaching the religion of natural humanity, the republic would have a short lease of life. And by the Church we mean the old orthodox Churches, teachers of the doctrine that God is judge as well as Saviour, that there is a hell as well as a heaven, that however men boast of liberty of thought there is certain judgment for evil thought as for evil deed.

Thus the restraining power of the teachings of the pulpit is an element in the social and political forces of the day, which only superficial politicians overlook. There is an awful restraint on human action imposed by the power of an endless life.

Not many years ago a performer in a low class theatre or circus, who had many admirers among the lowest classes of our city population, died suddenly. His funeral was attended by a vast crowd of this sort of men. It was one of the most remarkable assemblies ever gathered in a church. The countenances were indicative of the class represented. These were men whom no Church, Roman or American, had under any influence. But a more solemn assembly never gathered. The silence which reigned over crowded pews and aisles was profound. No one whispered to neighbor or friend. When the voice of the minister was heard reading portions of the Burial Service I watched the emotional indications of the faces. There was no smiling, no sneering, no listless looking around, but after awhile, under the simple influence of the occasion, the surroundings, the sublime words of Holy Writ, the tears began to run down cheeks here and there. Such emotion is catching, even among such men, and in a few moments, out of a thousand New York roughs, a large majority were weeping like girls.

Perhaps they all went away and forgot it. That has nothing to do with my point. There was in them all a certain leaven of character derived from a knowledge of immortality and the responsibility to a God somewhere in the endless hereafter which made that strange scene. And that same leaven in the general character of the worst men of the sovereign American people is the restraining power which from day to day saves us from the terrors of unbridled popular no-government.

If it were possible to trace the effects of the teachings of the good men who have gone from the American pulpit, leaving their works to follow them; if we could see the influence on one and another individual character, and from those on others, we should recognize the indebtedness of the whole country to them. Why will not men be frank with themselves? They acknowledge the preserving power of virtue, but they have a vague idea that virtue means something not quite so rigid as pure and undefiled religion. Read the history of Europe for two thousand years, and learn from it that there has been no such thing as public virtue, and the only approach to it has been in the private individual acceptance by many of the faith delivered to the saints of old. We call ours a Christian country, because among us are such a vast number who accept the Cross and its lessons.

Beneath our whole system of law, as its foundation, lies the law delivered on Sinai. Nor is it possible to erect a system of law on any other basis than this—that the decalogue is the law of a God and not of man. If there be no God, there is no natural or possible ground for any such enactment as "Thou shalt not steal," or "Thou shalt do no murder." All the virtue there is in man can only teach him that for himself and for whomsoever he loves, it is his joy and duty to rob others when he can do it with impunity, and murder every one who interferes with what he calls his personal liberty. —Journal of Commerce.

"IN THIS WAS MANIFESTED THE LOVE OF GOD."

BY G. A. MACKENZIE.

"Where is Thy love, my Father!" "Look afraid:

Mark the soft cloud that dreams on yonder hill—"

"Nay! from the cloud the red death leaps to kill.

And soon the inconstant year robs wold and weald

Of all their gladness." "See, then, love revealed

In thine own being, and the gifts that fill Thine easy lot!" "Thou sayest, Lord: and still

Death darkens life, joys pass, and quickly yield To pain." "Nay, then, fond soul, if love divine

Thine own life prove not; if the prospect, crowded

With loveliness, proclaim not love, the sign
In death and pain shared with thee shall be found:

To Calvary's sacred hill lift up thine eyes,
And read love's perfect proof in sacrifice."

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

"Why are you sitting here alone, and where are they all gone? Good heavens, are you ill, Rotha?"

He might have thought so by the way she uncovered her white face and looked at him, and then clung to his arm with her two hands, trembling from head to foot.

"Robert, is it really you—alive—unhurt?
Oh, Robert, Robert, what a fright you have given us! Oh, I thought it must be too terrible to be true," cried the girl, with her eyes brimming over and her face perfectly radiant.

"What is too terrible? Do you mean you have heard of the accident to the Blackcar train? I galloped round as fast as Mr. Ramsey's horse would take me, that I might arrive before any one heard of the affair. I was afraid Austin would be frightened, but I hardly thought—I hardly hoped—that—"

He did not finish his sentence, but his own face worked, and he was evidently greatly moved at this frank expression of joy at his safe return. For the moment he held the little hands tightly in his, and then with a sudden impulse lifted first one and then the other to his lips.

"I did not expect such a sweet welcome, Rotha. How could you—how could you care so much, my darling?"

But Rotha, scarlet and confounded at her own impulsive words, started away from him like a young fawn.

"Where is the vicar, Robert? We must go and tell the vicar; he has gone down to the station with Mr. Townsend."

"Come, then," said Robert, holding out his hand, with a smile.

He had no wish to take advantage of the sweet impulse that had made her cling to him. For this evening at least he would respect the shy reticence that had grown out of her impulsiveness. He walked beside her with a proud and swelling heart, but outwardly as calm and kind as ever;
but Rotha, who had overheard his last words, drooped her head and answered in monosyllables, and, as soon as she caught sight of the vicar, took shelter under his wing directly.

The vicar did not say much, but he looked from one to the other, and held out his hand to Robert with an unsteady smile.

"We have had a terrible fright, Robert, and I hear Edward Elliot told her, and so she knew it, too. I would not go through the last half-hour again for half my income.
By what providential means did you manage to miss your train?"

"Mr. Ramsey detained me, Austin; and while I was waiting on the platform, chafing like a blind fool at the tiresome delay, we got news of the collision just outside Leatham Junction; and, knowing what a horrible state you would be in, I went round to the mews where I had put Mr. Ramsey's bay mare, and rode her off to Burnley as hard as I could, and here I am."

"For His mercy endureth forever," ejaculated the vicar. "Oh, Boh, if I had been called upon to lose another brother—and you only just come home!" And Robert, touched by his agitation, linked his arm in his brother's, and the two walked away together.

The line was pretty clear by this time, and the officials informed the vicar that a special train would be ready in half an hour. So Rotha went down on the pier with the other teachers to marshal the children and hunt after stragglers. The work and the cool sea-breezes did her good, and she was successful in holding herself aloof from Robert during the return journey. She got into a different compartment, and as soon as they reached Blackcar she headed the first division of the children to the schoolhouse, where they were to receive a final bun each;
and Robert, who had to see after his horse, was left far enough behind.

house and went off alone, in reality to get herself quieted for the evening, for Mrs. Ord had made her promise to come to the vicarage to supper to talk over the events of the day.
The church was always open, and it seemed to her the quietest place. It did not matter one bit that Meg was playing there; she slipped into a dark pew by the door and listened to the solemn strains, feeling rested and soothed in spite of herself. She was so absorbed by the music and her own thoughts as well that she was quite unaware that after a time she had been followed, and that a tall, dark figure had silently entered and taken up its station near her, awed and silenced by the weird music that seemed to peal out of the semi-darkness.

Rotha rose and went out after a time, and then paused as usual by Belle's grave to readjust the wreath which always hung over the cross. Yesterday Rotha had placed a fresh one made of sweet spring flowers, but already it was withered; a mournful conviction that this withered garland was a meek emblem of Belle's unfinished life and broken hopes crept over Rotha, and, as she laid her cheek to the marble cross, where only last night Robert had rested his weary head, she said more than half aloud:

"Poor Belle, how well she loved him!
But I can understand it now. Ah, it is coming; I know it; I am sure of it, if only Gar would have had it so!"

"What is coming, Rotha? Why would Gar not have it so? Dear, I did not mean to startle you. I could not help following you here." A hand is laid softly on her arm; the voice is very calm and reassuring.

What does she fear that she lays her cheek only the closer to the marble cross, and clings more tightly to its smooth stonings.

Only a churchyard—a white gleaming cross—the moon shining from behind a bank of dark fleecy clouds; only a tale of love told over a gramy mound; only a girl listening to it with her arms entwined about the marble headstone; only the tears from happy eyes watering the dead girl's grave with dew of blessing for the living, and a voice with a tender break in it like Gar's says:

"Just one word, Rotha—one word to tell me that you have listened and heard; or, if you cannot speak, put your hand in mine and I will understand you then."

What if her hand goes out to him in the darkness? What if strong arms draw her from her stony support, and gather her close to a faithful breast? Can she check those happy tears flowing all the faster for his mute tenderness? Presently, when she grows calmer, she lifts up her face to him—that dear face which he has learned to read so clearly now—and asks him if he will take her back into the church for a little while.

And as he yields, in some little surprise, the music breaks into some grander measure, swelling triumphant down the echoing aisles; and then he understands that this is their betrothal, and kneels beside her in that mute thanksgiving prayer of hers; and then, as the music ceases and Meg leaves the organ, Rotha comes out of the porch hand in hand with Robert, and walks down with him to the vicarage.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Conclusion.

"Ah, who am I, that God hath saved
Me from the doom I did desire,
And onward the lot myself had craved,
To set me higher?
What have I done that He should bow
From heaven to choose a wife for me?
And what do I deserve He should endow
My home with thee?"—Jean Inglow.

"My story he told out; the day
Draws over his shadow, time doth overtake
The morning. That which ended, call a lay Sung after pause—a motto in the break Between two chapters of a tale not new Nor joyful, but a common tale, Adieu."
—Ibid.

They were at supper at the vicarage when they entered, but Mrs. Ord had hardly time for a reproachful exclamation before the vicar, after one glance at Rotha's happy blushing face, had jumped from his seat and had fairly taken her in his arms.

"Is it so? God bless you, my dear child.
You have made us all very happy. Won at last, and bravely too. Dear old Bobus!
There, take her to Mary."

But Mary, startled and overwhelmed by what were to her such utterly unexpected tidings, could only hold Rotha in her arms and cry over her, and hope inarticulately that she would be happy, very happy.

"That she shall be, God helping me," said Robert, quietly. "Mother Mary, are you not going to wish me happiness too?"

And, as he stooped his handsome head over her, she put back the gray waves of hair tenderly from his forehead and whispered: "Dear Robert, I am so glad, and our darling would be glad too," and then hid her face—poor Mary—on his shoulder and cried, remembering how, ten years ago, he had come to her for her sisterly congratulations.

"Dear Mary, I understand you."

It was a proof of Robert's new gentleness that he should soothe this hurt of natural feeling so patiently and kindly. Rotha was looking shy and almost sad over this little scene, but Robert presently came to her side with a quiet, happy smile, and Austin soon cheered up his wife, and the remainder of the evening passed like a delightful dream. Robert walked as usual with Rotha to her own door, but before they parted he said a grave word or two that somewhat upset her.

"I shall leave everything to you, Rotha; but do not let it be long before you become my wife. For five years I waited for a blessing which never came, and for five more I suffered almost hopelessly, and now I feel as though many of my best years are gone; but you must come to me soon, dear, and make me young again."

Rotha pondered over these words, and grew hot and cold over them, but for a little time nothing more was said to mar the beautiful serenity of those first few days when Robert and she were always together; and she learnt hour by hour to appreciate still more fully the noble nature of the man who was to be her future husband, when the traces of his past faults became beauties in her eyes, and she could realize more and more that it was good to lean on the strong arm that was to be hers through life.

Rotha had respite for a little while, during which she learnt to know herself and Robert more thoroughly, days during which Meg and Mary were never weary of praising the sweet face that had grown so calm and tranquil under its new happiness; and then came a day when Mary and the vicar came to her, and when Robert pleaded in a few manly strong words that there should be no delay, no dallying with time.

"I shall never grow younger, darling, and I think you know me well enough by this time to trust me with your happiness. I want my wife, to have her dear presence always near me, strengthening me."

And Rotha, with the look of meek love she already bore for him, slipping her little hand in his, said:

"Whenever you like, dear Robert, and the vicar wishes," and quietly yielded the point, when they all said that it was no use waiting till the autumn, but that they thought the might be ready by the middle of August, and, when it was pressed upon her, Rotha said she thought so too.

Mary and Meg soon had their hands full of delightful business, and Rotha was quite passive in their hands. She did everything that her friends thought right. One or two of the rooms in Bryn were to be remodeled for the new master, and Meg, by her own desire, was to take up her abode in the Children's Home.

Rotha took far more interest in these arrangements than in ordering her fine new dresses. She made Robert come up to Bryn and look at his old rooms before the painters and whitewashers turned everything topsyturvy. Robert was strangely moved at these evidences of his boyhood, and at Rotha's care in preserving them. He knew all about her full-grown heir by this time, for one day the vicar basely betrayed her confidence in her presence. Robert went all over Bryn, from the garret to the basement, telling Rotha many anecdotes of his old life. He made her show him Aunt Charlotte's jewels, and further stipulated that the pearls were to be worn on her wedding-day; and before he left he drew her to him, and told her in grave, tender tones how her generosity and magnanimity had humiliated him long years ago, and how the bitterness of his accusation had recoiled upon himself, and made his life for a long time barren; and how little he deserved to spend his future days under the shelter of that roof from which his bad temper and obstinacy had driven him, and how still less he deserved the crowning glory of her love.

"My future life shall be one long act of gratitude and atonement if I am spared," he finished, and Rotha, who knew his faithfulness and integrity, felt certain he would keep his words.

The summer, with its pleasant courting days, passed away only too quickly for Rotha. Robert spent all his leisure hours with her, either at Bryn or at the vicarage. He had a horse of his own now, a wedding present from Mr. Ramsay, and rode to and from Stretton every morning and evening. By and by, when it was in the stable at Bryn, a beautiful bay mare made its appearance from the same munificent donor, and Robert ordered a riding-habit from London, and taught Rotha to ride, and was not at all surprised when she made a splendid horsewoman.

"My wife does everything well," was a speech very often in Robert's mouth.

But at present Rotha had neither horse nor habit, but was quite content when Robert took her out for long country walks in the sweet summer evenings. They went over to Burnley once or twice, and Rotha told Robert all the girlish fancies she had had in the dim wintry woods.

But she loved best to take him to her Children's Home, and see him gather the children round his knee and tell them stories of the New World and its wonders; and before long Rotha found she would have a true helpmeet in all her benevolent schemes. Robert's large-heartedness and his secret ways of doing good were proverbial in the family; he threw himself into Rotha's plans for the new Home with an enthusiasm which surprised her, until she learnt more and more how his deep, still nature loved to do good for its own sake, and thought nothing too small if it could benefit a suffering brother or sister.

"You can build the Home, if you like, next summer, Rotha," he said to her one day. "I have been looking over your accounts as you wish, and I see you have a large surplus sum at the bankers, in spite of your munificent deed of gift to Reuben and Guy; and although the expenses of your two sons' education are very great, I think we can afford it, for I am a tolerably rich man now, and Laurie is going to be my charge."

"We can do so and so"—how sweet that used to sound in Rotha's ears! Never to be alone any more, to have Robert to work with her, to direct her with his man's counsel and strengthen her hands with his praise; what a rest to the lonely girl who had fought such a fierce battle, and who had accepted her bitter stewardship so bravely! No need to keep it all for him any longer, who prized one word of love from her lips more than the wealth and comforts she could give him; no need to keep it all for him when she had given herself into that faithful keeping.

It was the evening before her marriage; it had been a busy, trying day, in spite of Meg's efforts to lighten her labors; and Rotha, when she came down to Robert, looked pale and harassed, a trifle moved from her serenity. And Robert, understanding how she felt, took her down on the shore that the fresh sea-breezes might blow her fatigue away, and let her stand there silently by his side undisturbed by questioning, till the tired eyes, dazzled by pomp of finery and the unreality of bridal garments, might grow rested by the calm of summer seas and evening shadows.

It was a proof of his unselfishness that he never spoke of his own exceeding happiness, or reminded her by look or word that this was the last evening she would be Rotha Maturin. Now and then he spoke to her, but only of the scene that lay before them, till he was rewarded by seeing the ruffled brow grow calm again, and the old color come back to the weary face.

"Dear Rotha, they ought not to have let you tire yourself like this. I shall take better care of you than that."

"They could not help it, Robert; there was so much to do, and Mr. Tracy came so late. I don't mind now. I am getting rested; I always do with you," and Rotha leant gratefully on the strong arm that loved to support her.

Presently, of her own accord, she asked him if they should walk towards the churchyard, as service was over, and it would be quite quiet now. Robert answered that it was just what he wished; but that he had feared to tire her by proposing it; and then they slowly retraced their steps.

They stood for a long time silently by the marble cross, till Robert saw the tears in Rotha's eyes, and questioned her gently.

"I ought not to have brought you here to-night, my darling."

"Why not, Robert? It is so quiet and beautiful up here; and see how the soft wind sweeps over the grass, as she said. Robert, I can't help thinking of Gar to-night."

"Oh, Rotha!" he drew her towards him, sorely troubled, almost jealously; "not of Gar to-night, surely, darling."

"Happily—only happily. Nay, Robert, you never thought that. I was so wishing he could see us to-night. I think he would be so glad, Robert."

"My darling, why should we doubt it? Surely the knowledge of our happiness, if they know it, will be as precious as ever to their sainted souls. But, Rotha, I am only a poor earthly lover, and earthly love is prone to jealousy and doubt. Tell me, dearest, if at this moment one shadow of regret for the past, one fear for the future, is in your heart to-night; for, as surely as we have crossed over two graves to each other, I believe that God intended each for each and none other."

Rotha looked up in his face, a little moved by his passion.

"Do you mean if I regret Gar still, Robert?"

He made an affirmative motion, but did not trust himself to speak.

She stole her hand in his. "What do you think, Robert?"

"My darling, it is for you to answer and not I."

It was nearly dark now, and she took up the hand she held kissed it, as though that were the fittest expression of her love; but closing her suddenly in his arms, he prayed her to tell him.

"Oh, Robert, to think you need my words still! Do you know, Gar once told me that I had not given him all that was in me to give, and now I feel he was right."

"What then, love?"

"I have given it all now!" And then, speaking with her face hidden, "God has taken Gar, and for a long time I was inconsolable, now I know it was for the best; for if he had lived I should have loved him well, no doubt, but not as I shall love you." And, as he pressed her to his heart, the anguish of that doubt died away out of Robert Ord's heart for ever.

VISIONS AND DREAMS.

BY R. H. S.

We are ever visions seeing,
We are ever dreaming dreams,
As we watch the shadows fleeing,
As we stand by running streams.

Shadows show us sin and sorrow
Presently shall flee away,
Rivers, as they run, remind us
Mercies lost from day to day.

Things we see are ever turning
Into things that are unseen;
And our hearts are ever yearning
Further faith and hope to glean.

And these visions we may cherish,
For we learn from Holy Writ,
Without visions people perish,
And by visions life is lit.

If, as children, we are singing,
Happy in life's early gleams,
We shall find our old age bringing Still more happy, sunset dreams.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

The happy Christian families of native converts to be seen at some of our stations manifest the great good resulting from the early adoption of measures tending to the enlightenment and training of girls secured from heathenism. I say secured from heathenism, because such was really the case. It was found necessary to redeem the girls, i. e., pay the marriage price required by their parents according to the heathen custom, in order to have complete control over them, and secure to themselves that freedom of choice which is a privilege that heathenism deprives them of. Notwithstanding the objection that has been raised to the practice—that it tends rather to encourage and perpetuate the heathen custom—I am of the opinion that the early missionaries to Liberia acted wisely in adopting such a plan; and while I would not advise an indiscriminate adherence to it now, still, in some cases, and more especially among those tribes that have not yet been reached by the Gospel, I regard it a necessity. Where the heathen estimate their girls as so much money, and cannot perceive any good accruing from their Christian training for which they should make a sacrifice, I think, for the purpose of starting a Christian community among them, the girls might be redeemed without compromising anything on our part. The end seems here to justify the means. Of course it is not a very difficult matter to get small girls into our schools; but they will be allowed to remain only until they are paid for and demanded by their future husbands, which may be at any time between eight and sixteen years. One of the saddest things that we are forced to witness in the mission is when a girl in whom we have centered great hopes—intelligent and promising—is taken from us and carried off to become one of the wives of a heathen polygamist, whose right to her was secured by the payment of the customary dowry. The only chance left us to save the unfortunate girl is to pay the amount ourselves and thus liberate her. The amount required in each case among the tribes near Cape Palmas is about eighty dollars. To raise such a fund would be a good work for some new branch of the "Woman's Auxiliary." And a noble cause it would be, too—that of liberating their sisters far over the sea from the bondage of heathenism.

There are at present two boarding-schools in the mission for the girls—one at Cape Mount and the other at Cape Palmas. With some enlargements and improvements they can be made to answer present demands.—Bishop Ferguson's Initial Report.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

A FAMOUS RIDE.

BY M. V. W.

Nip and Tuck were two funny little boys who did nothing but laugh and play the whole day long. Their names were Lawton and Lewis, but Uncle John called them Nip and Tuck, and soon everybody else did the same. They had tops, and marbles, and wagons, and sleds to play with, but they liked playing soldier better than any other game. Uncle John bought each of them a shiny cap and a make-believe sword, and the boys had fine times playing soldier.

But one day they lost their soldier-caps, and this is how it happened:

Nip's aunt Lulu had sprained her ankle, and Nip's papa sent for the doctor, who came and drove close up to the side porch which the honeysuckle made so sweet in summer.

Nip and Tuck had been building a fort and playing soldier, too, and now they were tired and a very little bit cross; for Sambo had said they could not ride home on the big load of hay. They sat down to rest on the door-step at the carriage-house, where they could see the men down in the meadow piling up the hay. They had been watching them for a few moments when Nip said:

"Sambo is a bad, naughty man not to let us ride on the hay."

Tuck said, "Yes, indeed, he is a very naughty man. I wanted to ride on the hay, 'way up high."

"Oh pooh!" said Nip, "a load of hay isn't high."

"Yes it is," said Tuck, "it's as high, 'most, as the house."

"No it isn't," Nip answered; "it isn't any higher than the doctor's carriage."

They both sat very still for a few minutes. Then said Nip:

"Let's get on it."

"On what?" said Tuck.

"On the doctor's carriage, of course."

"Why Nipperkin! You wouldn't dare to!"

"Wouldn't I?" said Nip, in whose busy brain a plan was forming. "Just come with me, and we'll have more fun than playing soldier. Keep your hat on," he added, as Tuck was taking off his hat, preparing to follow his brother.

They went into the house and upstairs very softly, so that neither mamma, nor the doctor, nor auntie, who were in the parlor, would hear them. They went straight to mamma's room, climbed out of the window, and walked down to the very edge of the porch, over which the honeysuckle was climbing. It was easy to step from the edge down to the top of the doctor's carriage. Nip helped Tuck down first, and then Tuck gave his hand to Nip who was soon seated beside him.

"Now let's play this was a load of hay, and we were taking a ride," said Tuck.

"Let's take a ride," said Nip.

Naughty, naughty Nipperkin!

They reached down for the reins which were hung on a little hook just beneath them, and, almost without a word, Charley, the horse, started off. He walked slowly out of the gate and into the road. Then he started for home.

Tuck saw Sambo in the grain-field and said, "O, Nip, what will Sambo say!"

Nip only said "Get up!" and gave the reins a pull. The horse started off so fast that both Nip and Tuck were nearly thrown backward; but Nip clung to the reins, and Tuck managed, some how or other, to straighten himself. But his shiny soldier-cap, with the gilt cord and acorns on it, tumbled off and into the road and the wheel went over it.

When Sambo heard such a clattering on the road, he stopped mowing, and turned to see what was coming.

Then he said "Bress my soul!" and threw down his scythe to run as fast as he could after the runaway.

But the horse was growing tired, and before long Sambo caught up with the carriage, and brought Charley to a standstill. Then he stood up in the carriage and lifted Tuck down and then Nip; and Nip's soldier-cap, which had stayed on until this, all of a sudden rolled out on the road and into some muddy water. But Sambo looked so very sober that Nip didn't dare to say a word to him about it.

When all three were seated in the carriage, Sambo took the reins, turned the horse around, and drove back with two of the meekest little boys you ever saw.

They reached home safely, and Sambo told all about the boys' adventure. Mamma listened with a very pale face. There were tears in auntie's eyes when she said:

"O boys! how could you!"

The doctor said, "It's a mercy no bones were broken."

But mamma only hugged them closer to her, and, would you believe it, she didn't say a single word!

BILLY BICKERSTAFF'S REVENGE.

Billy Bickerstaff, as he started off to school, was in a high state of indignation and trying to think how to have his revenge on his aunt for boxing his ears, when he saw Bobby Blackhurst, aged thirteen, and Tommy Timpkins, aged eleven, coming up the road.

"I shan't go to school one step to-day," cried Billy, relating his grievances. I've a good notion to make Aunt Jem think I'm dead—drowned, or something to scare her—the hateful old thing! Say, boys, let's go on the mountain nutting! And let's not come back all night. It'll scare Aunt Jem half to death!"

The other boys agreed to the proposition at the risk of a good whipping when they returned; and without further parley they set forth.

The mountain for which they were bound rose high and precipitous before them, and was covered to the top with the most glowing red foliage the sun ever shone upon. The woods on its sides and summits were thick, not only with chestnut trees but also with hickories and butternuts.

In accordance with the advice of Bobby Blackhurst, whose superior age and experience rendered him the leader of the expedition, they proceeded to a point half way up the mountain where there was a clear spring of water; and there they established their camp and left their books and dinner-pails.

They then went on to a group of chestnut trees further up the mountain.

Billy Bickerstaff forgot his revenge when he saw the ground under the trees just covered with nuts; and they all forgot the whippings they expected.

"Ain't been anybody here yet," cried Bobby Blackhurst, as they began filling their hats with nuts. "Say, Billy, ain't you glad you got mad with your Aunt Jiminy?"

"Yes," returned Billy. "I don't care now, only she ain't going to get none o' these nuts. I'll pay her!"

As soon as they had filled their hats they decided to return to camp and build a fire to roast their nuts at once.

"By jingo! we haven't any matches!" exclaimed Billy Bickerstaff in dismay.

"Yes we have, though!" cried Bobby Blackhurst. "See! I've got a lot! Ketch me getting left that way! Tommy Timpkins, you can make yourself useful piling up brush, can't ye? 'Cause Bill 'n I've got to cut the nuts, so they won't hop out o' the fire"; and while Bobby and Billy seated themselves on a log to make small incisions in the shell of the nuts, so that when the hot coals expanded the air inside it could find escape without any explosion, Tommy Timpkins set about piling up the dry brush.

When the nuts were ready and the brush-heap properly arranged, Bobby Blackhurst claimed the honor of setting reduced to a large bed of red-hot coals ready for roasting the nuts.

"Let's boil some, too, Bobby," said Billy, watching the nuts, as they roasted on the glowing coals. "We can boil 'em in our dinner pails."

"That's so!" exclaimed Bobby. "They're elegant boiled."

"Let's eat our dinner now," said Tommy.

They ate their dinner, topped off with roasted chestnuts (which they did not succeed in getting out of the fire without burning their fingers all around a few times apiece), then they filled one of their pails with water from the spring, and, putting more nuts in it, left it on the fire to boil, and with the other pails they returned to the chestnut trees to gather more nuts, having first taken off their jackets and left them in camp.

As to whether they should carry out the original programme and stay all night in the woods, to scare Billy's Aunt Jemima, they were in somewhat of a quandary. Billy had, in a great measure, recovered from his thirst for revenge; but they were all three agreed that it would be splendid fun to keep up the fire and sleep in their camp all night.

"I'd like it like anything!" cried Bobby.

"So would I!" cried Billy.

"So would I!" chimed in Tommy.

"Only we ain't got nothing more to eat but nuts," said Bobby, prudently.

Then there was one more consideration. Staying out all night would greatly enhance their prospects for the expected thrashing. On the whole they thought, matters being just as they were, perhaps it would be rather better if they went back this time, and next time they would bring along enough to eat to last them (till they wanted to go back.

It was about three o'clock in the afternoon when they reached this decision. Their hats, handkerchiefs, and dinner-pails were full of nuts, and so were their craws; for they had eaten chestnuts roasted and chestnuts boiled all day. Before going back, they wanted to visit a group of butternut trees higher up on the mountain.

The sun was already beginning to go down when they reached the butternuts; and the air was growing chilly; but the

it off, and in less than half a minute they had a crackling, roaring fire which sent showers of red sparks high up into the air, amidst the dry branches of the surrounding trees, and threw out such a torrid heat, the boys were forced to keep at a distance.

"Look out you don't set the woods afire," cried Billy Bickerstaff. "These is Aunt Jem's woods, and I've had 'nough of her lickings!"

"No danger o' that!" responded Bobby Blackhurst, confidently. "This ain't the first time I've built a fire in the woods. I ain't so green! Tommy, you oughter a' got more chunkier wood. This brush won't make the kind o' coals we want to roast chestnuts."

"I can get ye lots o' chunks, if that's what ye want, then," replied Tommy, running off with alacrity.

"I reckon you'll call these 'ere chunks!" he exclaimed proudly, as he returned with an armful of thick sticks.

"That's the ticket!" returned Bobby. In a short time their fire had been boys were too active to miss their jackets, which were still in camp.

Suddenly, Tommy Timpkins, who had grown tired and was sitting on a log eating nuts, cried out:

"Oh, oh! Look, look! the woods is afire! Look how the dead leaves is a burning!"

And sure enough, great red flames of fire came rolling and leaping up the mountain with such swiftness that before the other boys could think how it happened, or exchange a word with each other, it was almost upon them. Not a word did they speak, but scampering for their lives, they ran in a different direction, and pausing a moment they looked back upon the flames, which licked up the dry autumn leaves on the ground and whirling and turning about sprang into the underbrush, and blazing higher, seized upon the dry moss on the trees, and shooting out in every direction upon each limb, it flew roaring and crackling to the very top.

"Our camp-fire set it," cried Bobby Blackhurst. "Our jackets and books 'll be burnt up!"

"And our dinner-pails and nuts!" cried Tommy Timpkins.

"And this is Aunt Jem's woods! How mad she'll be," cried Billy Bickerstaff.

"Let's get our things, quick!" cried Bobby. "Come on! Foller me!"

They started towards their camp in a round about direction, but they had taken scarcely a dozen steps when the wind shifted and drove the fire again directly upon them, and again they were forced to run for their lives.

"We'll have to get out o' this, fellers!" cried Bobby Blackhurst. "We'll have to go down on the other side. Our jackets is gone up, I reckon, and our books and nuts, too!"

And so they were, long before Tommy Timpkins gave the first notice of the fire.

Casting one rueful glance behind them toward the direction of their cherished nuts, and not oblivious of the increased probability of the expected thrashing occasioned by the destruction of their jackets and other things, they started down the mountain in the opposite direction from which they had come up; but in a moment the fire came rushing on behind them.

The wind, always high on the mountain, had risen to a fierce gale, shifting at every moment in all directions. The trees blazed and crackled over their heads, flaming brands of fire were showered all around them, and the dead leaves and dry moss burned to their very feet. In whatever direction they turned great gusts of flame followed them, the smoke nearly strangled them, and made their eyes smart so they could scarcely see, the heat was overpowering, and, terrified and bewildered, the poor boys were in peril of their lives.

Tommy Timpkins began to cry aloud. Hearing this Bobby Blackhurst who, up to this moment, could scarcely keep from crying himself, being aroused to a sense of superiority, made one superhuman effort of mind, and succeeded in thinking of a way out of the danger.

Grasping Tommy Timpkins by the hand, and shouting to Billy Bickerstaff: "This way, Billy!" he started toward a solid ledge of rocks at one side of the mountain.

There was a series of shelves in the side of the ledge at the upper part, and the boys had all three climbed down upon them many a time, as far as they could go, which was about twenty feet from the top. The remainder of the distance to the bottom was a perpendicular descent of fifty or sixty feet to another great ledge.

The top of the ledge was quickly reached, and the boys, looking frantically behind them upon the pursuing flames, hurriedly dropped themselves down from one shelf to another till they reached the lowest.

"I guess we're safe now!" cried Bobby, in vindictive triumph, trembling a'over from head to foot.

"I guess the fire can't burn this old ledge!" cried Billy Bickerstaff in the same tearful, spiteful tones. "I guess she can't!"

But their troubles were by no means over. The flames reached to the very edge of the rock, leaped down upon the dry shoots growing between the crevices, seized upon the brush at the sides, and then reached the gully at the bottom, and soon the flames of the trees burning beneath them shot up fierce and hot into the air. The heat and smoke were agonizing, and at last even Bobby Blackhurst, no longer caring whether he acted the booby or not, joined the others in their loud lamentations.

The sun went down, the wind rose higher, and the fires raged fiercely all night long. It was a grand spectacle to behold—the mountain ablaze! But the poor boys huddled together on the narrow shelf of rock, hungry, sleepy, and struggling for breath amidst the smoke and heat, saw nothing in the scene to admire.

"If somebody would only come and find us!" wailed Tommy Timpkins.

"Somebody'll find us, sure," returned Bobby Blackhurst. "Miss Bickerstaff'll get people to save the woods, and the whole village'll turn out and be up here fighting fire 'fore long. What you think, Billy, won't your Aunt Jem try to save the woods?"

"I don't know. I s'pose so," mournfully replied Billy, with too much smoke in his eyes to care about the woods or his Aunt Jem, or even to think what chance there was for rescue.

"I think she will," said Bobby hopefully.

And he was right. Miss Bickerstaff was up and about at the first word of alarm, and, sending in every direction for help, she was making vigorous efforts to save her wood-lot. Toward daylight the next morning the neighbors and villagers who had come to her assistance reached the ledge, and discovered the missing boys for whom they had been searching.

"If your Aunt Jem goes to lick you, Billy, you can tell her I set the woods afire," said Bobby Blackhurst at parting. "You know I lighted the match, 'cause you hadn't any. She can't lick me!"

Miss Jemina, however, had no idea whatever of "licking" her nephew for setting the woods afire, an occasional box on the ear being the only chastisement she was ever in the habit of inflicting upon that wayward youth. The whole party, in fact, received no further punishment than what they had already undergone; but they were forever agreed that staying in the woods all night was not such fun after all.

SCIENCE.

THE Metropolitan Underground Railway, in London, has adopted an electric station indicator, which shows in every compartment of the train the name of the station to which it is approaching. The apparatus is simple and easily managed, and it is to be regretted that our railways do not adopt it.

A MAGNESIAN limestone found at the entrance of the Tyne, England, is so flexible that thin layers of it three feet or more long may be bent into a circle when damp, and will retain the form when dry. It is more flexible than itacolumite, a sandstone existing in Georgia and the two Carolinas.

CURIOUS silicious pebbles are numerous in the quaternary gravels of the valley of the Loire, France, which are hollow, and contain, with a loose, stony nucleus, water, which can be heard striking against the walls of the cavity. M. Mennier can account for the presence of the water only by its seeping through the pores, as there is no sign of a crack.

SOME twenty Edison lamps were recently tested as to their durability under a continuous current of electricity, and all but one of them survived during the 1,065 hours of the trial. Of the Weston lamps, six in twenty survived. A Stanley-Thompson lamp lasted during the same number of hours. Incandescent electric lighting is still in its infancy, and future tests may bring other and better results.

TEN drachms of chloroform with ten and a half drachms of non-vulcanized caoutchouc cut in small shreds, to which when the solution is completed two and a half drachms of mastic are added, makes a transparent cement of great tenacity and without any yellow tinge. It should be allowed to macerate from eight to ten days without the application of any heat, the stoppered bottle in which it is kept being shaken at intervals.

MANY porous stones in good capillary condition can suck a wound, as it is called, with considerable power, and hence, probably, arose the superstition of the malstone. The same principle is seen in the boy's dab of mud, applied to relieve the pain of a hornet sting, and in the use of clay moistened with naphtha, ether, or oil of turpentine, to draw grease from clothing, or in the use of powdered chalk for a mosquito bite.

It is stated that steel articles can be perfectly preserved from rust by putting a lump of freshly burnt lime in the case or drawer where they are kept. The lime need not be renewed for a long time, as it can absorb much moisture. This will be found especially valuable for specimens of iron when fractured. Articles in use may be kept in a box nearly filled with pulverized slake lime, care being taken to rub them well with a linen cloth before using.

ART.

A STATUE of Victor Hugo is to be erected at Besancon, his birthplace, and a tomb in the Pantheon.

GIFFORD's palette comprised but six colors, white, cadmium, raw sienna, burnt sienna, permanent blue and vermilion. It is unusually restricted.

MR. ALBERT GUERRY has been summoned to Washington to paint a likeness of the President, to whom the published portraits do not do justice.

THE receipts of the last French Salon were $70,000, a large increase over the preceding year. Of the 1,343 exhibitors 389 were foreigners, and of these 98 were Americans.

A CHAYON portrait of Schiller, made by the Meiningen painter, Reinhard, has been discovered at Gunningen, in Germany. Schiller himself speaks of this portrait as being a very good likeness.

A. A. MCGOER of Chicago has recently purchased Meissonier's Vedette for $15,000. He is now in Europe to purchase pictures as the nucleus of an art gallery in Chicago, which shall equal any gallery in the country. Mr. Mungler is a man of large means and can carry out his purpose.

It is pleasing to know that the art treasures of the Vatican are made more accessible to the public, and that copies are allowed to be made of some of the most valuable. A copy, or mold rather, of the Venus of Callias was made two years ago, and more recently three tapestries from Raphael's designs, of which the cartoons are lost, have been copied.

THE Art Student's League has issued its programme of classes for 1885-6. Its teachers are among our best artists, and it is open to all who have attained the required standard in drawing. Unlike the Academy its Board of Control is made up of artists of both sexes. Every department of art is represented in the League, and we are not surprised to learn that last year it had more than four hundred students.

THE class of 1885 has presented to the law library of Columbia College a window of stained glass representing Sophocles, and executed by Louis C. Tiffany & Co. It is intended to fill all the windows with representative men of letters, the first two subjects selected being Homer and Sophocles. The window is beautiful both in design and execution, the whole being in selected mosaic of opalescent and antique glass with the colors so fused into the material as to be imperishable. No paint has been used except in the flesh and hair.

THE music world is just now undergoing unprecedented disturbances. Only a few years ago the detestable opera bouffe seemed to have fastened itself hopelessly upon a demoralized public, flooding society with indecency and profanity, while it supplanted the higher ranges of lyric art. It will unhappily cling while its constituency remains, and such a constituency is a sorrowful permanency in all great cities. But the nobler art just now displays unwonted vitality, and to no man is it so deeply indebted as to the late Dr.

Damrosch. It was peculiarly his mission to strip away the meretricious, and demoralising from lyric art, and present the higher forms of musical drama as an intelligent and wholesome recreation.

THE greater types of the Italian school have ceased to concentrate and to hold the music loving masses. Only a handful of luxurious "society" people cling to the usual brief and unprofitable Italian season. The opera bouffe, too, comes and goes like an epidemic pest. But the great masters of the musical drama have come to stay, both at the Metropolitan where the Damrosch triumphs of last year seem likely to be renewed year after year, as well as at the old Academy.

FOR Mr. Thomas insensibly drifted into the Damrosch wake, finding that the classic and nobler forms of opera not only grow in popular estimation but that they are remunerative, and thrive without the costly stimulus of large private subscriptions.

So while Beethoven, Mozart, Cherubini, Wagner, Weber, Gounod and other related composers, will fill the Metropolitan season, quite a new yet parallel movement is announced under the direction of Mr. Thomas, for the old Academy under the somewhat audacious title of The New American Opera. Mr. Thomas and his supporters, while presenting a repertory almost identical with that of the Metropolitan, propose the engagement of exclusively American artists for solo and chorus. To be sure the soloists are all drawn from European schools. Even the creation of an American ballet is under way, although the classic opera could well afford to dispense with such a barbaric adjunct. In any event the old, frivolous, preposterous Italian opera goes to the wall, and two thrifty well-considered undertakings for the production of the master pieces of lyric art appeal to a large and more intelligent musical public.

Plainly enough we have reached a tide in musical affairs where both popularity and thrift demand a steadily improving class of compositions, and so far the people are gainers. But very serious consequences threaten elsewhere. First, it is not yet clear that the Oratorio Society which Dr. Damrosch created and brought to such a remarkable proficiency, will be able to resume its work. The breaking up of such an organization would be a positive calamity. And yet again, Mr. Thomas' Chorus Society, which was established in competitive rivalry with the Oratorio Society, and which has made a brilliant record, is also threatened with dissolution, on account of the director's multiplied preoccupations. It lies in the highest interest of art that both associations live and thrive.

MR. Van der Stucken, whose delightful novelty concerts of last winter gained an enviable popularity, is organizing a chorus of mixed voices for the interpretation of cantatas, motets and other concerted works; and it is intimated that native composers are to have a generous place, hereafter, in the scholarly programmes of this brilliant director, who, if we mistake not, is certain of a higher distinction in our musical world.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1885.

THE American Minister to England, who is representing this country most admirably in his speeches, in a recent address to workingmen said: "that their own interests required that they should not create a struggle against capital; that the interest of one class depends upon the success of another." This is thoroughly sound, and it is equally true whether addressed to wagemen or to employers. Religion and social good both require that the rich and poor alike should be unselfish.

ERROR often gains strength by being dressed in plausible language. For instance, there is something attractive in the plea of the advocates of disestablishment in England, who propose to disendow the English Church. They say that they are to take the money from the Church and devote it to education. This really means that they will take it from religious and confine it to secular education. They seek to have the education of the heart give place to the education of the mind.

THERE is a struggle going on in this State over the religious care of convicts and others who are cared for by the State.

It is the misfortune of religion that her friends are divided and that those who profess to care for her interests cannot agree among themselves.

What blame can be attached to the State if it finds itself unable to decide between the claims of opposing parties in religious matters and casts all religion out of its institutions? "Cannot all who profess and call themselves Christians be led into the way of truth and hold the faith in unity of spirit and in the bond of peace?"

THE SIN OF OMISSION.

The summer is ended. Pastor and people are again in their respective places. The work of the Church is now to be resumed with renewed vigor. Those who seriously have at heart Christ's work in the world are, now especially, thinking who around them are willing to be workers together with God in the salvation of the world. Alas that there should be such a sad discrepancy between the real workers in the Church and her mere adherents.

It makes the heart beat quicker and the pulse to throb faster to think of what might be done, and would be done, if all who have good-will to Zion would only make it manifest by trying to come up to the full measure of their duty and responsibility. It is certainly safe to say that the efficient working force of the Church would be, at once, increased a hundred fold if even her better sort of adherents could be brought to appreciate the fact that they are quite as accountable for sins of omission as for those of commission.

In the great majority of parishes the really efficient workers are proverbially "the faithful few" while mere adherents are comparatively many. Yet they are, in the main, made up of estimable men and women who would gladly see the Church not only prosper, but become a great and mighty power among men. They are more or less conscious of what it could be and ought to be, of what it might do and therefore ought to do, but they sadly fail to appreciate their individual accountability—yes, culpability—for not doing what they might in the work of the world's conversion. They will admit, readily enough, that they are accountable for what they have done, but they have no sort of sufficient consciousness of the fact that they are no less accountable for not doing what they might have done. In a vague way they, somehow, seem to suppose that it is enough for them that they abstain from doing this and that.

They do not remember that they should strive to attain to every possible duty, that in the day of judgment they will be none the less responsible for what they might have done but did not. They know well enough that in the common things of life neglect is irreparable, and yet they seem to suppose that it will be otherwise with them in that day which will decide the sum total of this world's work and their small share in it. The boy at school is indeed to abstain from doing certain things, but not merely or chiefly that. He is to attain to certain things. And so, too, all through life success lies in what we do, not in what we refrain from doing. The husbandman who sows no seed reaps no harvest. The man who improves no opportunity gets no gain. "Fifty years ago," we hear it said. "I could have bought half the land that Chicago lies on." Yes, then, no doubt, but not now. "Inasmuch as ye did it not" is certainly a law that rules inexorably here. We have the Lord's word for it that it is a law that will obtain forever. The judgment that shall be endless will, for the one class, rest on the fact that "ye did it," and for the other that "ye did it not." "and these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."

This is what people should by God's grace be brought to appreciate. Among the adherents of the Church there is wealth enough, and to spare, as well as intelligence, ability, gifts, all needful powers. The great trouble is that in the case of the many these gifts and powers are not consecrated to God, and so are of little or no avail in the work of His Church. That wealth is only too often wasted selfishly or hoarded meanly, and the intellect and gifts that should be given to God wasted on the world apparently without a thought that the chief danger lies not so much in what men do as in what they leave undone.

GENERAL MISSIONARIES.

We lately called attention to the successful experiment of the Bishop of Western Michigan in the employment of a diocesan missionary. In other dioceses the plan has turned out so satisfactorily in its results as to be no longer a tentative measure. We have such confidence in its effectiveness, in the promotion of the missionary work of the Church, that we ventured to say that even the plea of poverty could not justify its neglect. We have been strengthened in this opinion by noting the action of the Diocese of Florida in its last annual council.

If any diocese could regretfully plead poverty as an excuse for not making use of this means in the prosecution of its missionary work, surely Florida might. But not so. It proves itself alive to its grand opportunity.

In the opinion of Bishop Whipple, Florida "presents the finest field for missionary work in America," and surely the Bishop of Minnesota is authority in the matter. His indefatigable work amid the rigors of his northern diocese has for several winters compelled him to seek brief rest and recuperation in the balmy climate of Florida. He has had ample opportunity to know whereof he speaks.

That the Church in Florida appreciates her calling is apparent in the recent report of her missionary board. Its receipts—larger than those of many a far richer diocese—showed a marked increase over those of the preceding year. The report says: "The stipends of all missionaries have been paid promptly each quarter," and, again: "In conformity with the Canon on Missions, passed at the last council, the bishop, in consultation with the Board, appointed the Rev. C. S. Williams General Missionary, on a salary of $1,500 per annum. From this appointment the Board expects large results in the future, and the labors of the missionary strengthen this expectation."

The report of the Committee on the State of the Church, made at the same council, is further justification of the action of the bishop and his missionary board in so generously providing for a general missionary. It says: "The entire aspect of the diocese is cheering. The incoming multitudes from all divisions of the world would have been met by the Church in many counties in efforts to provide for their spiritual wants. The welcome accorded to the Church by all persons, irrespective of previous association and training, is remarkable and encouraging."

If the comparatively poor Diocese of Florida can so generously sustain a diocesan missionary, can richer dioceses longer afford to neglect so important an agency for the extension of the Church?

TEN YEARS OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.

In a recent issue we referred to the fact that the Foreign Committee, when it closed its books on the first of September, was able to show a surplus in the treasury of three hundred dollars, after every obligation had been provided for. We have compiled some statistics of our foreign missionary work during the last decade, which seem to show that its operations are being very rapidly extended, and that it is receiving a much greater and more general support from the Church at home than ever before. The whole amount of money received by the committee between the years 1875 and 1885 was sixty per cent. greater than the total for the ten years next preceding. The receipts for 1885 were more than double those of 1875. Though the contributions for Church purposes in all the dioceses and missionary districts as given in the Church Almanac for 1885 were less than twenty-five per cent. greater than in 1875.

The number of parishes and missions contributing has also increased by about fifty per cent., though the number of new parishes formed within that time has been relatively small.

The work in the foreign field which these offerings have gone to support has also made great progress.

The number of missionary workers has increased three-fold, and the value of missionary property, including residences, schools, hospitals, etc., has at least doubled. The ordinations of natives to the Holy Ministry during this decade has been twice the whole number ordained in the forty years preceding, while the record of baptisms and confirmations is a cheering one.

We congratulate the committee and its secretary on this excellent showing. Reflecting that in 1870 the committee was in debt for $41,000 of borrowed money, besides liabilities to a large amount for current expenses of each mission, and that now they have gone out free from debt while sustaining a work of more than double the proportions of that of the former date, their success seems extraordinary, and should receive grateful recognition from the Church.

Total receipts for Foreign Missions, 1875-1885: $1,515,108.84; 1867-1875: $912,150.21.

Offerings for all purposes in 1875 (Walker's Almanac): $7,566,573.50; same in 1885: $9,042,628.84.

Receipts.—1875: $97,627.56: number of parishes and missions contributing, 946; 1885: $198,327.94; number of parishes and missions contributing, 1,417; total receipts for the decade: $1,515,108.84.

Missionaries.—1875-1885: China—1875, 28; 1885, 99. Japan—1875, 8; 1885, 46; Africa—1875, 30; 1885, 37. Greece—1875, 13; 1885, 13. Haiti—1875, 10; 1885, 52. Total for 1875, 89; 1885, 247.

Ordinations.—1875-1885: China, 14; Japan, 3; Africa, 4; Haiti, 11; Mexico, 18. Total, 50. Total number of ordinations previous to 1875, 23.

Confirmations.—1875-1885, 1808; 1865-1875, 737.

Baptisms.—1875-1885, 3,109; 1865-1875, 1,907.

Value of Property, 1870—When valuation first reported, and not then complete, and that of Haiti not reported, about $113,517.00; 1885, $229,789.00.

The above figures do not include any report from the work in Cuba in charge of Bishop Young, and for which the board appropriated $3,000 in the past year. From very imperfect reports from the Mexican Church while the board was making appropriations for it, it was gathered that there were 613 baptisms in four years, and 619 confirmations in three years.

THE CHURCH OF LAW AND THE LAW OF THE CHURCH.

(After specific charges as to Uniformity of Worship and Discipline, the charge of the Bishop of Western New York was thus concluded.)

With these understandings, then, as ministers of the Church of Law, our practical conscience must be guided by the Holy Scriptures: "Let your moderation be known unto all men." "Let all things be done unto edifying," "decently and in order," according to established "custom" and the primitive "Churches of God." "Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory," "giving none offence," as "Christ pleased not Himself." These and others of like import. But, taking account with human nature, we may learn much from accepted maxims of human wisdom. The man of tact and of good taste always exemplifies these of the sayings: (1) "Simplex munditiis," (2) "Ne quid nimis," (3) "Qui nil molitur inepte." He feels the force, that is, of Shakespeare's equivalents: (1) "Neat not gaudy," (2) "Speak no more than is set down . . . o'erstep not the modesty of nature," (3) "Be thou familiar but by no means vulgar, nor give to unproportioned thought his act." In all this is reflected the character of the Anglican Church, as contrasted with Churches in which tawdry finery symbolizes anything but Christ-like virginity of spirit. How instinctively the Christian matron adorns herself with consummate taste and simplicity, avoiding all that is out of place, unmeet for the time, unsuited to circumstances. How absolutely a man advertises himself by ostentatious jewelry, heavy rings on coarse fingers, and a stunning exhibition of ornament, like "the purple patch," which Horace satirizes, or like the South-Sea Islander, who stole the scarlet coat of Captain Cook, glittering with decorations, but wore it without the requisite accompaniment for nether nakedness. So some in our day have introduced a showy vestment, without the balance of parts which alone makes it symmetrical and suitable. It cannot be harmonized with the inartificial decorum of our solemnities. "Reform it altogether." Let us cultivate in the house of God, the same dignity of attire and of furniture which marks the home of well-nurtured respectability as contrasted with the abode of newly-acquired riches, where everything is spattered over with gilding and profuse display. A competent critic of such things was Madame de Staël, who, in speaking of the Holy Week at Rome, strikingly contrasts the severe grandeur of the Anglican ritual with the gaudy and wearisome ostentation of Italian parade and ceremony.

Here let me remind those who have a fancy for excessive ornament and decoration of two important points that must be taken into the reckoning. (1.) We are surrounded by an alien and meretricious system which calls itself "Catholic," and which indulges in unbounded display. We cannot deny that such excess belongs to it, and is no part of our primitive profession. Our profession is to adhere to the pure theakria of the virgin age of the Church: theirs is the attire of the Marozias and Theodoras, and of the age which gave the Papacy its monstrous birth. In the matter of show they have the claim and the possession. Shall we imitate like monkeys, or let it alone like men? That is the practical question. Let it be theirs. When men's minds are turned upon the contrast, let them say:—"Here is the religion of the Fathers and of the Nicene age, and there is the corruption of Feudalism and of the Ages that were Dark." (2.) The other point is that "there is but a step from the sublime to the ridiculous," and that the plan of gorgeous decoration and attire can only be sustained by enormous expense. Hence, while the accumulated profusion of centuries often gives the Ceremonial of Romanism a splendor that is real because it is costly, in the majority of cases the show is merely theatrical, made up of tinsel and perforated paper, of artificial flowers and tawdry finery, which degrade the mind that can tolerate it. Reflect, that every mission station must be attended with vastly increased expenditure, or must sink into baby-house display, if we adhere not to the pure white raiment and chaste simplicity that has heretofore been our glory and has preserved the meek majesty of our Ceremonial alike from poverty and excess.

But, to return to "weightier matters of the Law." To understand Catholic Law, we must understand Catholicity. If we would define a practical Catholicity in few words, let us note the test of Catholicity, by which the holy Bishop Ken has supplemented the Vincentian Canon, Quod Semper, etc. If they could but be wakened to the Comprehensive Truth it unfolds, it would emancipate the enslaved prelatry of the Papal Obedience. Hear then, the majestic words of that saintly confessor's last will and testament: "As for my religion, I die in the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Faith professed by the whole Church, before the division of East and West. More particularly, I die in the Communion of the Church of England as it stands distinguished from all Papal and Puritan innovation, and as it adheres to the doctrine of the Cross." Precious words. In modern times they have never been surpassed for felicity of expression and for condensation of thought. In this blessed spirit of fidelity to Scripture and Catholicity, let us live like Ken and like him be steadfast unto death. Let there be no effort to square our practices with external standards. Let us suffer nothing ambiguous to qualify our conduct or our words. Let our position be well-defined so that he who runs may read. For myself, as a student of Theology, I was nurtured in this School of unadulterated Catholic principle; I have never known any other; in this, by God's help I intend to die, and nobody shall ever mistake my meaning when I profess myself a Catholic, in the Communion of the Catholic Church of America.

1. Now, by Bishop Ken's criterion we are able to settle certain momentous questions, which perpetually embarrass the popular mind, and which even learned men, who have lacked this key, have failed to solve, or at least to make clear to the minds of others. For, apply this key to the whole perplexing mystery of the Western separation, and it thus unfolds itself. Just at the moment, when there was peril of a universal "falling-away," the great Head of the Church permitted a functional Schism to put a stop to General Councils. Supposing the Deutero-Nicene Council (A.D. 787) had been received by the Western Church as it was by the Eastern, then it would have been truly a Council Oecumenical, and the Catholic Church would have been committed to the heresy of Image-Worship. Our great High-Priest interposed. The Council of Frankfurt counterbalanced that pseudo-Council of the Orient, and, under the lead of Anglican Orthodoxy, rejected the leprosy of superstition. This was the real epoch of that division of East and West which is noted by Ken; and, deplorable as such a division must be, it saved the whole Church from apostasy, and must be recognized as coincident with the mysterious Providence of old, which permitted the schism between Judah and Ephraim. The Mosaic Church was thus delivered from an entire lapse into idolatry; and not only so, but Ten Tribes of Israel were saved from corporate participation in the guilt of rejecting and crucifying the Messiah.

As defined by Bishop Ken, the Canons of Catholicity accord to the Anglican Communion in our day the fore-front of Christendom. Here God has placed us, not as the antagonist of other Churches, but as a Witness to all Churches in behalf of Catholic restoration. In our testimony for Unity and our efforts to regain it, there is no self-assertion, no lust of self-aggrandizement. We assert the spirit of Unity as the spirit of Christ, and we seek to ensue it as a duty to God and one of primary obligation. It is the spirit of that all-embracing Charity, without which we are nothing. In maintaining this position we are content to be as "a little one," a mere Zoar, if such be God's will. We have no lust for dominion, no craving for mere numbers, without Truth. But it has pleased God to give us numerical importance even in the eyes of men. However few, even in this land, we exert a commanding influence, but, in a world-wide survey, there is a true sublimity already accorded to us by Providence. The Patriarchate of Canterbury (so to speak) is felt everywhere, and is far greater than the whole of Christendom in the Nicene Age. In superficial extent it is universal: "Its sound has gone out into all lands, and its words to the ends of the world." And here is the strength and reality of her influence: she exacts nothing as essential to Catholic Unity which was not deemed essential in the days of Athanasius. Let other Churches revert to the Nicene Constitutions, and there we meet one and all. Unity is restored at once; external, visible unity, I mean, for Organic Unity has never been forfeited. Christ has never suffered the Catholic Episcopate to be lost, nor the Creed to be extinguished, nor the Holy Scriptures to be rejected in any remnant of the ancient Churches. Rome itself has never destroyed the underlying Catholicity of the Latin Churches. As Latin Churches they exist in the Cyprianic integrity of the Episcopate. As a Romanized Communion they are subjected to a superincumbent burden of Decretalism, which may be sloughed off like a leprosy, to leave them fresh as Naaman when he was seven times purified in Jordan. This Decretalism was what we threw off in the sixteenth century. This is what the Old Catholics are shedding at this moment. Make your people understand that the Anglican Reformation made us Catholics by emancipating us from this Decretalism, and from the Church establishment of the Carolingian Empire. At the same period this establishment enlarged itself into the modern system known as "the Roman Catholic Church," which was created at the Council of Trent, and with which the Anglican Church never had any communion whatever.

(2). Canons and usages may be good and expedient if they do not conflict with the Nicene and other Catholic Constitutions; but no usage or rite or law of any Eastern or Western Church or Council is of any Catholic authority since the epoch of division. The thoughtful student will see that the Council of Frankfurt (A. D. 794) is the pivot of history in this respect. It rejected the debased legislation of the Eastern Council of A. D. 787, and saved the Church from the universal taint of Idolatry. It cleared the way for what was called Gallicanism in France and Anglicanism in England, and made the Reformation of the sixteenth century a logical necessity. For convenience of date, however, let us consider the epoch of Ken's rule coincident with that of the Western Empire A. D. 800, for the Council of Frankfurt was called by Charlemagne a little before, and the establishment of his imperial system enabled Nicholas (A. D. 856) to promulgate the forged Decretals, and, by forcing them on the West, to create the Papacy. The Papal System, therefore, is the product of Feudalism, and cannot assert itself except under the despotic forms of the "Holy Roman Empire," now rapidly disappearing. Imported into this country, the Papal System is an anachronism, and cannot be reconciled with our free institutions. It must perish from America, or the Republic must perish in its coils. It is an alien religion, and as such must, sooner or later, antagonize our countrymen. Its premature grasping at political power is fortunate for us, as it must bring on the crisis before it is too late. Meantime, I have little anxiety as to the ultimate issues. That which Italy abhors, which France has virtually abolished, and which Germany is casting out, will never enslave America. The people who have freed Italy from Papal despotism were all born and bred under her supremacy, and I make no doubt that when the time comes, millions among us, now nominally under the foreign yoke, will assert their freedom, and give an Old Catholic emancipation to their fellow-religionists. When that day comes our own Mission may have been fulfilled; and the Catholic regeneration of this continent may be brought about, by a new and all embracing organization, into which we shall rejoice to be absorbed, if so the Gospel of Jesus Christ may be universalized and the Church restored to unity in the Confession of the Faith, as it was from the beginning.

(3). By the same rule, we learn to discriminate in Catholic Law, between (1.) Laws Organic and Universal, (2.) Laws Functional and Local, and (3.) Laws Specific and Temporary. Now, (1.) Laws Organic can never become obsolete; they are of Apostolic origin, and have the accumulated force of the Vincentian Test, the quod semper, the quod ubique and the quod ab omnibus. Take e. g., this Canon of Constantinople (A. D. 381.) "The Faith of the 318 Fathers assembled at Nicea, in Bithynia, shall not be set aside, but shall stand fast."

Again (2.) Laws Functional and Local are perhaps useful in their day and may furnish a precedent for local Churches; but, apart from Organic laws, to which they may be auxiliary, they are not Catholic nor imperishable. Of such, a memorable example is that of the Sardican Canon (A. D. 347) by which the Bishop of Old Rome was allowed to permit a new trial in certain cases, if a bishop in certain provinces should complain of an unjust sentence. This canon was of local application and force, and by conferring a limited jurisdiction on the great See of the West, is sufficient proof that no such jurisdiction belonged to it, or was recognized before. It was never truly Catholic, however, and perished alike under the protests of Western bishops and the forged Decretals of the Roman See itself, which arrogated more and made the Sardican Canon obsolete. And, lastly (3) of Laws Specific we have many examples which should be followed in our own legislation. When we wish to meet a specific emergency we make a general law and then abolish it as soon as it has effected its purpose. Not so the ancients. Take as an example the XXIII Canon of Chalcedon, which ordered certain clergy and monastics to be cleared out of the imperial city for their disorderly practices. There the Canon stands to this day; but its specific and temporary character are self-evident. Or take as follows: "Forasmuch as there are certain persons who kneel on the Lord's Day, and in the Fifty Days . . . at these times all should offer up their prayers standing." This Canon met a scandal of the time, but became obsolete with altered manners.

Yet this very Canon may be justly cited as the opinion of the Nicene Council against a minority ("certain persons") who make themselves singular, and even in things different depart from the usages of their brethren. In fact, the XXXIV. Article of the American Church reflects the spirit of this Canon, without reference to its letter, and all who have promised conformity to our Doctrine and Discipline are bound by this before God. Let them answer to God, if setting up a pretext of more Catholic conduct they forget their vows and promises, depart from what is "ordained and approved by Common Authority," and enforced by the godly judgment of the Father in Christ, whom they have sworn to obey, not grudgingly and with reservations, but "with a glad mind and will." Beautiful and filial subordination this: herein is Catholic conformity and godly sincerity as well.

(4). In short, then, we have in the Rubrics and Liturgic Laws of the Church our Organic Constitutions. By our legislation, also, we have Organic Canons, and others which are Functional or Specific. Here are the Laws which bind the American Catholic: all beyond may guide and direct our Councils, but is not Law for us. Over and above what is thus written the bishop, as Ordinary of his Diocese, is presumptively able to judge what is lawful and expedient, and his judgment must stand till overruled by the Common Authority. If one thinks himself much wiser than his bishop, very likely he is; but "Order is Heaven's first Law," and the Law of Military Service illustrates the great principle that, in the nature of things, those in authority must give the word of command. If this clothes the bishop with powers of a grave and responsible sort, there are three reflections that must prevail with good men: (1.) God Himself has so clothed him, and the Canons only recognize, they do not create, his authority. (2.) The Church has preferred him to his place and office, the presbytery and people have chosen him. If they elect and consecrate ignorance and imbecility, they deserve to suffer. (3.) The remedy is plain: appeal to our Great Synod, and get the Canons and rubrics amended. This is the supreme resource. If any brother in my diocese should ever feel aggrieved by any of my counsels I will myself present his appeal to my brother bishops, in their Rt. Reverend House, and urge their legislation, if they think me wrong. If any one thinks they are all ignorant and unreasonable, and would afford no relief, then let him wait God's time, and he may himself be a bishop. I have a high idea of episcopal prerogative, but, in exercising it, I feel my liability to mistake. I abhor all that is arbitrary, and in all things I invoke, submissively and with "glad mind and will," the decisive voice of my brethren in the solid unity of the episcopate.

In conclusion, let me say that this charge is the product of my conviction that it is time for every man to know and to define his position, whether he believes in this American Church or not. If he does, let him reflect on her speciality in America and the place which Providence assigns to her in Christendom. We are not here to teach or to practise Mediævalism. An alien religion, and the vassals of a foreign pretender to Universal Despotism over Conscience and over the polity of nations are trying that experiment on a great scale, and with the certainty of a crushing defeat.

But we are here to teach our countrymen the Catholic and Apostolic religion; the religion of the Scriptures and of the undisputed Catholic Councils. We are Nicene Catholics. If we attempt to be anything else, we become the mere cock-boat of that rotten old hulk, built and launched by Imperialism, which Pius the Ninth has scuttled, and out of which Döllinger and his companions have escaped for their lives, like the early Christians in their flight to Pella. And let me close my appeal to the Primitive and Apostolic Constitutions, in the words of one, of whom even a Roman Pontiff said, that his work must endure to the conflagration of the world. I quote words well-known and which have all the ring and the sublime simplicity of the Liturgy. Like the Liturgy, they can never wear old, nor be too often rehearsed. "Of Law there can be no less acknowledged, than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power. Both angels and men and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy."

ENGLAND.

THE LIVERPOOL RITUAL CASE.—The Rev. J. Bell Cox, incumbent of St. Margaret's, Liverpool, who had returned the previous day from Switzerland, was served on Saturday, September 5, with the monition from the Chancery Court in York, calling on him to promise obedience at the next court day, at the end of September.

DISESTABLISHMENT IN THE COMING PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.—The Record of Friday, September 11, publishes a list of the candidates for election to the new parliament, and their position as to the question of disestablishment. There are 567 seats to be filled, for which there are 1,061 candidates, (not counting Irish seats and candidates). Of the 579 Liberal candidates, 389 in England, 39 in Scotland, and 25 in Wales have declared for disestablishment, making 402 in all; 31 in England, 5 in Scotland, and 1 in Wales, making 37 in all, have declared against disestablishment; 33 have refused to give information to voters, and 106 have given no information. All the Conservative candidates, 415 in England, 51 in Scotland, and 16 in Wales, 482 in all, declare against disestablishment. Of the 403 Liberals for disestablishment, 3 are for disestablishment in Wales only, 14 in Scotland only, and 10 in Scotland and Wales only. Of the 37 Liberals against disestablishment, 11 are against disestablishment in England only, and 3 in England and Wales only. Mr. Gladstone has declared against disestablishment in England and Wales only.

The Record editorially says: "In one word, if the Liberals are returned to power, as the result of the impending election, the future of the Established Church will be in the hands of men who avowedly desire its extinction."

A BREWER'S LETTER TO A BISHOP.—Among the literature of disestablishment is a letter published in the Church of England Temperance Chronicle, which the Bishop of Rochester received from a brewer of Newcastle-on-Tyne. It is signed "A Brewer First and a Churchman After," and announces that though the writer has always been a Churchman, and belongs to a family in which there has never been a dissenter, he severs his connection with the Church and transfers his annual subscription of three guineas (about $16) to the Liberation Society. "And the reason," he says, "is this: I am a brewer, and your Church is now a huge teetotal society, and bent on the destruction of an important and honorable branch of industry." The Temperance Chronicle hastens to inform the Liberation Society of the large sum thus added to its income.

THE BISHOPRIC OF SALISBURY.—The Foreign Church Chronicle has the following about the appointment of Canon Wordsworth to the Bishopric of Salisbury:

"We cannot but be thankful to see that by his first appointment the prime minister has shown himself to be conscious that the school of Wordsworth and Hook requires strengthening among the chief officers of the Church. It is the school, to repeat the words which we used last March, 'which represents the learning and principles of the seventeenth century adapted to the circumstances of the nineteenth; the school that history shows to have been at all times the backbone of the Church of England; the school that has borne the brunt of the fight in every battle, whether against Rome or Puritanism, and on which the Church will have to rely again in the struggle for life which lies before her.' No better appointment could have been made than that of Canon Wordsworth."

DEATH OF THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.—The Earl of Shaftesbury is reported to have died in London, on Friday, September 25, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

The Right Honorable Anthony Ashley-Cooper, seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, was born in London, April 28, 1801, and was graduated at Christ Church College, Oxford, in 1822. He entered Parliament as Lord Ashley as member for Woodstock, in 1829, subsequently representing Dorchester, Dorsetshire and Bath, which last constituency he was representing when he succeeded to the peerage in 1851. Lord Shaftesbury was well known in public life, the chief object for which he labored in and out of parliament being the improvement of the social condition of the laboring classes. He was the earnest advocate, and originator of the "Ten Hour Bill;" started the ragged schools of London, organized the shoe-black brigade, and was president of many philanthropic organizations.

Lord Shaftesbury was equally prominent as a religious leader. His influence in the evangelical party within the Church was considerable. The Exeter Hall variety of Churchmen looked on him as a leader. He was president of the Bible Society, the Pastoral Aid Society, and the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, and for a time was president of the Protestant Alliance; he was a member also, of all the religious societies which called themselves exclusively "evangelical." During Lord Palmerston's ministry his influence in the nominations to vacant episcopal sees is said to have been very great.

It will be chiefly as a philanthropist that Lord Shaftesbury will be remembered. Whenever there was a worthy work to be done, or a poverty-stricken, miserable class to be raised into comfort and Christianity, the Earl of Shaftesbury's name and aid could always be counted on.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH'S PASTORAL.—The Bishop of Peterborough writes to the Times about a so-called pastoral that has been going the rounds of the English press, and which we published last week:

"I am just now receiving a great many letters with reference to a supposed recent pastoral of mine on Church defence. These are, as may well be supposed, of very various kinds, and deal with a large variety of topics. They are laudatory, arguative, inquisitive, didactic, sarcastic and occasionally abusive, and they ask my opinion upon nearly every possible question of Church history, ritual, doctrine and practice. As I really have not the leisure for letter-writing, which some of my correspondents, to judge from the length of their communications, evidently enjoy, I ask your permission to inform them, one and all, from the earnest Churchman who heartily thanks me for my pastoral to the still more earnest anti-Churchman who denounces me as a 'highly paid drone,' 'an enemy of Christianity' and 'a Judas who ought to go to his own place,' that I have not recently issued any pastoral on the subject to which they refer. The paragraph which has been so entitled is an extract from a lecture of mine on the voluntary system published some five-and-twenty years ago, and which extract some one who thinks better of it than some of my critics do seems to have thought it worth his while to publish in the newspapers. Under these circumstances, my correspondents, friendly and otherwise, will, I trust, pardon me for not replying severally to their respective letters, and for contenting myself with this general acknowledgment of having received them, and with thanking the writers for the attention they have bestowed upon my words."

BISHOP ON FIRE.—On Friday, September 11, the Bishop of Bath and Wells (Lord Arthur Barry) was ascending the pulpit stairs at St. Mary's, Bridgewater, to preach to a large Sunday-school gathering, when one of his lava sleeves came in contact with a light, and caught fire. The bishop, with great presence of mind, extinguished the flames with his other hand, apparently sustaining no injury.

IRELAND.

THE TITLE OF THE CHURCH.—In an article entitled "The Attempt to Rob us of Our Name," the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette says: "It is a question whether it might not be desirable to attempt some means of instructing our people generally on the subject, and impressing on them the importance of maintaining our historical title on all needful occasions. There are few unmitigated evils in this world, and even this shameful attempt to rob us of our name is not without its good. Let us see from a year folly in the past in not clinging more completely to Church principles. We were always too ready to sink our distinctiveness as a Church—the Church of Ireland—in a maudlin hankering after Dissent—church or chapel, there was little difference between them. No severer charge was made against Peta's Manual at the time than that it warred Church people against coquetting with Dissenters. No wonder that we alienated our brethren of the English Church, and that now at home our enemies are considering it fair game to rob us altogether of our title. As we sowed, so are we reaping. No doubt the warning will not be lost on us for the future. And this is a second good to be derived. We must learn to hold closer together, and sink our minor differences in a profounder attachment to our common Church. But there is yet a third good—let us give it in the words of the Psalmist, 'Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils. Put not your trust in princes.' The Irish Church must learn to sit aloof from all political parties—Liberal or Conservative—both alike are unfriendly towards us. The present Government were only too glad to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors, and stereotype the insult offered to us. We could hardly fare worse at the hands of a Home Parliament, where at least there would be some chance to a stand up fight. In the House of Commons not a single protest worth anything was uttered when Mr. Healy brought on the subject, and when the Conservatives came in their lips were dumb, and what they did do only ratified the injury."

The new nomenclature has been adopted by the Government with regard to the census and other returns of the constabulary. It is thought that the effect will be that the Church people will be classified in the returns under various names, and the real progress the Church of Ireland has been making, and the strength she has been quietly gaining, will thus be concealed, and the number of Church people be represented as smaller than they really are.

Another effect of the attempt to reduce the Church to the level of a sect, will be to endanger the bequests and educational endowments that have been made to her as "The Church of Ireland."

GERMANY.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC DEMONSTRATION.—The annual general meeting of the German Roman Catholics held at Münster was an unusually enthusiastic demonstration in favor of the pope. Dr. Windthorst declared that whatever might be said to the contrary, the Pope of Rome still ruled the world. A French journal had said that though the Old Guard might die it never could surrender. But the clerical party in Germany was better than that, for neither would it die. The Holy Chair, he said, must be made independent of the Powers, which it was only too often required to call to order. "We vow," exclaimed the clerical leader, in conclusion, "to stand steadfastly by the pope, in life and death; and I ask this meeting to give three cheers for Pope Leo." These were heartily accorded. The correspondent of the London Times observes:

"The meeting passed several resolutions, which show that the Kulturkampf is as far from being ended as ever—resolutions which demand the unconditional repeal of the chief of the May Laws, especially those dealing with religious orders and the education of the clergy, and which betray anything but a sense of clerical gratitude for those partial yet important concessions of form recently made to the Romish Church by the Prussian Government."

AUSTRALIA.

RESIGNATION OF THE BISHOP OF BATHURST.—The Bishop of Bathurst (Dr. Marsden) whose health is feeble, has announced his impending resignation. Bishop Marsden was consecrated in 1869. Late in July an affecting address was presented to him, signed by all the clergy of the diocese, to which he gave an equally touching reply.

MAINE.

ACQUETA.—St. Mark's Church.—The cornerstone of the new church of St. Mark's parish (the Rev. Walker Gwynne, rector), was laid by the bishop of the diocese on Tuesday, September 24. A new church building for this parish has been spoken of for years, but nothing definite was done until March, 1884, when a parish meeting was held; and it was resolved to build a new church, provided $25,000 should be raised within a year. In less than the prescribed time more than the amount was raised, and measures were at once taken for the erection. Plans were formulated by Mr. E. N. Upjohn, of New York, and the site was chosen, being that of the rectory behind the old church, the rectory being removed for the purpose. The dimensions of the new church will be as follows: Extreme length from east to west, 110 feet; extreme breadth at organ chamber and choir room, 69 feet; depth of choir and chancel, 90 feet; length of nave, 56 feet; breadth of nave and aisles, 48 feet; chapel, 48x18 feet; height of spire above floor, 92 feet. The material selected for this temple of God is granite, that of the walls being the beautiful blue stone from Colonel Bang's quarry in Norridgewock. There are to be six polished granite pillars, from Some's Sound quarry, Mt. Desert, supporting the clear story, and a seventh facing the arcade which connects the nave with the chapel. The work on the columns is to be done by C. J. Hall, of Belfast.

There were present at the service the bishop of the diocese, the rector of the parish, and the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Upjohn, C. M. Sills, C. L. Wells, G. S. Hill, G. Holbrook, A. W. Little, E. F. Small, M. McLaughlin, M. H. Wellman, and Robert Parke.

There was a service in the church, at which addresses were made by the bishop and the Rev. Samuel Upjohn, the late rector, when the congregation headed by the bishop, clergy and vestry, proceeded to the site of the new church, where the service appropriate to the laying of a cornerstone was conducted by the bishop, and the stone laid by him with the following formula: "In the name of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen: I lay this cornerstone of a house to be here hallowed as a House of God, and to be hereafter consecrated as St. Mark's church, and so set apart, from profane and common uses, and devoted to the use of God, in the communion of the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, and according to the doctrine, discipline rites and usages of the same, as received by the Bishops, Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America."

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON.—Death of Dr. W. R. Lawrence.—Dr. William Richards Lawrence died at his summer residence, in Swampscott, on Sunday, September 20, in his seventy-third year. He was the eldest son of the late Amos Lawrence. While still very young, he went abroad for study and travel, and was in Paris during the Revolution of 1830, where, with boyish ardor, he took part in the storming of the barricades. He studied medicine, and after engaging in private practice he became interested in behalf of the poor and suffering, and established a hospital for poor children. He was a manager of several public benevolent institutions, and one of the founders of the Church Home for Orphan and Destitute Children, and the Provident Association. Dr. Lawrence was very active in the founding of parishes. He was one of the originators of St. John's, Jamaica Plain, and also of Emmanuel church, Boston, and, together with his brother, built and presented to the parish the Church of our Saviour, Longwood.

CHELSEA.—Death of the Rev. J. T. Burrill.—The Rev. John T. Burrill, one of the oldest clergy in the diocese, died at Chelsea on Sunday, September 20. Mr. Burrill was born in Lynn, Mass., on Christmas Day, 1799. He was originally a minister of the Methodist Episcopal connection, but entered the ministry of the Church some thirty years ago. He was chaplain of the House of Correction, South Boston, for thirteen years. He was rector of Christ church (the Old North) from 1860 to 1871, and subsequently rector of St. Luke's church, Chelsea, which he held until his retirement, about six years ago.

JAMAICA PLAIN.—St. John's Church.—This beautiful new church (the Rev. S. U. Shearman, rector,) was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese on Thursday, September 24. A large number of the clergy of the diocese was present, including the Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks, A. S. J. Chambré, G. W. Porter, and G. W.

Shinn, the Rev. Messrs. L. K. Storrs, C. H. Leary, George Buck, L. B. Baldwin, W. F. Cheney, and others. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Central Pennsylvania, the founder of the parish, preceding which he made a very interesting statement respecting the origin and early struggles of the parish. After the service the clergy and invited guests were entertained at the residence of the Hon. J. B. Alley.

The church building was erected a few years ago from the plans of Mr. H. M. Stephenson, architect. It is a Gothic structure of stone, with semi-circular chancel. The interior decorations, especially of the chancel, are very rich, and the whole effect is peculiarly attractive. The plans contemplate a chapel to be erected at some future time as an extension of one of the transepts.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—The General Theological Seminary.—The dean's house instead of costing $12,000, as might have been gathered from a former article, will cost from $25,000 to $30,000. The house is to be 60x37, and is to front on Twentieth street, the end being on Ninth avenue. It is to be three stories and an attic, while there is, also, to be a basement and a cellar. The material will be of brick with stone trimmings.

The house is planned with reference to the system of buildings forming the quadrangle. Midway between the house on the south-east corner and the library on the north-east corner is to be a gateway opening from Ninth avenue. In the space between the gateway and the library, it is intended in the course of time to build a dormitory. So, also, in the space between the gateway and the dean's house. The plan is to have the latter buildings connect in such way that the third story of the dean's house may be in some sort an extension of the dormitory building and need, perhaps, by the professors. Ordinarily, the first and second stories may be as much as the deans and their families will care to occupy, while they may be wholly shut off from the third story. The house may serve therefore, a double purpose, and this fact accounts for its peculiar construction as, also, its size and cost.

NEW YORK—Church of the Ascension.—This church, which was closed in June, will reopen on Sunday, October 4. In the meantime some repairs and improvements have been made which add greatly to its appearance. The vestibule has been painted, while a cellar has been made under the front end of the church, in which to place the furnaces. This arrangement will give a much better distribution of heat, which before was very unequal. Within the church the pillars have been repaired and pointed in bronze, the galleries on either side have been removed, and the tall windows, ten in number, shortened by five or six feet. By means of these changes the church is much better lighted, and seems to be more spacious.

The most important changes, however, are connected with the chancel. The old wood-work has been removed, and an altar and reredos of Siena marble taken its place. Immediately above the altar is a retable of the same material, the words, "Holy, Holy, Holy," being brought out in relief. The floor is of mosaic, while the floor and steps outside are of Portland stone. The inner railing will be of wood, with posts of brass, while the outer railing will be wholly of polished brass.

The reredos will cover the entire chancel end of the church, to a height of about twenty feet. The work is ornamented with mosaics, while later on mosaic work will occupy the large space now vacant above the altar. Above this will be figures of angels done in relief, the work being executed by St. Gaudens. On either side, also, will be figures of angels done in mosaics. In the space above the reredos will be a large painting by La Farge, representing the Ascension. All of this work is in every way simple, chaste, and beautiful, and in entire keeping with the architecture and traditions of the Church. The entire cost will be about $35,000. It may be added that elaborately-carved stalls will be placed in the chancel to correspond with the beautiful pulpit, the work being done by the same hand.

NEW YORK—St. Ignatius's Church.—A new altar, of white Vermont marble, has been placed in this church, being ten by four and nineteen feet in height. On the front and sides is an arcade of eleven arches, the arches being supported by twelve clusters of columns. These arches, which are adorned with elaborately-carved capitals above, support the altar-table, which is also of white marble. The frieze underneath is a delicate carving, in vine pattern, while five crosses are cut upon the marble above. The altar-table is supplied with a tabernacle, having doors of polished brass, on either side of which are shelves for candlesticks, vases, etc. There are also various additional devices and ornaments, as a throne for the cross, inclosed by twelve columns, a canopy, an octagonal spire, etc. Behind the altar is a curtain of dark red material, while before it is a lamp suspended from the ceiling, its light indicating the presence of the reserved part.

NEW YORK—The Church Temperance Society.—The Bishop of New Jersey has written as follows in the matter of his clergy preaching sermons on temperance, on Temperance Sunday, November 8:

"It is hereby earnestly recommended to the clergy of the Diocese of New Jersey, that on the second Sunday in November, they will bring prominently before the people of their charge the great sin and cause of drunkenness; and the judicious methods of the Church Temperance Society for curing and counteracting what every good Christian and citizen must own to be the crying sin of our time."

The Bishop of Connecticut says: "I gladly unite in the request to the reverend clergy that sermons on temperance be preached on Sunday, November 8. The epistle for that Sunday seems to make it an especially proper day for such sermons."

Speaking of the request to have the clergy of New York and elsewhere preach on temperance, November 8, the Bishop of Albany writes: "I heartily approve of the Church Temperance Society, and earnestly recommend that the clergy of the Diocese of Albany should comply with that request."

NEW YORK—Italian Mission.—A very interesting service in the interest of the Italian Mission was held on Sunday, September 20, at Grace chapel, at 4 P.M. The occasion was the reopening of the mission. A select congregation of "children of Italy" in their festal garments and gaudy-colored dresses took part in the services, singing and responding in the service as if they were born in the Church. The Rev. C. Stauder, in charge of the mission, delivered an exhortation in the Italian language, and the Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington, pronounced the benediction in the same musical tongue. The Italian Mission has been a success from the very start, and evidently Italians have come into the Church to stay. When better facilities will be offered to this industrious people of showing their devotion and attachment to the Church, the numerous Italian colonies who will be of much moment.

Meanwhile, the mission is in need of funds, nothing having come into the hands of the treasurer for a long while, and asks for help. Any information in regard to the mission will be gladly imported by the missionary, the Rev. C. Stauder, 126 East 14th street.

ROSENDALE—Consecration of All Saints' Church.—This beautiful stone church, (the Rev. E. Ransford, priest in charge,) the cornerstone of which was laid in 1876, was consecrated by the assistant-bishop on the Sixteenth Sunday after Trinity, September 20. There were present the assistant-bishop, the priest in charge, and the Rev. William Walsh. The assistant-bishop also confirmed eight persons, presented by the priest in charge. At the celebration of the Holy Communion there were twenty seven communicants, all but eleven of whom belonged to the parish, the remainder coming from the missions within the same jurisdiction as Rosendale, where the total number of communicants is twenty-two. The church was tastefully and effectively decorated with flowers, and the altar and lectern vested in white, corresponding to the richly-embroidered white and gold stoles worn by the clergy.

STONE RIDGE—St. Peter's Church.—The assistant-bishop visited this parish (the Rev. E. Ransford, priest in charge,) and confirmed five persons, three being colored.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Redeemer.—On Sunday, September 20, the surpliced choir of St. Paul's Parish visited this church (the Rev. C. R. Treat, rector,) by invitation of the rector, and rendered most admirably the musical portions of the evening service, after which the Rev. Warner C. Hubbard preached on the subject of church choirs. In the course of his remarks the preacher stated that when he first became rector of St. Paul's, eight years ago, there were only two surpliced choirs in the diocese, his own in South Brooklyn, and that in St. Paul's in the East District; but now there are thirteen in the city of Brooklyn, and seventeen altogether in the diocese, showing how rapidly this style of choir is being introduced.

The organization of a surpliced choir in this parish is contemplated.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Good Shepherd.—This church (the Rev. H. B. Cornwell, rector) has been closed for a portion of the summer for repairs and improvements. During that time it has been re-roofed, and the interior painted and decorated with excellent taste. The organ has been moved into a recess, and stalls placed on the chancel platform for a vested choir.

On Sunday, September 20, the opening services were held, large congregations attending both morning and evening. The music was admirably rendered by the new choir, under the direction of Mr. C. S. Verbury. At the morning service there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which the sermon was by the rector. In the evening the sermon was by the Rev. Dr. I. L. Townsend.

The cost of the improvements was $1,650, all of which, except about $300, has been subscribed.

St. JOHN LAND—Founders' Day.—On Wednesday, September 16, occurred at this place the annual celebration of the birthday of Dr. Muhlenberg, the founder of the Church industrial village of St. Johnland. The day was clear and beautiful, and according to the programs of arrangement the celebration began with ringing of the bell and the firing of a salute. After the usual Morning Prayer, the congregation passed up to the cemetery and decorated with a profusion of flowers the graves of Dr. Muhlenberg, and of his friend, Dr. Washburn. Of the many and grateful remembrances on that day of the beloved founder, none were more loving and tender than those of the people of St. Johnland.

Due respect having been paid to the honored dead, the festivities of the day began in the beautiful grove on the hill overlooking Long Island Sound. These consisted of games, followed by lunch at noon, while in the afternoon the boys repaired to the green and engaged in various athletic sports, greatly to their amusement.

At 3 p.m. the Rev. George S. Baker, pastor and superintendent of St. Luke's Hospital, delivered an appropriate and excellent address from the steps of the church. The ringing of the bells and the firing of a salute followed in the order, while after Evening Prayer at seven o'clock, a recital on the organ was given by the Rev. V. McBee. There was also some antiphonal singing, together with the singing of patriotic hymns. By ten o'clock the sounds of laughter and of merry voices had died away, and young and old seemed content to rest from their labors. Founders' Day had been duly celebrated, greatly to the enjoyment of those participating.

Of the clergy present and resident, there were the Rev. Dr. M. A. Bailey, in charge of the institution, and the Rev. Messrs. H. A. Peller and C. M. Carr. Of the visiting clergy, there were the Rev. Messrs. George S. Baker, V. McBee and U. T. Tracy.

GARDEN CITY—Opening of the Cathedral Schools.—The Cathedral schools of St. Paul and St. Mary were opened formally by a service in the chapel of the former on the 24th, in the presence of the bishop, cathedral board of trustees, the instructors and the scholars of the two schools. There were ninety-seven in St. Paul's and forty-seven in St. Mary's on opening day. Addresses were made by the bishop, the Rev. O. R. Vandewater, the chairman of the schools committee and Mr. Charles Struwant Moore, the head master of St. Paul's.

The cathedral schools have opened most auspiciously. The school for girls is filled. We shall have at St. Paul's within a few days at least one hundred and ten pupils. For the first time in its history St. Paul's is attended by enough scholars to insure its expenses from its income.

The diocese is to be congratulated upon such results in the first year of its cathedral responsibility.

Founded upon a principle dear to the hearts of Churchmen, these schools stand as a bulwark against modern methods of culture which educating the mental faculties, ignore the weightier matters of soul nurture and spiritual development.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

BINGHAMTON—Church of the Good Shepherd.—A deaf-mute service was held at this church, the Rev. (J. Singleton Bishop, rector), on Wednesday, Sept. 16. After a shortened form of Evening Prayer, interpreted by the Rev. T. B. Berry, addresses were made by the rector, the Rev. J. W. Caspers, and the missionary to deaf mutes, Mr. Berry. Ten muses, besides a good congregation, were present, and all seemed greatly interested and urged a speedy repetition of the service.

GARDEN—Laying the Corner-stone of St. Mark's Church.—The corner-stone of this church (the Rev. E. W. Mundy, rector), was laid by the bishop of the diocese on Tuesday, September 22. There were present and assisting the Rev. Drs. T. Babcock and J. M. Clarke, the Rev. Messrs. H. Gates, A. Gregory, W. M. Beauchamp, F. N. Westcott, T. E. Pattison, J. A. Staunton, and J. E. Johnson, besides the rector of the church. There were about one hundred and fifty people scattered around in front of the church, while the clergymen and choir occupied a platform in the building. The beautiful weather, the deep resonant tones of the bishop as he read the service, and the reverent attention of the assemblage, all combined to make the scene very impressive. After the customary deposits had been placed in the corner-stone the bishop delivered the address, which was listened to with deep attention. The bishop began with a reference to David: "The same fire burns in your hearts as burned in that of King David. You could not rest until you had founded a temple to God." In speaking about the church the bishop said: "The Church has not come uninvited, but because she was sent for to give you a place wherein to worship, to give you a ministry which should instill into your souls love for the divine being, and to give you a religion which is not an impulse but a revelation from above." The address closed with a reference to the corner-stone: "You see on this stone the symbol of this house of worship. It signifies endurance. The Church has lasted for eighteen centuries. This stone is regular in form, so of the religion of the Church. And, above all, the stone is large. The church is also large. There is room for all—the old and the young. There is room for Dives in his fine linen and for Lazarus in his rags."

ADAMS—Consecration.—The convocation of the First Missionary District met in Emmanuel church, Adams, (the Rev. Edward Moyses, rector), on Tuesday and Wednesday, September 15 and 16. After Evening Prayer, on Tuesday, the sermon was preached by the Rev. C. H. Tindell, from St. Matt. xxii. 38. On Wednesday there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, the Rev. R. A. Olin being celebrant, assisted by the Rev. R. A. Quennell and the rector of the parish. In the afternoon there was an interesting discussion on "Woman's Work in the Church," in which all the clergy took part, also Mr. W. G. Bentley, a teacher in the Adams Collegiate Institute. In the evening there was a missionary meeting, at which addresses were made by the Rev. R. G. Quennell on "Woman's Work in the Parish," by the Rev. G. G. Ferrine on "The Work of the Men," and by the Rev. Osmond Herrick, U.S.A., a former rector, on "The Proceeds of Faithful Work."

NEW JERSEY.

RUMSON—St. George's Church.—It is very seldom that a rector can present two churches for consecration in one week. The chapel of the Holy Communion, Fair Haven, was consecrated on Tuesday, September 8, and the parish church, St. George's, Rumson, (the Rev. W. O. Embury, rector), on the following Sunday, September 13. These consecrations are the results of mission work begun by the mother church of the district, Christ church, Shrewsbury (the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Franklin, rector).

On the first of these occasions there was a large number of clergy present, it being the quarterly meeting of the Convocation of New Brunswick. At the consecration of the chapel the sermon was preached by the Rev. Edmund Embury, the venerable father of the rector, and that at the consecration of the parish church by the bishop of the diocese.

The chapel is the result of earnest work by the rector and his many friends, and is of very recent erection. The parish church was built ten years ago, but, being encumbered by debt, could not be consecrated until now, one of the vestry having generously paid off the last instalment of $2,000. The rector is to be heartily congratulated that these two very beautiful churches are given to God, to the great joy of all who know the work and its discouragements.

GIBBSBORO—St. John's in the Wilderness.—A pleasant union of employers and employes, and many outside friends, occurred at this village on Saturday, September 19, on the grounds of Mr. John Lucas, proprietor of the Gibbsboro Chemical Works and Paint Mills. It was a garden party and welcome to autumn, for the benefit of the Rectory Fund of this little church. It was a day of real pleasure to many into whose life little recreation comes. The day was fine, and the night was beautiful with moonlight, and Chinese lanterns and other artificial lights lent their aid. A fancy table, decorated with flags, filled with fancy and useful articles made by the young girls and women of the church guild, and an autumn table, decorated with corn, wheat, millet, and grasses, and covered with fruit and confectionery, helped to add to the fund. There were lawn-tennis, croquet, boating, music, and a broom drill by twenty-five young ladies dressed in white and scarlet. Tea was spread out by the laws from 6 to 10 p.m. Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. R. F. Alsop and the Rev. Messrs. A. Murray and R. Moses.

The corner-stone of St. John's in the Wilderness, (the Rev. Ezra Isaac, rector), was laid on October 31, 1882. The church was opened and dedicated on Easter Eve, 1883, and on June 28 of the same year it was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese. On that day Mr. and Mrs. John Lucas, who had mainly built the church, placed the deed of the property on the altar-basin as an offering. The church and land are worth not far from ten thousand dollars. Since then there have been three confirmations held in the church. Steps are now taking to build a rectory, which will offer a pleasant home to the clergyman for the future.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—St. David's Church, Manayunk.—The congregation of this parish gave their rector, the Rev. Charles Logan, a genuine surprise on Friday evening, September 24. Headed by the large chorus choir, they called upon him at the rectory, and welcomed him and his wife home again from their summer trip. The company adjourned to the parish building, after a neat speech by the rector, in which he thanked them for this manifestation of love. A very pleasant evening was spent in listening to rich music, well rendered. During the evening the Rev. J. William Davidson presented to Mr. Logan a handsome purse of money in behalf of the congregation, and urged them to support him in his earnest efforts to faithfully perform his arduous duties in what they well knew was no very pleasant field. The rector, in reply, thanked those present for what, he said, was the greatest surprise of his life, that it was valuable to him vastly more than the money it contained, and he hoped that all would in every way in their power hold up his hands in his earnest efforts to build up that portion of God's vineyard. Mr. Logan is in the eleventh year of his rectorship, a longer period than that of any of his predecessors. A bounteous collation was served, of which all partook. The evening was one of genuine enjoyment, and one that the rector and his wife will long remember.

PHILADELPHIA—The Clerical Brotherhood.—The meetings were resumed on Monday, September 21, when about fifty of the clergy were present. The topic for discussion was "The Revised Translation of the Bible." The chief speaker was the Rev. Dr. John P. Peters, occupying the Chair of Old Testament Languages and Literature in the Department of Biblical Learning in the Divinity School, who gave many facts in relation to it which betokened his thorough knowledge of the subject.

PHILADELPHIA—The Seamen's Mission.—In his report to the Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia, the Rev. J. J. Sleeper, missionary and superintendent, urges strongly the needs of the sailors and the debt we owe them, and closes by saying: "Over fifty thousand seamen arrive in this port annually. If those interested will assist us, we will open our parish holdings day and night for the instruction, entertainment, and protection of these men. We need books, papers, a globe, charts, maps, and money—anything that can be used to make a home-like place. Articles will be sent for if word is sent to the Rev. J. J. Sleeper, Front and Queen streets, or Mr. Isaac Welsh, treasurer, 528 Marshall street."

PHILADELPHIA—St. George's Church, West Philadelphia.—The Guild and Mite Society of this rural parish (the Rev. G. J. Burton, rector,) celebrated their first anniversary on the Sixteenth Sunday after Trinity, September 20. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion in the morning. In the evening a Harvest Home festival was held. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers, fruits, and vegetables. The reports of the Guild and Mite Society were read. The rector addressed the societies, and afterward preached on "The Miracle of the Loaves." The church, which seats over three hundred, was crowded. The singing, which is under the charge of Mr. Charles Mercer Hall, choirmaster and lay-reader, was most hearty and congregational, being semi-choral. Among the works of the Guild are the recarpeting of the chancel, providing the coal, and now it contemplates making some improvements on the church and grounds. The aim of the Mite Society is to secure funds for a rectory, as the only means whereby the parish will be able to have a settled rector. The present rector, who is the warden of the Burd Asylum, gives his services gratuitously. New life and interest have been awakened by the Guild and Mite Society, under the efficient leadership of Mr. Hall, who is a postulant for orders.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Incarnation.—The treasurer, finance committee, and the vestrymen are encouraged by the present financial state of this parish, (the Rev. Dr. I. L. Townsend, rector) the last quarterly report showing a greater footing than at any time for the last six years, the plans for the increase of the rental having, thus far, proved successful. The Gilmore window is now, after long delay, in place. Several others are seriously contemplated, and will be placed in the not far-distant future. A new alms basin, composed of bits of gold, silver and family relics contributed for the purpose, has been made for the parish. The pieces contributed not only formed the basin, but paid for making it and left a small balance.

The communion vessels of the parish, given twenty years ago by Mr. Geo. F. Nesbit, Sr., of New York, now deceased, proving light and inconvenient to use, and of insufficient capacity, have been placed in the hands of Lamb & Bro. for reconstruction. The chalices will become one, and the paten and flagon made over; a needed change in the shapes and sizes of these articles. The baptistry has been hung with drapery, the font now standing well out to view. The left lancet windows and the organ chamber are ordered finished in keeping with the remaining windows of the church, that all may be in harmony.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Epiphany.—Besides hundreds who went down the Potomac, more than one hundred have since then enjoyed another ride and the fresh air at the expense of the liberal purses of this parish. During the vacation a new library has been purchased for the use of the various Sunday-schools of this parish. The organ has been disjoined, repaired, and put in correct tune. The receipts of the Men's Meeting Fund for the past season were $125; expenses, $159, but a balance which was on hand at the beginning of the season kept the committee free of debt.

The annual expenses of the Mission chapel, lately so commodiously enlarged, is about $400, including light, fuel, insurance, repairs and interest. Contributions toward these objects are requested; also, towards the balance on the bill for the late improvements on the property. Texts, clothing, papers and magazines—especially illustrated ones, and pictures of a desirable sort are all asked for and can be judiciously used. Late in the season the inmates of the Epiphany Home enjoyed their second annual excursion by the steamer America, thanks to Mr. C. C. Willard and the ladies in charge. The men's meetings, the mother's meetings, Sunday and sewing schools, and other activities are resumed. Many thanks are due from the poor to the captain of the "Mary Washington" for his great kindness the season past.

BALTIMORE—St. Luke's Church.—The Rev. George W. Harrod, late assistant in this parish, has been elected to the rectorship made vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Rankin. In three years past, Mr. Harrod has been the senior assistant priest in the parish, having come to Baltimore from the Diocese of Fond du Lac, in whose cathedral he was senior canon, and under Bishop Brown, had charge of its congregation.

Mr. Harrod is some 36 years of age, enjoys a reputation as a preacher of more than average ability, and in pastoral and business capacity has largely demonstrated his qualifications as successor to one of the most active, systematic and indefatigable rectors of this city, in fact of the entire diocese. A committee has waited upon the rector-elect, and it is beyond reasonable doubt that he will accept the important and influential position to which he has been so cordially called.

The Rev. Mr. Harrod is a native of England, but reared and educated in the West, graduating at Lawrence University, Appleton, Wisconsin. From Nashotah, he became a member of the cathedral staff of the late Bishop Armitage in Milwaukee; thence, to Green Bay; thence, he removed to Fond du Lac; and now becomes, though comparatively young, the head of what may be called the third parish in Maryland. He is genial, popular and untiring. For two years or more, he has been practically the head of the religious affairs of the parish of St. Luke's, owing to the ill-health of the late rector, now the emeritus. The Rev. Dr. Rankin was in New Jersey at the time of the election, but his approval of this excellent choice on the part of the authorities is regarded as beyond question. Administrative ability of a high order is required for conducting or guiding the affairs of this parish; and this, without doubt, will be brought by the new rector sufficient for the demands of all the work of the parish.

BALTIMORE—Christ Church.—This parish (the Rev. W. W. Williams, rector,) is one of the wealthiest of our Baltimore parishes, its yearly contributions being nearly $23,000. It has also one of the largest churches in the city, our chief churches in size being Emmanuel with 1,300 sittings, Ascension with 1,800, St. Paul's with 1,200, Grace with 900, Memorial with 900, St. Luke's with 1,500, St. Peter's with 1,600, St. Mark's with 900, and Christ church with 1,200. Some $300 were contributed last year to the Virginia Theological Seminary; foreign missions, $356; aged and infirm clergy, $100; domestic missions $416. There are five hundred communicants in the parish, and the Holy Communion is statedly administered on the first and third Sundays of the month. As an earnest and dignified preacher, the rector ranks among our first.

BALTIMORE—St. George's Church.—For the purpose of securing funds to make needed repairs and improvements on this church (the Rev. Frederick Gibson, rector,) and to increase the offerings for the reduction of the church debt, Mr. J. R. Bell, treasurer of the parish, and others, are making special efforts. The debt will be vigorously attacked during the autumn and winter. In fact, the campaign has already opened, and the Whittingham memorial will, all in due time, be rid, it is hoped, of its incumbrance.

BALTIMORE—Church of the Ascension.—The systematic offerings' plan of this parish continues to work satisfactorily. It was begun in the early part of 1885. Its successful operations is due largely to the business-like manner in which it was prepared. A schedule of appropriation of the $15,000 yearly revenue to which it has increased the contributions of the parish, has been submitted by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair, to the vestry, and approved by them and the congregation. From chapels, a corps of three clergy, property valued at no less than $100,000, sittings for nearly 2,000, 700 families with 2,400 individuals, and nearly 800 communicants give some idea of the importance and influence of Dr. Fair's charge in this city.

BALTIMORE—St. Paul's Parish.—The large and increasing work of the Sunday and other schools of this parish (the Rev. Dr. J. S. B. Hodges, rector,) has necessitated enlarged accommodations, and even as long as nearly a year since the question was agitated of securing the necessary lot and funds. Several thousand dollars were given towards the purchase of the lot, and other moneys pledged for the erection of the needed buildings. The parish building will be adapted to various parochial uses, as the parish carries on several parish and industrial schools, besides two Sunday-schools, the pupils of all aggregating not far from four hundred, with a corps of some forty teachers.

ST. PAUL'S PARISH, CALVERT COUNTY.—St. Paul's Church, Prince Frederick.—Commendable zeal has characterized the rectorship of the Rev. Dr. De Low in this parish. He assumed charge in 1883, after a year's vacancy, and at once aroused the latent energy of the people. The rectory, which had been destroyed by fire the year before, was replaced by a large and commodious one at a cost of $2,000, and all was at once paid on it as due, no debt of any kind resting on the parish. A tower was next added to the church, and a memorial bell was the next thing thought of by the congregation. A parish of about one hundred persons only realized these good results. It was the spirit with which they combined for one common purpose that inspired interest and guaranteed success.

ST. PAUL'S PARISH, FREDERICK COUNTY—St. Paul's Church, Point of Rocks.—Although this parish is about forty-two years organized, it has had a resident rector only since the coming of the present one, the Rev. Dr. T. S. Bacon. Coming in 1882 to the rescue of the work, he at once infused new courage. The Church's strength here is now thirty-five families of one hundred and fifty persons, fifty-five communicants, and a Sunday school work of twenty pupils and five teachers. Though the area of the parish is some fifty square miles, yet the congregations are good. Contributions have been $1,770, $341 and $235 during the three years and more of the present incumbent. The church, erected nearly three years ago, is a credit to all concerned. The two churches now owned by this parish are valued at $4,500; other property, $70; endowment, $283, and an annuity of $50. The church and chapel will accommodate two hundred and fifty attendants.

EASTON.

EASTON—Burial of the Late Bishop.—The burial services of the late Bishop Henry Champlin Lay, were held in Easton, on Monday, September 21. The funeral arrangements in Baltimore were under the direction of the Rev. F. B. Adkins, and the remains were taken in charge on their arrival at Easton by the Rev. G. S. Gassner. Nearly all the clergy, and many prominent laymen of the diocese were present. The clergy and vestries of the parishes met the remains at the railroad station, and escorted them to Trinity Cathedral, where they lay in state for about an hour. The casket containing the remains was borne by the pall-bearers, and was preceded by the Rev. G. S. Gassner hearing the pastoral staff. This pastoral staff, which lay upon the coffin, in one that was intended to be prayed to the bishop by the clergy of the diocese. It has been in process of execution for some months past, but the bishop was not able to see it after it was finished. The parish churches were draped in mourning, and the business places in the town were closed during the services. After the remains had lain in state, the funeral procession moved to Christ Church, where the Burial Service was said. The opening sentences were said by the Bishop of Maryland, the lesson read by the Rev. Dr. H. Y. Satterlee, and the Nicene Creed and prayers by the Bishop of Delaware. The interment was at Spring Hill Cemetery, where the Committal was said by the Rev. Dr. E. F. Dashiell. The pall-bearers were Drs. R. C. Mackall and I. L. Adkins, and Messrs. W. F. Walker, J. A. Pearce, G. R. Goldsborough, W. F. Craft, A. S. Coodon and W. E. Jones, all laymen of the diocese. The late bishop's family, except his eldest son, were all present. The procession from the cathedral to Christ Church, and from the church to the cemetery was on foot, the only carriages being those containing the bishop's family. In accordance with the late bishop's request all the arrangements of the funeral were marked by perfect simplicity.

The funeral was the largest ever seen in Easton, and testified the respect and affection held for Bishop Lay by the whole community, which his death has plunged into mourning.

EASTON—Action on the Bishop's Death.—After the funeral of the bishop the clergy held a meeting in Trinity cathedral, where addresses were made and appropriate resolutions passed expressive of the loss the diocese has sustained by his death.

On the receipt of the news of the death of the bishop the trustees of Trinity cathedral held a meeting and passed the following minute, which was ordered to be inscribed on the records: "With the profoundest grief we acknowledge the dispensation of Providence which has removed from us our bishop, founder, and rector, the Rt. Rev. H. C. Lay, D.D., LL.D., who fell asleep in Baltimore, Thursday, September 17, 1885.

"His work as priest, as missionary bishop, and as diocesan is written in the history of the Church, in whose councils he bore no conspicuous part.

"In his diocese he was loved and revered, but to this congregation he sustained a peculiarly intimate and affectionate relation. His singular simplicity and purity of life, his broad and tender sympathies, his real and holy eloquence, as well as the warmth of personal attachments, endeared him beyond measure to the little flock which rejoiced in his ministrations and his Christian counsel.

"This board hears loving testimony to the spotless purity of one of the best of men, and one of the noblest of Christian ministers."

The rector and vestry of Christ Church, St. Peter's parish, Easton, held a meeting on learning of the bishop's death, and passed the following minute and resolutions: "We, the rector and vestry of St. Peter's parish, Diocese of Easton, have learned with profound regret of the death, at the Church Home, Baltimore, on the 17th inst., of our beloved bishop, the Rt. Rev. Henry Champlin Lay, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Easton. After a long and painful illness, born with patience and Christian fortitude, he passed quietly to his rest. He was a man of fine scholarship and broad sympathies, devoted to his diocese, and ever mindful of his clergy. In his death the Church is deprived of one of her wisest counselors, and we mourn the loss of a tender father in God.

"We hereby offer to his wife and family our heartfelt sympathy in their sore trial, and pray that a merciful God 'may lift up His countenance upon them, and give them peace.' Resolved, that the wardens and vestry of this parish attend the funeral in a body. Resolved, that this minute be spread upon a separate page of our minute book. Resolved, that a copy be sent to the late bishop's family. Resolved, that a copy be sent to the Church and local papers for publication."

WILMINGTON—St. James's Church.—This church (the Rev. W. H. A new recessed chancel is in process of erection, and a transept is being added which will give nearly two hundred additional sittings, making the seating capacity of the church one thousand. The organ will be brought down into the chancel, and a choir of men and boys are under full training to be ready for reopening November 1. The furniture of the chancel has been given as memorials, including a beautiful font.

TERRE-HAUTE—Harvest Home.—The annual Harvest Home was duly celebrated in this city at the close of the County Agricultural Fair. A few days previous, several bands, about fifteen in number, who were attending a tournament here, gathered for divine worship in St. Stephen's church (the Rev. Dr. Walter Delafield, rector,) and the old hymns, sung by a chorus of three hundred male voices accompanied by the organ and other musical instruments, were a great delight to lovers of old-fashioned congregational music.

Harvest Home services began in St. Stephen's church on Saturday, September 19. With an early celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 8 A.M. The Litany was said at 9 A.M., and at 10.30 A.M. there was a solemn celebration preceded by Morning Prayer. The church was beautifully decorated. Arches of corn and wheat spanned the chancel. Enormous heaps of golden pumpkins and sealed peppers and russet apples were on every side. A cross skillfully constructed of ears of corn decorated the organ, while on the altar stood a large cross of wheat and grapes. The choir entered the church singing as a procession the Harvest Home hymn, "Praise, O Praise our God and King." The service was conducted by the bishop of the diocese and the rector of the parish. The bishop preached the sermon, which was an able and eloquent account of the bountiful gifts of the Lord of the Harvest. In the evening the bishop again preached. The music at both services was rendered with great spirit, particularly Godesculus's Alleluia sequence, "The Strain Upraise."

In the evening the brotherhood of St. Stephen's gave a Harvest Home banquet in their hall, which was a very handsome affair. Speeches were made by the bishop and others, and after the singing of the brotherhood hymn the members were dismissed with the bishop's benediction.

TERRE HAUTE—St. Luke's Church, Noit Works.—The corner-stone of this church was laid by the bishop of the diocese on the afternoon of Sunday, September 20. The procession approached the grounds headed by the choristers of St. Stephen's church, followed by the rector (the Rev. Dr. Walter Delafield) and the bishop, after whom came St. Stephen's Brotherhood, the officers of St. Luke's church, and the Sunday school. The bishop, after conducting appropriate services, asked for the deed of the lot. Miss Nellie Brown, a relative of Colonel McLean, escorted by his Hon. John E. Lamb, approached and handed the warranty deed to the bishop, who expressed his earnest gratitude and implored God's blessings on the generous donor. The rector then read a list of the contents of the box, and the bishop laid the corner-stone in due and ancient form. In his address the bishop said he was glad the workmen were finding out this church to be their true friend. It was better than any police force to keep order, and would prove a blessing to the neighborhood. He hoped to open here a free reading-room, also a place for social gatherings, where all would be welcome, especially the poor and friendless, and he confidently expected a long and useful life for this work, so auspiciously commenced.

WISCONSIN.

RICE LAKE—Grace Mission.—We have been given for publication the following extract from a letter of the missionary in charge of this mission (the Rev. W. H. Ross): "I have had charge of two mission stations since the 1st of June, Grace Mission, Rice Lake, and St. Stephen's Mission, Still Lake, in Northwest Wisconsin, toward Lake Superior. The people are poor, some very poor, and not one family is 'well-to-do.' Yet they have built two churches, one at each place, and give liberally toward the support of the services. They are nearly all employes in lumber mills owned by non residents, and can only live from hand to mouth; for the Church they have done and are doing all they can. The church-buildings can be used as they are in the summer time, but to finish them and fit them up for a Wisconsin winter we need $1,000. Do you know any one who will help us? I have no eloquence to plead our cause, but hope the facts will speak for us."

MINNESOTA.

DIOCESAN ITEMS.—The bishop of the diocese left Faribault on Monday, September 14th for his annual visit of two weeks to the Indians of White Earth Reservation in Northern Minnesota.

Mr. E. P. Chittenden, a Congregational Minister, and a graduate of Yale, after having studied a year in Germany and spent some months as a minister among his brethren, enters Seabury Hall this year, as a special student, with a view to taking Holy Orders.

By special invitation of the Faribault clergy the St. Paul and Minneapolis Clerics met at the cathedral on Monday, September 14. Fourteen clergy were present including the bishop, who added much interest to the meeting by his wise counsel and admonition. The subject discussed was the Advent Mission which is proposed to be held in St. Paul in the first week of Advent. The whole subject of the mission was ably discussed by the various clergymen present.

No definite action was taken relative to the special mission to be held in St. Paul, farther than the unanimous expression of opinion that there was a need for such a mission at the center of our diocesan work, and that if it were properly carried on it would awaken spiritual life, not only in St. Paul, but throughout the diocese. The bishop was requested to issue a pastoral setting forth the need, object and modus operandi of such a mission, and to set forth a collect to be used by way of preparation for the mission.

NEBRASKA.

EPISCOPAL VISITATIONS.—The bishop of the diocese made his first visitation to Grace church, Red Cloud, on Sunday, September 6. The weather was so inclement that but few people were present to hear the words of godly counsel which both morning and evening fell from his lips.

The Church at this point has never prospered as it should have done. In a great measure this is owing to the infrequency of services, and the few Church people that are here.

Under the ministrations of a former rector a comfortable building was erected, but not furnished. Much still remains to be done.

It needs to be seated; about enough money is in hand for this purpose. The interior and exterior want a coat of paint. The chancel has been painted by the missionary in charge, and if he can secure the material for the rest will see to it that the remainder is done also. The bishop presented a carpet for the chancel, which has been put down.

It is the determination of the diocesan that services at this place shall be continued, as it was the last point ministered to by the late Bishop Clarkson.

On Tuesday, September 8, in company with the missionary, the bishop visited Bloomington and held services in the Presbyterian place of worship. A large congregation greeted him, many coming from adjoining towns.

Here there is no church, but steps will be taken to secure lots and put up a building as soon as possible. One child was baptized.

On Wednesday Alma was visited, services held in the Methodist house of worship, and one young woman confirmed. Before leaving steps were taken toward securing means for purchasing a school-house soon to be vacated. It is proposed to change this into a chapel, which will be sufficient for present needs; $250 was subscribed by the bishop in hope of the rest being obtained from the citizens. When bought some repairs will be needed, painting done, etc. There are but few communicants here, and outside aid must be solicited. Will not some who read this help!

On Thursday McCook was visited. This is by far the most promising point in the Republican Valley. Three years ago in June not one house marked the spot where now fifteen hundred people make their home. It is the end of a railroad division, dispatcher's headquarters, and assistant-superintendent's offices. About three hundred men in the employ of the company reside here. The Methodists, Congregationalists, and Roman Catholics have already occupied the field. Each has a suitable place for worship.

It is very desirable, indeed of paramount importance, a church be built here at once.

Already there are fourteen communicants, and thirty or forty connected with the Church either by baptism, association, or have a decided preference for its mode of worship.

An organization has been perfected, officers appointed, and $350 subscribed for the missionary's support; $300 has been secured through the bishop toward a building; the town will add about $700 more, but this will not be sufficient. It will take about $1,500, material is so expensive here. The ladies are negotiating for an organ. A site can be secured through the town lot company.

Dear reader, has God blessed you! Can you not spare a little of your substance to promote His glory and extend Christ's kingdom among this worthy people, hungering for the word of life, the ministrations of His Church!

In the days when Bishop Lay was missionary bishop of the Southwest, he "cooned" along the fences in Arkansas, and not "crooned" as an editorial sentence made it. The presence or absence of a letter often represents the difference between light and obscurity.

MEETING OF CLERGY.

BISHOP HENRY CHAMPLIN LAY, D.D., LL.D.
After the funeral of Bishop Lay the clergy of the diocese met in the bishop's chapel. The Rev. S. C. Roberts presided over the meeting and ordered that the Rev. Theo. P. Barber, D.D., be called to the chair. The Rev. Mr. Mitchell was appointed secretary. On motion a committee of five was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the respect and love of the clergy for their late bishop, and the sense of the loss which they have experienced in his death. The committee retired, and after consultation presented the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted by a rising vote:

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the clergy of the Diocese of Kansas, held on the 21st day of September in the cathedral chapel immediately after the funeral solemnities over the great and good bishop, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, In His wise providence it hath pleased Almighty God to call to His earthly labors and sufferings to his blessed reward the soul of our first beloved bishop, HENRY CHAMPLIN LAY, D.D., LL.D.; Therefore,

Resolved, That we thank God for the good example of self-sacrificing love, patience and labor which He enabled His humble servant to set before us in his life and bequest to us in his death.

Resolved, That in the Church councils, as a member of the Holy Synod, in the singular purity and earnest devotion to duty, and in the high and noble aims of the committee to prepare a new hymnal, and of the commission to enrich the Prayer Book, the accurate, thorough, and high-spirited labors, and the noble achievements, the marked literary qualifications and good judgment of our diocesan rendered his diligent labors most beneficial to the Church at large.

Resolved, That the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen, the worn out, sick and disabled clergy of the whole Church, in the death of our bishop, have cause to mourn the loss of one of their best friends, one whose sympathies were never failing to succor with every means in his power, the afflicted, and who rejoiced in his own labors and the efforts of every one made to lighten their burdens and better their condition.

Resolved, That in the death of our beloved bishop, we, the clergy of the Diocese of Kansas, mourn the loss of one of its singular purity, loving sympathy, earnest devotion to duty, and noble aims, and we are proud of his legacy, especially the sick and needy, endeared him to all men, to the glory of his Redeemer.

Resolved, That we cannot express in mere words our grief and sense of loss; we lay it all before the throne of our Heavenly Father, and ask His intervention in our behalf, and that of our beloved Diocese.

Resolved, That we tender to the stricken family of our bishop our sincere sympathy in their great bereavement, and pray God to give them that consolation which His all-wise God can bestow.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of the bishop, and published in the Church papers.

GAMBLING, OF THIS SORT AND THAT.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I notice in THE CHURCHMAN of September 19, a paragraph to the effect that in 1774, Bishop Seabury received a sum of money from a lottery and entered the fact in his journal, with the pious exclamation added: "Five pounds—thank the Lord."

Your paragraphic editor then proceeds to moralize: "Since those days there has been a great change in public sentiment in regard to lotteries and (such) other things." Now, what are the moral grounds upon which public sentiment condemns certain modes of raising money for churches or making it for one's self? In other words, what is gambling? Almost simultaneously with the perusal of your brief article, I had occasion to counsel a young relative who had been just "hit on" at a country fair by a travelling sharper to the tune of a dollar, from his not over-full pocket, that all such attempts as that of his to get (as in his case) a watch chain without an equivalent were gambling. He retorted, "Then the churches all gamble."

Gambling, whether by cards, lotteries, dice, wheat-tickets, or anything else, is an attempt to cheat, coupled with a willingness, for the sake of the excitement and possible profits, to take the risk of getting cheated. The amount at stake makes no difference in the right and wrong of the matter. Whether by persons or corporations, whether at a church fair, on the street, or at a faro-table, makes none. Nor is it the question of "chance," for as there is no such thing as chance, there is none in these ways and methods, and there are really no "games of chance." We act most generally called so, and that is the point, out as an example of "chance" would, of course, be dice-throwing. But, in this there is no more chance than in the movements of the tides or of the sun. All is law throughout nature. Without law, nothing. The dice may seem to turn up by chance—but that is all.

Put the same dice, with the same faces up, in the same box, in the same exact way, in the very same spot of the box, shake the box with the very same force, turn the wrist the very same number of inches off from the table, tip the box at the identical angle, cause the dice to slide down the same side of the box always—in other words, fulfil perfectly and invariably the necessary conditions—then turn out your dice, and where is chance? There would, of course, often be the same spots up. It is not the chance in "games of chance" that makes them contraband. For there is none. It is the attempt to acquire without equivalent. They are games of cheat, not games of chance.

Of course this applies to a questionable method for finishing a church tower, or subsidizing an assistant-minister, or meeting the interest on our dearly beloved church debts, and to anything else. Licensed by law as the lottery is in Louisiana, and countenanced as it is by high names, it is still gambling, unless my definition be wrong, in this the one hundred and first year since Seabury and his five pounds.

License by law may entitle a man to keep a rum-shop (or a house that is worse), to keep a faro-table, to exact the payment of the widow's last farthing, to seize, under foreclosure of mortgage, the orphan's only patrimony, although all had been paid on it save the ultimate dollar; but would it be, while severely legal, in the least degree righteous?

Does not all this apply somewhat to the church-fair, where exorbitance is the rule and faro-practice is the fact, why not? A bazaar at which an honest article is bought at an honest price is one thing, and is beyond reproach or condemnation, unless there be something radically evil in buying and selling, in which case Christian people should never buy or sell at all; but one at which money is expected and taken without the fair and honorable equivalent in return. It is the pretence, or the absence of the equivalent, that differentiates "honest dealing" from dishonest. And church gambling is no less disreputable than any other. If "the churches all gamble," it is bad; all, however, do not. Let us be thankful that "selling for a dollar what cost four cents is getting out of percentage and getting into larceny, nix," is a remark that is becoming daily more and more improbable and unlikely to be made of our churches, at any rate. We need only to realize what is gambling, and to call it by its proper name. It is withholding the quid pro quo. An equivalent is as essential to honesty as the specific mention of one is to the validity of a deed at law. Honor to the bishops who have several times, lately, refused to accept any money made without the honest and honorable return of the "q. p. q." As to good Bishop Seabury, "tempora mutantur et nos mutantur in illis."

RIVERS IN ECCLESIASTES.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

"The rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again."—ECCLES. I. 7.

Language does not always mean what it seems. The words of "the preacher" I have just quoted, and sound at first sight and bearing as though they may describe the rise of vapor from the face of the sea to form clouds, which drop their water on the earth below. Yet as in the passage itself there is no mention of either rise, or vapor, or clouds, or earth, it may be; this is not the meaning "the son of David" intends us to see.

Just as account of "the rivers" is one of four contrasts he draws between the uncertainty and "vanity" of human life, and the fixed constitutions of the earth, the sun, the wind, and the rivers. These four objects form in the contrast an inseparable group. This being their intimate relation to each other, the Bible character of "the earth, the sun and the wind" will determine the Bible character of the rivers.

1. "The earth abideth forever." i. 4. The stability and eternity of the earth can be only apparent. Were these qualities described by "the preacher" as absolute, he would contradict the prediction of St. Peter. "The earth shall be burned up." (II. Epistles iii. 10.)

2. "The sun also riseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he ariseth." (3. 5.)

This description of the sun divides itself into two parts. The part, "Ariseth and goeth down," is necessarily only apparent, as the actual position of the sun in our solar system is stationary. The part, "Hasteth to his place of rising," exists not even in appearance, but is a theory prevalent at the time Ecclesiastes was written, that the sun possesses a hidden self-returning power.

3. "The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits." (i. 6.)

This account of the wind also has two divisions. In the first division, the changes of the wind from north to south, and from south to north, are wholly declarations respecting its outward impressions, recognized by our senses of sight, hearing, and touch, and are not explanations either of the composition, the origin, or the destination of the wind.

In the second division, there is the repetition of the old theory believed in at the time of Ecclesiastes, that the wind, as well as the sun, controlled the power of self return. "The wind returneth again according to his circuits."

4. "All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again." (i. 7.)

As with the passages concerning the sun and the wind, so with the rivers, there are two announcements.

(a) "All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full." All the Yukons, Columbias, Mississippis, Amazons, Danubes, Congos, Yang-tai-Kiangs, Lenas, do not deluge the oceans. To this constant balance between the supplies and the receptacles our eyes testify. The equilibrium is only apparent. "The preacher" attempts no scientific explanation.

(b) His father David provides him the leveling and measuring scales. "The waters go up mountains; they go down valleys." (Ps. civ. 8.)*

The false philosophy of the period, redistributing channels under ground, like the secret night return of the sun to the East, the author of Ecclesiastes, with filial reverence, adopts, and proclaims, "Unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again." The exclusive interpreters of Ecclesiastes i. 7 are its immediately preceding verses. Thus explained, this verse 7 derives, takes, retains, uses the life, form, color, complexion, meaning, influence of its antecedent and transmuting associate, what they say; it is, not science, but appearance, as it met the recipient eyes of David and David's son, and is portrayed by each.

SAMUEL FULLER.

VOLUNTARY AND COERCIVE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Your editorial on the Bishop of Rochester, say's (12th September) "under the voluntary system public worship must be maintained—but that portion of the community which is sufficiently interested—to make sacrifices." Exactly what our Lord says, "ye are the salt"—"ye are the light of the world." He clearly calls His followers to do what you say is expected under the voluntary system. You say "it falls upon a part to provide for the whole," and "this is inadequately done under the voluntary system." Then, clearly, more sacrifices are to be made by the chosen part for the careless whole. Our Lord did not expect, nor can we, that the careless and worldly, the selfish and covetous, should be "salt" and "light." All we get from them, we get for their sakes, which compromises some portion of duty and suppresses some measure of truth. Worldliness is strongly entrenched in the Church by this barrier. Hence the expenses of worship are greatly increased, and much is accounted necessary which is superfluous; which is necessary only to the habits of a kind of worshipers, but not at all to true worship. We claim inquired—worship, and expect the Church to furnish them. This is selfish and dishonorable to God; and this repels the simple and poor from His house. Judgment must begin at the house of God. The clergy must seek the honor which comes from God only, though they endure hardness. The expenses of a church should be regulated by what the people offer, and not by what the clergy estimate. On this solid basis all churches should begin, and as faith increases so will its fruits in sufficient support and proper ornamentation. God teaches us how to profit, and we must teach the people to "prove" Him; to bring all the tithes into His storehouse, and there will be meat in His house. Let Christians not be afraid or ashamed of poverty, but of unfruitfulness. Let us be taught of God how to behave ourselves in His house, and yield to no constraint but that of truth.

MOVEMENT FOR UNITY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In your last issue the Rev. Mr. Moore of Nashville, Tenn., asks "the nature of the communications between" the Methodist General Conference and the General Convention of 1868. I am at a distance from my library, and dare not attempt to answer the question at length without consulting my authorities. The convention journals for that year do not contain some of the facts, and the Methodist official records contain others. I will only say now that the conference was addressed by some of our clergy on the subject of unity, and appointed a committee of seven, all men of mark, to attend to the matter of the request. Our convention was notified (though not by the conference), and a commission was constituted. As I can see, the committee and the commission held no communication with each other, and I believe that neither was instructed to open communications. It is not remarkable that nothing came of this effort to promote unity, nor that it has already been almost forgotten. There are doubtless those who know more about the matter than I do, but, if farther information is desired from me, I shall be very happy to give your correspondent, or others, all that I possess, after my return to my parish.

ORIGIN OF A PHRASE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In the last issue of THE CHURCHMAN one of your correspondents writes "nil mortuum nisi bonum." At first I took these words for a confused recollection of the charitable sentiment, de mortuis nil nisi bonum, if that is the way it goes; but now it seems to me that I must be mistaken, and I write to ask where the phrase is to be found, among the classic authors, and whether it may not be the original of Shakespeare's,

"The evil that men do lives after them,
The good is oft interred with their bones."

WHAT SHAPED THE CONSTITUTION?

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Is there anything on record in ecclesiastical or other history of this country showing that the Constitution of the United States was based on or taken from the synodical government of the Presbyterian Church? It has been so stated by laymen and ministers of that denomination.

NEW BOOKS.

HEROISM OF RUSSIA. From the earliest times to 1882. By Alfred Rambaud, Chief of the Cabinet of Public Instruction and Fine Arts, at Paris, Corresponding Member of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg, etc. This work has been crowned by the French Academy. Translated by L. B. Lang. Edited and enlarged by Nathan Haskell Dole. Including a history of the Russo-Russian War, 1877-78, from the best authorities. By the Editor. In three volumes. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat.] pp. 400-400-410.

It is not every nation which can find its historian among its own people, still less is it possible for some nations to understand the history of their neighbors. As a rule no people comprehend fully the people which lies West of it. The elder civilization is generally perplexed over the younger, and the Western nation is usually the later one. On the other hand it is often hard for the Englishmen, for example, to go back to the Continental period, or for a man of Western Europe to divine the ways and thoughts of the Oriental. Where a Frenchman's prejudices are not involved, or his amour propre wounded, he makes a good historian. He has the power of seeing clearly, and describing forcibly, and if his intellect is not dominated by a theory, or his spirit enslaved by a partisanship, he makes an admirable, perhaps the most admirable historian.

A Frenchman seems to us to be therefore well qualified to write Russian history. There is that happy distance between St. Petersburg and Paris which prevents the bitterness of rivalry. Russia has been dependent on France for that part of its civilization wherein nations are most apt to misunderstand and despise each other's social culture, manners and the lighter literature. The educated Russian speaks and writes the French language even better perhaps than the Frenchman himself. There are no burning questions at present between the two.

It is not to be wondered at that M. Alfred Rambaud has given a very interesting and able history of Russia. He has done what every true historian should do in keeping contemporary events in view, so that the reader is not forced to be continually consulting his chronological tables to know what was happening elsewhere at the same time. With a country like Russia, where the earlier history carries no familiar recollection to the mind and where till Peter the Great it never emerges out of its Cimmerian darkness into European contact, this is indispensable. While history is confined to the intrigues of one family of Boyar's against another by the strifes between Moscow and Kiev, Novgorod and Pskov, one has no sign to tell whether it belongs to the era of Charlemagne or of Charles the Fifth, is contemporary with William the Conqueror or with William of Orange. Not till Peter the Great did Russia begin to keep step with the march of European civilization. To armies trained in the tactics of Marlborough and Eugene it could oppose clouds of Tatar cavalry armed with bows and arrows and clad in sheepskins. Its life, its thought, its spirit was Asiatic—a mingled web of Byzantine and Mongol embroidery upon a Slavish ground.

The first volume of Mr. Rambaud comes down to the period of Peter the Great. In itself the history is almost as barren, as monotonous and flat as the steppes of that Russia over which moved in battle and migration the composite people we now name Russia. It is no small proof of the author's skill that he contrives to make it interesting. There is a singular parallel between the story of this and of the other extremity of Europe. The history of Russia is like a hague and coarse caricature of the history of Spain. The conquest by the Varangians reminds one of the conquest of Spain by the Visigoths, the Mohammedan Mongols exercise over Russia the same dominion which the Saracens obtain over the Iberian Peninsula, but as a Tatar to an Arab so was the barbarous tyranny of the one to the polished civilization of the other. The Kremlin and the Alhambra are the respective types of the two. But the political effect was the same. In the effort to drive out the Moors, the despotism which fell upon Spain began. Ferdinand of Aragon was the forerunner of Philip the Second. So the effort to expel the Mongols destroyed the freedom of the Russian States. Ivan the Terrible was the preparation for Peter the Great.

It is worthy too of note, that a German element in each case entered into the work. The house of Romanoff is largely of German blood, as the Emperor Charles the Fifth was German. One needs to study the confused and barbarous story of Early Russia, in order to understand its present history. M. Rambaud has told it with great skill, and if his work lacks in interest it is certainly no fault of his.

The second volume extends from the birth of Peter the Great to the death of Alexander I. It begins with the battles of Charles the Twelfth, of Sweden, and ends with the battles of Napoleon I, of France. Though written by a Frenchman, this latter portion is written with fairness. Probably only a French historian could give with justice the true aspect of the successive partisans of Poland and expose with equal candor the inherent weaknesses of the Polish State and the ambitious policy of the three parties to the spoliation. This volume, from beginning to end, is intensely fascinating. It marks the entrance of Russia into European politics, it displays the empire of the Czars as the most potent factor in much of European history.

The third volume extends from the accession of Nicholas to the last Turkish war, namely, to the yesterday of the present time. We do not accept entirely the story of the Crimean war, as told in these pages. Perhaps no Frenchman and no Englishman could write that with perfect fairness. To each, his own army's share was the chief, and the others only the accessory part. But the main point is that the history of the Russian overthrow is kindly and fairly given, and that is the principal purpose.

From the close of the Crimean war this volume goes on to describe the Reforms of Alexander II., the emancipation of the serfs and the efforts made in a liberal direction. It tells the story of the last Polish insurrection and its hopeless failure, and then devotes some chapters to the history of Russian art and letters. A brief review of the European complications which led to the Russian setting aside of the Treaty of Paris leads to the last war between Russia and Turkey, which is pointedly and clearly described, and the volume ends with the assassination of Alexander II.

We give a more than usually extended notice to this work, because we recognize in it one of the books of the time. Every day is bringing fresh incidents in the career of Russia, and no one can hope to understand these rightly without being prepared by a knowledge of the past. There are three leading ideas which govern Russian policy. One is to obtain an outlet for the vast domain in which the Russian nation is imprisoned. The Scandinavian peoples and the frosts of winter hold the straits of the Baltic and the mouth of the Neva. Constantinople is the other objective point of Russian ambition. The second is the headship of the Slavonic race, for which through centuries it has contended with Poland, and in which the bitter antagonism of the Romish and Greek Churches has borne a part. The third is hostility to the Turkish races, which is as undying now as when the troops of the Tatar sovereigns menaced Moscow. The one check upon Russia is its internal weakness, a weakness which keeps pace with every advance toward civilization. It is a duel between two forces, government and people. The system is Asiatic in spite of European forms; the spirit stirring within the people is European in spite of Asiatic habits, temper and training. The first Napoleon said at St. Helena, "In fifty years Europe will be Republican or Cossack." The half century has elapsed, but the prediction is not fulfilled. We commend this book as one deserving a very full and careful study, and as a delightful reading for young and old.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY SERIES. The American Caucus System. Its Origin, Purpose and Utility. By George W. Lawton. [New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 167.

We find the idea of this book to be "stick to your party," and go in for "measures, not men." We should say it was written in the interests of that form of Republicanism which admits the necessity of civil service reform—if it can be carried out for the benefit of the Republican party. Mr. Lawton has given a rather uncertain and desultory account of what the American caucus is, and then his reasons for preferring it as an instrument of political action. He objects to what he calls "self-nomination," viz.: the appearance of a candidate before his constituents to offer himself.

We confess that we do not agree with this book, but our objection is based less upon what is directly said than what is implied. The idea of the American caucus was in the outset a secret gathering, at which only the affiliated were present in order to concert action for controlling a coming public and open meeting. Its radical principle was a doubtful one, and it is exposed to all sorts of political vices. It may be modified into a "primary" meeting, but behind it will always be the action of the professional politicians who "fix the slate" and "run the machine" so long as it is worth the while for professional politicians to exist; that is, so long as in office, or in the contingencies of office, rewards are held out for successful campaigners. There is but one remedy for the evils of American political life, and that is to make it undesirable except for high motives. We do not agree with this book, but we hope it will be read as presenting one side of a question which ought to be studied very faithfully. If it does not directly solve the problem, it may by its very failure suggest a solution in some opposite way. It is a good sign that able and thoughtful men like Mr. Lawton are taking up these questions in earnest.

LECTURES ON THE LORD'S PRAYER. By William R. Williams. (New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.) pp. 241. $1.25.

These are able, thoughtful, and suggestive sermons. We find it rather a pity that Mr. Williams should go out of his way to make an anti-liturgical argument which is only conspicuous by its weakness. Extempore prayer consists of two parts, a mental and a spiritual effort. There is always the peril, when it becomes a fixed part of public worship, that the mental effort will overpower the spiritual. But the great fact remains that all prayer offered before an audience is liturgical. The petitions are offered by the minister to be followed by the congregation. For them the only possible difference is that in the one case the liturgy is made upon the spot, with very varying values, and is unfamiliar, in the other it is in carefully-considered words, into which the listener can throw his whole soul. But for the ignorance of congregations and the vanity of ministers non-liturgical worship would long ago have disappeared. Mr. Williams objects to the liturgical forms of the Church, that they are not "inspired"—which is as much as to say that the extemporized prayers of which he speaks are—a conclusion which will hardly hold water. The tone of these sermons (apart from one or two little controversial interjections like the above) is devout and lofty, and they might have been preached from any pulpit with equal acceptance. It speaks well for the times that such a volume can be published, with a prospect of being as generally read as it deserves.

LITERATURE.

THE REV. DR. W. A. LEONARD'S "Brief History of the Christian Church," intended for parish and church schools, has proved to be popular and useful, and E. P. Dutton & Co. announce a third edition.

THE first paper of the New York Shakespeare Society, published for the society by Brentano Bros., is entitled, "Ecclesiastical Law in Hamlet: The Burial of Ophelia." It is by R. S. Goerneys, and will be read with great interest.

Two important articles in the September Sanitarian are "Rules for the Hygienic Treatment of Pulmonary Consumption," by Dr. Richardson, and "Diet in Relation to Age and Activity." Month by month the magazine discusses the most vital and important questions with marked ability.

"SUNDAY," that longtime favorite with many a child, continues as interesting as ever; indeed it seems rather to grow younger and more vigorous as it gets age. The yearly volume containing the numbers issued during the year and now bound together, is a most attractive volume. Its title page bears the well-known imprint of E. & J. B. Young & Co.

MR. WHITTAKER, about the middle of October, will issue his new "Clergyman's Companion," a needed work, and another edition of De Mille's "Pocket Periodical Register." He also announces "Expositions," by Dr. Samuel Cox, "Simple Lessons for Home Use," the Rev. Geo. C. Foley's "Catechism on the Christian Year," and "Half-hours in Field and Forest," by J. G. Wood, with many illustrations.

ART.

The Music Festival referred to in this column a fortnight ago, of the Worcester Musical Association, for the 28th year, proved the autumnal event of that thrifty and public spirited city. Indeed it was the autumnal musical event for an area including the New England States, with many principal cities outside, gave daily accounts of its procedure forwarded by telegraph and mail. And yet with this strong art prestige so widely recognized, Worcester is a city of but 70,000 people, mostly given to manufacturing and traffic.

It was no idle, dilettanti class who "patronize" the fine arts. The managers, directors, and working members of this association are all workers, in one way and another. Even the chorus of 500—"noble 500," let us say—not only accept the pleasant toil of learning cantatas and oratorios, snatching often valuable time from bread winning industry for the purpose, and the days and labor demanded by an overcrowded festival week, but each one buys and pays for a season ticket at cost of one dollar and a half which admits them to participate in their own chorus work and to lend an ear to the rest of the musical work when the chorus is not busy. This is devotion to musical art almost without precedent, yet the public too often forget or ignore this delicate obligation which it owes to a choral organization, critically and not often gratefully accepting the beautiful usufruct of these unselfish labors.

The writer has attended and studied the festival work and week, with a purpose of laying his conclusions before a wider public, because more widely dispersed than secular journalism reaches.

This column is read more or less in every considerable city in the United States and Canada, and for such there is invaluable suggestion to be had out of the Worcester Festival week.

The origin and organization of this society be it observed, is due to public spirited amateurs and not to the musical profession. The fundamental difficulty in the way of all such undertakings lies in the petty jealousies, and cross-purposes of local musicians. This is a hard saying, but it is truth. Had the Worcester people depended upon the musical profession at home to organize and carry forward this work, it would never have been accomplished. So the same class of men who have at heart the good of public education, orderly and attractive highways, thrifty libraries, lecture courses, public morals and public education recognized the supreme efficiency of a social musical culture as a central influence in sound amusement and recreation.

Without endowments or serious personal ventures, these men took the project in hand in a business-like, prudent, circumspect way, beginning at the beginning, contented to plant their acorn, and wait for the oak. And at last we sat under the oak, refreshed by its hospitalities and refreshed by the wind and bird-song keeping holiday in its wide-spreading branches.

Whenever there is a desirable artist within reach, no considerations of clique, locality, or favoritism interrupt negotiations. The leading artists know all about this annual meet, and are glad enough to accept engagements precisely as the board see fit to make them. There is no tyranny and browbeating of stars or favorites. The direction shuts out all such insufferable distractions.

The first result of that thousands share an art festival full of fat things, rich enough for the most fastidions, and sufficiently varied to satisfy all rational idiosyncrasies. Multitudes are brought together from all directions, acquaintances are formed, friendships strengthened, and influences set at work which will sweeten and lighten a year of toils and burdens. Young people affiliate with it, and, as the writer witnesses, grow gray in its service.

The resources for church choral needs are largely multiplied. The festival educates all the while competent singers, leaders, and conductors for church choirs, and the people, while they listen, learn to understand a higher vernacular of worship in the Lord's house.

The Mechanics' Hall provides a concert-room with all necessary facilities for rehearsals, libraries, committees—seating two thousand people—with a really grand concert organ with four manuals, perfectly adapted to the requirements of its festival, while the event moves forward, from first to last, without burry, confusion, or disappointment.

An insatiable music-hunger is developed, and from twelve to fifteen hundred are found often at the 9:30 morning rehearsals. Next week we shall complete our study of the festival.

"I WAS GLAD WHEN THEY SAID UNTO ME," ETC.

Without, a burning sun o'er waving grain,
Within, deep shade 'neath frescoed Angel's face;

Without, the choking dust in narrow lanes,
Within, Faith's atmosphere in holy place.

Without, the clamor of a busy world,
With bitter, wrangling tongues that never cease,
Within, the music of a voice Divine,
That speaketh "peace."

Without, his life's angry battle-field, at best,
Where glastly relicts strew the broken ground;

Without, a weary spirit seeking rest,
Within, rest found!

CHAPTER I.

Forebodings.

"She plaited broad and long.

A strong sword belt, and wore with silver thread
And crimson, in the belt a strange device,
A crimson grail within a silver beam
O thou, my love, whose love is one with mine, Go forth." —The Holy Grail.

Above them the dark blue of the Italian sky, flecked with light feathery clouds; under their feet the damp soil which has drifted over the old floor where, sometimes, the wild beasts, sometimes the even fiercer men, had so often shed the blood of those who met them, with curse or with prayer, as combatants or as martyrs: for around them were the arched and pillared walls of the Coliseum.

"It must have been beautiful once, before it was stripped of all its vegetation," said Stella Grey, thoughtfully. "Now I do not care to be in it, except up yonder, where we could look toward the lilac-colored hills beyond the Campagna. Why did they spoil it?"

"They say it was because the trees growing out of the stones pulled them apart," answered her companion. "Sometimes, you know, Stella, we have to strip our lives of all their beauty for the sake of preserving the edifice of Truth."

"But perhaps we may be making a mistake," persisted the girl, looking at the grave face, young, yet careworn, which he half turned from her. "God gave us beauty," she added, softly; "surely He meant us to have it to enjoy."

"Stella!" cried the young man, with a thrill of pain in his voice, which she only half understood, "don't tempt me!"

The girl turned her face to him, looking up to him, and he gazed at her as if he had never seen her before. Yet he knew every beautiful line of that girlish countenance, each pure light in those lovely eyes, the tiny curls of the soft brown hair peeping from under the pretty shady hat. He knew the graceful, too fragile-looking form of the girl with whom he had been allowed all a cousin's privileges, though, indeed, the relationship between them was very slight. His uncle had married Stella Grey's mother, that was all. But the mother and stepfather trusted Stella with this "Cousin" Edward Shelley, and, for instance, as today, Mrs. Shelley would sit quietly in the carriage outside the Coliseum, while Edward and Stella "did" the place for her. Mrs. Shelley did not like Rome on one account, as an acquaintance of hers declared, parodying the well-known saying, it would have been to her a very tolerable place if it had not been so old.

What possible interest Edward and Stella could find inside these "mouldy walls" Mrs. Shelley did not know. But she was content to wait for them as long as they liked basking in the sun, only troubled by having to say "c'è niente," "basta," or "inutile," or whatever scrap of negative Italian occurred to her on being bothered with guides, beggars, or photograph-sellers.

In the meanwhile Edward and Stella had climbed up the half-fit stairs and stumbled on to the outer walls, thence descending again to the lower part of the theatre where they marked the old, but only medieval remains, which had been built in the centre, as barracks perhaps, and looked at the holes by which the floor could be raised for the human combats, or the water let in for the naval spectacles.

"Isn't it hard to be romantic?" Edward went on, after his little outburst. Stella did not understand the appeal he had startled himself by making. He wanted to change the subject, but as so often happens in such cases, neither of them could change their mood. "This stripped Coliseum visited by our friends, the Britannic and American tourists, isn't a place we can get up much sentiment over, is it, Stella?"

"I am more disappointed with it than with anything in Rome; it is lovely from Caesar's palace, but here—"

"Every age has used the Coliseum as a quarry for its great buildings, and—"

"Yes, I see; but what I should like to feel would be some vivid realization of what it would be to stand here with the beasts ready to run out by that horrible, long passage! Fancy, hearing them coming, coming, all that way, straight, direct, and then looking up—the crowds around—no help—all eager! Then, perhaps, to see the others first torn to pieces before the lions fell on me, the hot breath, the bloody mouth, the paw, like an enormous cat striking at one—like a mouse in proportion! Then to think, I might be safe; just to conceal that I was a Christian would save me. Oh, Edward!" cried the girl, "I could not be a martyr. I know that I should have failed, and then— It is too horrible, Edward! What is my religion worth if I could not suffer for it? And I know that I could not. I am too afraid of pain, of torture. Oh, I am glad that the days of martyrdom are past; are not you? It seems cowardly. Perhaps you don't understand—you are brave."

"I am not brave, Stella," he answered, with strange light flashing into his eyes.

"The days of martyrdom are not past; and I fail."

"You? You fail, Edward? I wasn't thinking of ourselves. But if I had done so, I should have said you were very brave. I can imagine how you would have faced the lions and gloried in your martyrdom. I know, though they haven't told me all, and I suppose they don't know all, what you have had to go through in leaving the Roman—I suppose you call it the Catholic Church?"

"I did not leave the Catholic Church, Stella; those who call themselves Catholics would say that I had, or rather that they had expelled an unworthy member, degraded him from his priesthood. Yet I believe in the Catholic Church in a higher, nobler sense, and no man can take from me the consecration of my office. Yes, if you think that what men can inflict on one in these modern times, either as under their discipline or as expelled from it is all that one has to bear in such a case,—I am brave enough. And I tell you, Stella, that I should welcome torture—the scourge, the fire, the easier death of the lion, easier still the axe,—sooner than pass through what I have done lately or may have to do. At least one then would have done with life, instead of having it before me."

Stella was frightened—frightened at him, frightened for him. But the strong man needed the relief of expression, and he felt that the delicate, childish-looking maiden by his side was worthy of his deepest confidences. But she knew very little—knew not what Edward Shelley had suffered and lost in joining the Communion in which she herself had been brought up, in leaving with a saddened and heavy heart that in which he had been bred and consecrated to the priesthood. But she said the right thing, in her faltering tones, knowing that such words were the only comfort she could give, yet feeling that it was not for her, an ignorant, feeble girl to teach this man who knew the truth so well, and acted so nobly up to his convictions.

"But, Edward, the awful torture and the near death, or the little torture and the long life—"

"Little torture?" he interrupted, but she went on bravely:

"They are, great or little, God's crosses to His glory."

"Ad majorem Dei gloriam," yes, and to the greater glory of God; he answered. "Stella, you can't know what I am thinking of. I am not complaining of the past, I am not complaining of the results of my excommunication, nor of the wrench it is to shut myself out from dearest friends, from old associates, from the whole, for the sake of what almost seems sometimes, a few details—all men in my position have to go through that—from whatever to whatever branch they go. It is nothing of that sort. But, it seems to me there is a higher call coming to me—a call to strip my life of all that has lately begun to make it worth having once more. Remember, in these days, a man stands face to face with his own duty. It is the state of grown-up life, the penalty of freedom, that you have not to suffer at the hands of authority; you have to suffer at your own. Yourself must choose your duty, yourself must see the necessity for suffering, yourself must inflict that suffering upon yourself—and all the while as you said just now you think, "I might be safe, I might be happy—God sent me happiness, God gave me this to enjoy; why suffer? why put away His gifts of which I might make such good use? Stella! pray for me—often while we are in Rome. Pray that I may see my way, that I may know which course is for the greater glory of God."

There was silence. Stella could not answer. She was both puzzled and troubled. He recovered himself. "It isn't fair, is it? to trouble your young life with my dark thoughts. I don't mean to do so. In fact, I think it is a mistake my being here, but I can't leave Rome for several reasons just now, and Uncle Herbert likes me to look after you and my aunt, whilst he is archaeologising. So you see I have good excuse for staying, and staying with you; but I ought to go, I believe."

"Ought to go? why, Edward, I—"

She stopped suddenly, coloring very prettily, but much ashamed of herself.

Happily in came two American tourists—not the charming well-bred women one meets very often—but two of the vulgar ones. They take a delight in disturbing other sight-seers. They seem to want an audience, and to be quite unaware when they have secured one, by dint of standing as close as possible to unoffending strangers, that if you have an audience you should please it.

"And they don't know how those blocks of stone got up there, and they have taken away all those stations of the cross, and the cross from the centre. Now that's a real pity; it used to be perfectly lovely to see all those people kneeling about. I liked to see the people praying. Don't you like to see the people praying?" etc., etc.

Meanwhile Stella and Edward passed by. Stella felt that the woman was looking her up and down, and noting how her gown was made; but Stella's dress could well bear scrutiny by a stranger, and her face could not, at this moment, but betray her to any one who knew her—as she thought.

"Have we kept you waiting, mother?"

"Not at all. I much prefer being in the sun here to going inside. It always feels like Sunday afternoon in Rome, except on Sundays, I think. Do be a little amusing, now, Edward, and leave ruins alone for today. One doesn't always want to live in the past," suggested Mrs. Shelley, and they tried to obey her.

It is strange, but often true, that if you want real wit you will find it oftenest in a nervous nature, which is suffering acutely at the moment it is trying to divert itself by amusing others. So, Mrs. Shelley, not very clear-sighted, thought that she had never seen Edward in better spirits than during that afternoon drive. He was dressed in dark clothes, with something of the clerical or niversity coach aspect about them. Mrs. Shelley knew that he had severed his connection with the Roman branch of the Church, and that his uncle, in rejoicing over this, was chiefly glad because Mrs. Shelley saw his nephew's growing attachment to sweet Stella, and that there was now no bar to the marriage between "the two children," as Edward and Stella still were to their elders. "Edward and Stella understood one another," Mrs. Shelley observed to her husband. "It has all come about very nicely."

THE FIRST EUROPEAN PORCELAIN MANUFACTORY.

BY THOMAS HURT.

In one of the most picturesque parts of Saxony, some twenty miles below Dresden, on the left bank of the Elbe, just where two small streams, the Meisse and the Tuehisch flow into this river, lies Meissen, at present a town of 15,000 inhabitants. As early as the beginning of the twelfth century, Meissen had already long been the seat of a warlike line of Margraves; men of this title were originally mere governors and subordinates of the Emperer of Germany, but many of them were afterwards given by him almost absolute sovereignty over extensive tracts of country, an hereditary succession being at the same time established. Accordingly the Margravate of Meissen, which had been granted in 1123 by the Emperor Lothair the Second to Konrad von Wettin, was soon after made hereditary in his family forever. The Princes of the Wettin dynasty were among the bravest and most powerful of that stormy period, they were allied by marriage with the reigning houses of Austria, Bavaria, Brunswick, Brandenburg, etc., and in 1423, Frederick the Quarrelsome, (Friedrich der Streitbare), who was at that time Margrave, succeeded to the Duchy of Saxony, assuming the title of Elector (Kurfürst). From the two grandsons of this prince are descended the present royal house of Saxony, and the family of the Duke of Saxe-Altenburg.

In 1649 Friedrich August the First, surnamed the Strong, succeeded to the Electorate, and in 1697 was chosen King of Poland by the noblemen of that country, ascending the throne made vacant by the death of John Sobieski and taking the title of August the Second. August, although a prince who had travelled much, a brave warrior and a great lover of art, was in some respects not above the ignorance of his time; during the first decade of the eighteenth century he took under his patronage a young adventurer, one Böttcher, an apothecary, who professed to possess the art of making gold, and wished for assistance in the pursuit of his experiments and investigations. The Elector accordingly established this man first at Meissen and afterward in his castle of Koenigstein on the Elbe, the strongest fortress in Saxony, where he would be safe from the Swedes, whom August was then at war, and gave him at different times money to the amount of 150,000 thalers. Böttcher's success was far greater than that usually attained by such alchemists, for at Koenigstein in 1707, among the various combinations of his experiments, he hit upon one which gave as a result a kind of imperfect porcelain, quite opaque, and colored reddish-brown, by oxide of iron in the clay. Such was the origin of the highly prized ware known later as Old Dresden, Vieux Saxe, or more correctly Old Meissen.

The importance of Böttcher's discovery seems to have been at once recognized, for the exportation of clay of the kind used in his experiment was immediately forbidden under pain of death. Further attempts effected great improvements, and in 1709 white porcelain, with and without glaze, was for sale at one of the great fairs of Leipzig.

During the next year (1710) the Elector determined to establish a regular factory for the production of the ware, and took for this purpose Schloss Albrechtsburg, the ancestral castle of the Margraves, built in 1481 upon a commanding hill, rising above Meissen, with a beautiful outlook upon the Elbe, but now deserted for a more luxurious residence, the palace in Dresden.

The endeavors to conceal the secret of the art proved unsuccessful, and during the first half of the eighteenth century factories were established at Vienna, Berlin, Sévres near Paris, and at other places in Europe. Böttcher himself was discovered to be in correspondence with Berlin in regard to the secret, and was thrown into prison, where he died in 1719. Still the porcelain of the Meissen factory retained its prestige, and long surpassed all other on account of the excellence of the artists employed in the modeling and painting and the superiority of its raised ornamentation; also because of peculiar properties of the clay used there, which was to be found only in certain parts of Saxony, especially at Seiditz, near Meissen. This clay is still found; it is sometimes of a yellowish tinge, but for the most part chalky white, and contains spar, destroyed to some extent by the weather, and silicon.

For upwards of forty years after the establishment of the factory at Meissen, the porcelain produced was of great value—indeed none other was made in Europe until 1730—and small figures of it, decorated in the "rococo" style were especially prized. Specimens of this ware now command fabulous prices. But in 1756 the progress of the art received a blow from which it has never fully recovered. Frederick the Great, of Prussia, invading Saxony at the beginning of the Seven Years War, sacked Meissen and carried off with him workmen and models. The factory was soon afterward re-established, some of the models being recovered, but the more modern ware has never attained the prestige of "Old Meissen."

The manufacture was long carried on at great expense to the private purse of the sovereigns, but was ceded by the king some years since to the Government of Saxony. The work is still carried on, and the productions, which imitate to some extent the ancient models in addition to more modern designs, continue to command high prices.

The factory, now established in a handsome and spacious building built especially for the purpose about a mile from the old castle, employs upwards of six hundred workmen, and is the source of considerable revenue to the State. Its workrooms are open to visitors at stated times for a small entrance fee, and guides are to be found there. Some account of the "modus operandi" may be of interest.

The clay when first brought in is placed in large tubs or vats filled with water, and the whole is then reduced to a white liquid by means of a beating and stirring process, somewhat resembling the churning of milk; the spar, which is still in a state of preservation, and the sand, settling to the bottom. The water filled with the particles of clay is next poured off into other vessels, in which the clay in its turn settles to the bottom; to it is then added spar, quartz and sand, which have previously been pounded and ground to a powder, the whole being made by the addition of water into a sort of pulp; this is put into large bowls of dry gypsum, which quickly absorbs the water and leaves the remaining mass of the consistency of a paste, which, after being properly kneaded, is laid away in damp cellars to ferment. The longer the clay is left in this state the better it is supposed to become; the Chinese are said to have sometimes allowed it to remain so for fifty years.

When taken out for use the clay is once more thoroughly kneaded; next comes the shaping and moulding. If a vessel of circular and regular form is desired, the work is easily accomplished by placing the clay in a round vessel, which is then made to revolve quickly by means of a wheel worked by the foot, a semi-circular plate of iron being firmly held in the clay from above, in a perpendicular position; it is soon left scooped out in the desired shape. For more complex forms and designs the assistance of moulds is necessary, of which the factory possesses an enormous number, of all shapes and sizes, made of gypsum, in such a manner that they may be separated into two or more parts to allow of the removal of the object moulded; all legs, arms, feet, hands, cup-handles and small objects which are frequently used, are first thus formed and then attached to the main position by hand, the parts joined being first slightly roughed, and touched with a brush dipped in liquid glue. All objects of a large size, which have raised ornaments, or can be made up out of small parts, are thus built up. A figure of Jupiter drawn in a chariot by eagles, which was perhaps a foot high and twice as long, had been made in four separate parts of about equal size; these had then been joined to complete the whole, each part having first had every small object thus "tacked on" to the main portion. This main portion or ground work may be formed, if simple, by mould, otherwise by hand. The wavy edge given to some plates and dishes is made by hand with a knife, and for edges of open work the pattern is first traced upon the object in charcoal, and the openings then cut with a sharp instrument of steel.

For very small objects of more complex form and intricate design, of which flowers make a great part, a more artistic method is necessary, and they are modelled by hand. I watched one of the workmen making a little rose; he first took a small lump of the clay, which seemed about the consistency of putty, and rolled it out upon a smooth board into a thin, round roll, which, when slightly bent in one or two places, formed the stem of the flower; another and much smaller bit he flattened upon the board with the tip of his forefinger and by means of one or two touches from the other fingers, afterward removing small, superfluous pieces with a sharp steel instrument. He had in less than a minute formed his clay into an excellent imitation of a rose leaf! Each separate leaf was thus made, and they were then attached, one by one, to the stalk, with the help of a little paste. The whole was then ready to be fastened as an ornament to some larger object. I asked an old man who had just finished a large flower, the centre of which must have contained at least fifty separate stamina, how much time the whole had taken. His answer was that he had now become so accustomed to the work that he could complete such a flower in about three hours.

The porcelain once moulded into the proper shapes, the next process is the first baking or firing. For this it is put into ovens, but only allowed to remain until sufficiently fired to prevent its dissolving in water. This point reached, the process begins to differ, according to the kind of productions desired, and the ware may be here divided into four classes—white porcelain, porcelain of white ground simply decorated in a dark blue color, porcelain elaborately decorated in various colors, and "biscuit." The last kind is the simplest, and merely needs another firing to be completed. The white porcelain undergoes two more processes, the first of which is glazing. For this it is dipped into tubs containing a thick liquid composed of powdered quartz, gypsum, and water. This is rapidly absorbed by the dry clay, the glazing matter remaining upon the surface in the form of a white powder, and the porcelain is then ready for the second firing. The peculiarity of this next process is that each separate object is inclosed for it in a case made of some dry, clayey substance resembling fire-brick. When thus covered, they are piled up in huge circular brick ovens about ten feet in diameter and eight in height. The doors of the ovens are walled up with brick, and fires of wood are lighted in the iron fire-places which surround them. When the whole has been brought to a white heat the fires are allowed to die out, and all is left in a glow, sometimes for as long as four days. Each oven has a small glass-covered opening, through which the progress of the baking may be observed.

The porcelain, when taken out, is perfectly hard and of a glossy white, but greatly shrunk (a dinner-plate of ordinary size will shrink almost two inches in diameter during this firing), and is ready for sale.

Now for the ware decorated in blue. The process of making this, as well as the color in which it is decorated, may be said to be peculiar to the Meissen factory, and two hundred workmen are employed here upon it alone. This porcelain, immediately after the first burning, when it is still "biscuit," is sent to the painting-room, where the pattern, pricked in small holes upon paper, is laid upon it, and powdered charcoal being rubbed upon the top, leaves through the holes the outlines of the pattern, which are then filled in by hand with a brush dipped in a black substance closely resembling India ink. The whole is completed by being put through exactly the same process of glazing and firing which I have already described. The painting, although at first completely hidden by the glazing mixture, is afterward brought out through this by the heat, which also reduces the black color to a dark blue, causing, in the mean time, the same great shrinkage in size.

Only the processes used for the more elaborately decorated kinds now remain to be described. These are not painted like the blue ware when still in the form of biscuit, but are immediately after the first firing glazed and put through the same severe second firing. Then they go to the painting room. Almost all the designs have been in use many years, and are repeated over and over; the small circular portraits, landscapes and scenes, painted upon smooth parts of the china, are for the most part copies, greatly diminished of course in size, of old line engravings, many portfolios of which have been long years in the factory, each bearing the mark "Königliche Porzellanfabrik." The colors used are mineral paints, ground exceedingly fine, combined with fluid glass and mixed, when put on, with oil. Of the excellence of the artists employed at Meissen it is unnecessary to speak. At this same stage of the work the gilding is done, and, the decoration now finished, the porcelain is once more put into the clay cases and walled up in the ovens, which are this time however only brought to a red heat. The heavy gilding comes out of this last firing dull and must be polished by hand; the lighter kind, the secret of which is still unknown, is already bright, but is likely to wear off, if the object be one in frequent use.

Thus we see that "biscuit" is merely fired once, white porcelain fired, glazed and then fired a second time, the blue and white being painted between the first firing and the glazing, while all other ware is fired, glazed, fired the second time, then painted and gilded, and finally fired a third time, after which the process is complete, unless the gilding be heavy, in which case polishing is still necessary.

The factory employs, as I have said, between six and seven hundred workmen, of whom two hundred are occupied upon the blue ware alone. A considerable number of the whole are women and children, and nearly all the employees have spent the greater part of their lives there, beginning at a very early age. The extreme youth of some of those employed in the painting department is especially remarkable. They all receive pensions when unfitted for work by age, and it is to make up a fund for these that the money received from visitors as entrance fees is used. To insure more attentive labor, all work is paid for by the piece, and nothing accepted which is not approved upon examination.

All the "biscuit" and porcelain is after completion subjected to a searching scrutiny, and those specimens which are in any way defective (cracks, spots and warping are the most usual faults) are disposed of at auctions held somewhere in Saxony once every year. Besides these auctions there are but four places where one can be perfectly safe from deception in buying the porcelain, these are the sale-room connected with the factory, the Royal Porcelain Depots in Leipzig and in Dresden, and a small shop, also in Dresden, which is permitted to keep defective specimens for sale; here good pieces are often to be found at greatly reduced prices. The distinguishing mark put upon the Meissen china consists of two crossed swords (Kaschwerter) stamped in blue upon the bottom of every piece; no ware without this is genuine; the mark is however sometimes forged.

Many beautiful and interesting specimens of the old Meissen ware are to be found in the extensive Royal Porcelain Collection of Saxony, which was begun in 1716 by August the Strong, and has within the last ten years been placed in the Museum Johanneum in Dresden. Of the most interesting of the objects here on exhibition, I will give some slight description.

The porcelain in the museum is for the most part chronologically arranged, and the collection of Saxon ware begins therefore with the early attempts of Böttcher, the first genuine porcelain of Europe. These date between 1707 and 1712, and are nearly all of a dull red color, a few rather late specimens being quite black. This ware consists to a great extent of cups and tea or coffee services, the pieces of which are small and by no means perfect in symmetry of shape.

A large plate, intended to be round, but somewhat warped, bearing in its centre the date 1709 in large figures, marks the beginning of the attempts to make white porcelain, and more specimens of the work of this period are to be seen in the form of vases and flags, all more or less imperfect. The next step in the progress of the china is shown by some plates and dishes of what is known as the scattered-flowers design (Streublümchenmuster), which was long very popular. This originated at a time when the art was still very defective, and many imperfections were to be seen in the ware when completed, each of which was concealed by painting a small flower just over it, the effect of the whole giving the design its name. (Date about 1730).

Everything made after this and before the destruction of the first factory (1756) may be considered as belonging to the period of the highest excellence of the Meissen ware, and it is the specimens of this time which exceed all others in artistic beauty, and of which the remainder of the royal collection chiefly consists.

Of the very large objects the most noticeable are almost all white. The largest is an immense glazed vase at least six feet in height, decorated with a simple design in biscuit. A model of an equestrian statue of August the Third, which was to have been erected in Dresden, and a representation of the scene of the crucifixion, both entirely white and glazed, are remarkable for size as well as for the accuracy of all details; as is also a huge, unglazed bust of August the Third.

The best colored specimens of large size are two imitations of vegetable life, one a camelia tree, more than four feet tall, covered with white flowers and dark green leaves, all of the natural size. The other, which is a little smaller, represents a mass of different flowers and leaves, chiefly lilies, asters and blue-bottles, all of the proper colors, on stems of enameled wire so skillfully fastened that they are moved by a breath of wind. Such is the excellence of the work of this and of the camelia, that at a distance of a few feet it would be quite impossible to distinguish them from the flowers themselves.

All over the floors of the collection is scattered a multitude of beasts and birds—dogs, cats, foxes, lions, elephants, goats, cranes, peacocks, etc., made of white glazed china, most of them about the size of a very big dog, these are rather roughly executed, and were formerly used as ornaments in the royal gardens.

Some of the dinner services are exceedingly handsome; especially the yellow hunting service of August the Strong, the apple-green one of August the Third, both elaborately decorated, and also one bearing the arms of France and of Navarre, which formed part of the trousseau of Maria Josepha, the daughter of August the Third, when she married the Dauphin of France.

Other objects worthy of particular notice are two brown carp, to be used as sauce-boats, a turtle as butter-dish, and a pair of lobsters for pepper and salt, all of the natural size and color, really life-like imitations. Also the little Circassian dog of the Empress Catherine of Russia, life size. In fact all small animals and birds, of which the collection contains an immense number, were made during the period when the porcelain was at its best, and are most of them unequalled in execution.

The most tasteful of the vases, of which there are many, are three small ones—the largest eighteen inches in height, the others somewhat smaller—which were made for Napoleon the First, the prevailing color "gros bleu," rather heavily gilded, each having on the front a most exquisitely painted view, the three being, Dresden, Pillnitz and Meissen.

Of the celebrated "figurines" of Old Meissen there are in the Dresden collection some two hundred, almost all of the "rococo" style; among them two very pretty statuettes representing Count Brühl, the favorite minister of August the Third, and his wife, both in gardeners' costumes, also the count's tailor, who, it is said, made him a different suit of clothes for every day in the year, and the tailor's wife. Peter the Great and the Regent of France are to be seen in fancy dresses. Another much admired figure is the "Girl with the Muff," remarkable for the execution of all details. There are also groups representing the four elements, the five senses, the four seasons, and the four divisions of the world; among these last America figures as an Indian, painted and feathered, calmly sitting upon the back of an alligator, with a parrot perched upon his finger.

The best, perhaps, of all the figurines is a set of exceedingly small ones, eighteen in number, known as the concert of monkeya (singer concert), which are caricatures of the artists and musicians of the royal opera troupe of August the Third, done in the rococo style; they are arranged in two rows, the leader at the head, and are all most expressive.

Among the later productions of the factory may be noticed a model of a monument to Gellert, a bust of Böttcher, and a copy in white unglazed porcelain of the famous penitent, Magdalen of Battoni, the original of which is in the Dresden gallery; all of these date from about 1786.

Of the modern productions, such as are now made at Meissen, there are some handsome specimens, vases, mirror frames, table-tops, chandeliers, etc.; most of these have their prices attached, and duplicates may be ordered at the factory. The most expensive piece I saw was a very tall and elaborately-decorated vase, duplicates of which could be procured for five hundred dollars. The most costly article made at Meissen for many years will be a chandelier recently ordered by the King of Bavaria, the price of which is said to be a thousand pounds sterling.

The value of the old Meissen cannot well be estimated, and there is indeed but little of it to be bought anywhere. About the middle of the last century, when it had not yet acquired the additional charm of antiquity, August the Third was collecting from all parts of Europe the contents of the famous Dresden Picture Gallery, and we find in the State archives that in his purchases of paintings of world-wide celebrity the masterpieces of Raphael, Rubens, Titian, Van Dyck, and others, a part of the price often consisted of a piece of porcelain from the celebrated factory at Meissen; indeed, in some cases, it was specially stipulated that this should be the case, and the painting could be obtained on no other terms, so highly was the Meissen china prized, even in comparison with the famed works of the "old masters."

THE CHILDREN.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And the school for the day is dismissed,
And the little ones gather around me,
To hid me "good night" and be kissed:
Oh, the little white arms that encircle
My neck in a tender embrace;
Oh, the smiles that are halos of heaven,
Shedding sunshine and love on my face.

And when they are gone I sit dreaming
Of childhood, too lovely to last;
Of love that my heart will remember,
When it wakes to the pulse of the past.
Ere the world and its wickedness made me
A partner of sorrow and sin,
When the glory of God was about me,
And the glory of gladness within.

Oh, my heart grows weak as a woman's,
And fountains of feeling will flow,
When I think of the paths steep and stony
Where the feet of the dear ones must go,
Of the mountains of sin hanging o'er them,
Of the tempest of fate growing wild;
Oh, there's nothing on earth half so holy
As the innocent heart of a child.

They are idols of hearts and of households,
They are angels of God in disguise;
His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses,
His glory still beams in their eyes;
Oh, those truant from earth and from heaven,
They have made me more manly and mild,
And I know how Jesus could liken
The kingdom of God to a child.

Seek not a life for the dear ones,
All radiant, as others have done,
But the life may have just enough shadow
To temper the glare of the sun;
I would pray God to guard them from evil,
But my prayer would bound back to myself;
Ah, a seraph may pray for a sinner,
But a sinner must pray for himself.

The twig is so easily bended,
I have banished the rule and the rod;
I have taught them the goodness of knowledge,
They have taught me the goodness of God,
My heart is a dungeon of darkness
Where I shut them from breaking a rule;
My frown is sufficient correction,
My love is the law of the school.

I shall leave the old house in the autumn
To traverse its threshold no more,
Ah, how I shall sigh for the dear ones
That meet me each morn at the door;
I shall miss the "good-night" and the kisses,
And the gush of their innocent gle,
The group on the green and the flowers
That are brought every morning to me.

I shall miss them at morn and at even,
Their song in the school and the street,
I shall miss the hum of their voices,
And the tramp of their delicate feet;
When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And death says the school is dismissed,
May the little ones gather around me,
To hid me "good-night" and be kissed.

THE RT. REV. HENRY CHAMPLIN LAY, D.D., LL.D., FIRST BISHOP OF EASTON.*

It needs not the sable drappings of woe or the solemn strains of funeral hymns to testify the great sorrow that has fallen upon us.

While the whole Church laments the loss of a strong and wise leader, and the diocese a revered and efficient bishop, yet to this congregation it means all this and much more; it is the loss of a faithful rector, a devoted pastor, a warm and affectionate personal friend. This cathedral was the Benjamin of his old age, and its interests had the warmest place in his heart. Here gathered around him a band of devoted workers, few in number indeed, but abundant in zeal and labors, all bound together in love and unity, a loving circle of which the bishop was always the centre.

Although the duties of his episcopate called him away for much of his time, yet the same qualities that had made him such a successful parish priest in the earlier years of his ministry, found room for exercise here, and to use the words of St. Paul, "Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and justly and unblameably he behaved among you that believed; as ye know how he exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, that ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you into His kingdom and glory."

I am not here this morning to speak the words of extravagant eulogy, or to deal in strains of fulsome praise, but from out the depths of my own sore bereavement, I would fain pay a humble tribute to the memory of one of the best, noblest, purest, gentlest, greatest-souled men I have ever known; a man who of all among men was the object of my deepest love and reverence. It will ever be a most cherished recollection, that in the last year of his life, I was permitted to be associated with him, to enjoy his confidence and his council, and in some measure I believe, to lighten the burdens that pressed upon him.

Neither is it my purpose to attempt to describe the life or analyze the work of Bishop Lay as a Churchman, as a bishop, or as a scholar, but rather to speak of him as you and you alone have known him: as priest, as pastor, as friend.

Of his work in the General Councils of the Church, and of his influence through his writings, other tongues will speak. From those who for many years sat with him in the House of Bishops, we shall presently hear how courteous his manners, how clear his perceptions, how well-balanced his judgments, how wise his counsels, how industrious and laborious in discharging the important trusts committed to his care.

Of his efficiency as bishop, the increased activities, the organized charities, the parishes revived, the churches consecrated, the rectories built, the increase of communicants; all these attest the wisdom that under God called him to this function. He magnified his office as bishop, but not from any desire of rule. No man was ever more averse, personally, to the exercise of unusual authority, but he believed that the episcopate was of divine right and institution, and that the Church of Christ was an episcopal Church. He believed in the divine authority of the Church, and lamented that the bishop was too often to a parish nothing but a priest who possessed the power to confirm. And he lamented especially that the bishop no longer possessed, as in the Trinity Cathedral, but Bishop Lay loved it. After his engagements abroad, often in the largest churches, he loved to come back to this little place and to join in its simple, hearty, reverent service. "It rests me," he said, and no vaulted nave, no swelling organ, no well-trained choir, ever gave him the pleasure that he found in these simple walls, and in the music that was made here by loving voices. Yes, he loved it, and was content to lay the foundation, trusting that after he had fallen, other hands would build thereon.

You, my friends, have been happy in listening for eight years to one who ranked among the first preachers of the American Church. There was in all of his public utterances an undefinable charm. To a vigorous and logical mind he united a warm, rich poetic sensibility, and there was in both matter and manner a kindness, a sweet-spiritedness which laid hold not so much upon the sympathies as upon the affections. He loved to preach, for he always had a message, and oh, how often was it indeed a message to our souls! a message of comfort when we were in sorrow, a message of encouragement when we were cast down, a message of hope when we were despairing, a message of strength when we were weak, and aye, too, a message of stern rebuke when we were disobedient. His preaching was uniformly instructive, and always gave food for thought. He kept the man behind the messenger, and looked only to the glory of God and the edification of his Church. Alas! that no more from this desk shall that sweet voice carry its message to us. But "The voice to us so silent

Now falls on angels' ears."

and who can tell but what that holy eloquence shall find some fitting use even beyond the skies. If kindred spirits there gravitate together, we may be sure that already he stands side by side with the saintly author of "The Christian Year," whom in gentleness of spirit and poetic beauty of utterance he so much resembled, that Bishop Lay may well be known as "the American Keble."

But I pass to briefly note some of the qualities that made his noble character, and endeared him to us so fondly. And first, among the marked characteristics of Bishop Lay was his profound and intense conscientiousness. It dominated his whole life, and entered into all his work. His standard of rectitude was independent and unswerving. In dealing with moral questions he was absolutely incapable of casuistry. The staunchest uprightness and the most rigid honesty governed every action. No hidden motives or purposes lay beneath those which he assigned or proposed. He was frank, open, transparent. Some, indeed, may say that he lacked policy, for his interpretation of the precepts of our holy Christianity was so literal, the courage of his convictions was so intense, and the frankness of his nature was so constant that he scorned those concealments or evasions which the world glosses over and applauds as policy. He was often misunderstood, because men could not rise to the comprehension of such noble and lofty motives, and because they could not comprehend them, did not believe in their existence. What were considered faults in him were often but unusual virtues, and what were thought to be errors of judgment were but the rigid and unworlily application of the highest principles of Christian morality.

Another marked characteristic, was his absolute unselfishness. Never have I known a man who was so uniformly given to thinking of others rather than of himself. His own ease, his own comfort, his own convenience were always secondary. In responding to the various calls upon him, he too often taxed unduly his powers of endurance, for he was unwilling to have even the appearance of loving his own ease. He hated indolence: as a bishop he set an example to his clergy by being in labors most abundant, and though often besought to be more careful of his strength, yet a Macedonian cry always found him ready to answer. He was resolutely self-helpful, and disliked to call upon others for any service that he could perform himself. And yet no one was ever more ready to offer and render service when opportunity presented. He spared every one but himself. During the lengthening progress of his sickness it was most touching to see how hard he strove to be bright and to avoid giving trouble or distress to those around him. In one of my last visits to his room he said to me, "One of the greatest sorrows of sickness is that it develops in one the tendency to think of self, and makes him the centre of the household and the burden of thought and anxiety." O, thoughtful, unselfish soul! As if any service that our hands could render could give us aught but joy! Nay, nay. Our greatest burden was the sorrow that we could do no more.

Again, Bishop Lay was a man of remarkable self-control. This characteristic likewise dominated his whole nature. He was not an extremist. His moderation was known unto all men. While he held to the truest Catholic principles, he also held to the proportion of faith. In his private life he was equable, self-poised. What he was yesterday, he was to-day. Nothing ever seemed to disturb his meekness or the uniform loveliness of his disposition. He seemed incapable of anger. The misconduct and insults of others could grieve him, for the very depths of his sensitive nature quivered at every rudeness, but his feelings were of sorrow and not of resentment. He loved his friends, that is human; but more, he loved his enemies, and that was divine.

This habit of self-control made him un-demonstrative in manner. While he had little of that effusive warmth which might have been expected from his Southern birth and associations, yet his manner was always the perfection of courtesy. In his home he was most devotedly affectionate, and to his intimate friends he revealed a tenderness of feeling, a warmth of affection, and a sparkling playfulness which revealed the simple, childlike spirit, and endeared him beyond measure to those who thus knew him.

But time will not permit me to speak of all the marked and lofty traits of his noble character. You, my friends, in these years of intimate and affectionate intercourse had learned to know him and to love him as a Father in God, and ye are my witnesses that I have spoken no word too strongly.

But he has gone from us forever. No more will he stand at the sacred desk to unfold to us the hidden riches of the Word of God. No more at that sacred altar will he minister at the holy feast. No more will we hear that tender voice, sweet as a seraph's, chanting out the Triumphal Hymn, but to-day, in the immediate presence of "Angels and Archangels, and with all the company of heaven, he lauds and magnifies the glorious Name: evermore praising and saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, heaven and earth are full of Thy glory: Glory be to Thee, O Lord Most High. Amen." Nay, no more on earth will we see him, but his holy example and his loving counsel remain. We may best testify our affection for him by following in his footsteps.

To-day, as we come to receive the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ, let us remember the communion and fellowship of all the saints of God, and let us pledge ourselves to remember the steadfast faith, and to follow the noble Christian life of our departed bishop and rector.

Farewell! farewell! And who in this hour would forbid the longing of our hearts to find expression in that ancient prayer for the dead,

"Grant him eternal rest, O Lord;
And let perpetual light shine upon him."

O God, who dost temper the wind to the shorn lamb, so temper Thy affliction to this flock that by it they may be led into the way of everlasting peace, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Abigail the Superior Wife.

* Now the name of the man was Nabal, and the name of the woman was Abigail. She was a woman of a beautiful countenance and of good understanding, but the man was churlish and evil in his doings.—I. SAMUEL, xiv, 8.

Biographers pique our curiosity and interest by their slow process of unveiling the character of their hero or heroine, and we learn to love or dislike those characters, just as we learn to love or dislike people with whom we come in contact; by the influence which they acquire over our own life and feelings. Thus two readers of a biography may form distinct opinions of the character portrayed. While the real inner life may still remain to us veiled.

Not so the Almighty Biographer. He at once opens to us the hearts and minds of the men and women to whom He introduces us, and they stand before us as God sees them, naked to the very intents of their hearts, and the thoughtful Bible student at once recognizes the wherefore of the introduction. No two characters or lives are similar, and, in Scripture, every grade of character, every walk of life is presented to us as a study, and we are expected to read a did learn; studying God's purpose and will toward us. And as our own life is touched by some one of the lives in His history, we are commanded to take warning against like sins, or encouraged to follow after like virtues. The story of Abigail is graphically told in I. Samuel xxv. And the character and life of the rich young couple, living some two thousand years ago on their vast estate at "Maon, in the plains on the south of Jeshimon" reads strangely like that of some rich young couple of our own day. It is a story of an unsuitable marriage, a superior woman wedded to an inferior man. We are told that the man, Nabal, was of a fine family, of the house of Caleb, the coadjutor of Joshua, who had bestowed upon him the whole district of Maon. He was, also, a descendant of a Prince of Midian, Hobab, Moses' father-in-law, from whom sprang Hemath, who was the father of Rechar, whose son Jonadab was the founder of "teetotalism." Yet, with all this fine ancestry, Nabal was a churlish, vicious drunkard. Nabal was his name, and "folly, hollowness, vice," made up all his nature.

We often see this same anomaly in what we term "blue-blooded families," some long-hidden vice springing up into renewed life in children's children.

Doubtless we could find the root of Nabal's folly in the Prince of Midian, the country of idolatry, vineyards, and drunkenness.

Let us now turn to the fair picture of Abigail. "She was a woman of a beautiful countenance and of a good understanding."

This brief summary implies a great deal. Abigail had not only beauty of person, but she was also endowed with a cultivated mind, a deeply religious heart, and a rare, good common-sense. Her name tells us that in her girlhood she was the "joy and exultation of her father." When we see a lovely and good woman wedded to a worthless man, we question in astonishment how so fair a creature came into the power of such a monster, and we now ask the question in regard to Abigail.

Dear sisters, hear the world's answer. Nabal belonged to one of the "first families," and had princely blood in his veins, and, besides all this, he was very rich, having much land, many servants, thousands of cattle. In fact, he was a "grand match," and what more reasonable than that the father, who exulted in his beautiful daughter, should be but too eager to settle her so prosperously.

In the East young people are not allowed voice in the matter of matrimony. The whole transaction is arranged by the parents or guardians. So our lovely Abigail was sold to the highest bidder, and thus entered a new life of bitter bondage. For a season, perhaps, she was an admired toy, but surely she found little if any happiness. However, she was equal to the occasion, and her fine traits of character were more fully developed, and we find them displayed to the best advantage. We know not how long time she had been wedded to Nabal, but it is proved to us that she was ever a faithful, God-serving, patient, gentle, and industrious wife, doing her full duty by husband and household. She was a mistress to whom the eyes of her servants turned in loving obedience. Thus, while her husband went on his foolish way, she superintended their people with her "good understanding" wisely.

At the time that we were led to the home of this illy-mated couple Nabal was holding his annual sheep-shearing. These "shearings" formed occasions for great social liberty and merriment, and among the wealthy flock owners the season was closed by a great banquet, which sometimes lasted several days. Such a feast was Nabal's. "He held a feast in his house like a king." The banquet was held at Carmel, the pasture land of Nabal. While the feast was at its height the guests were started by a visit from the messengers of David, the young and famous warrior and outlaw son-in-law of Saul, King of Israel. The messengers, with much deference of manner and speech, asked, in David's name, for food. Nabal's churlish nature asserted itself, and, after reviling them, he drove them from his presence. David had really earned the right to the favor, and at the return of his young men he vowed to exterminate at once the whole house of Nabal. One of Nabal's young men, standing near his master during the interview, hastened to Abigail—here we have a fine picture of the wise mistress and trustful dependent—and, after the "young man" had poured out his story and fears into her listening ears, he cried,

"Now, therefore, know and consider what thou wilt do."

Already Abigail's quick mind had grasped the situation and formed its plans. Directly the household were answering her rapid commands, servants running hither and thither, sheep were slain and prepared for cooking, bread, corn, wine, figs, and grapes were packed on asses, while an escort of servants prepared to accompany their mistress, who herself intended to intercede in the behalf of her husband and people.

The meeting of Abigail and David is a fine study for an artist.

We have all grown familiar with the favorite subjects, Sarah at her tent-door, Rebekah at the well and the meeting of Isaac, Miriam at the Red Sea, Jephthah's daughter meeting her father, Bathsheba as first seen by David, Ruth gleaning, Esther approaching the throne of Ahasuerus, and many others. Even the stern, hard characters of Judith, Jael, and Jezebel are remembered, while beautiful Abigail seems quite, if not altogether, forgotten.

The impromptu address made by her before David is greatly admired by all Biblical scholars, an eminent writer calling it "one of the finest in the literature of any age."

David was completely disarmed of his wrath, and captivated by Abigail's beauty and wisdom, while his religious fervor was aroused—this proving the purity and modesty of her presence.

Dropping his sword, and with clasped hands upraised, he returned thanks to God for His mercy in restraining his hand from seeking vengeance; and, then, turning to Abigail, he gave the only recorded blessing of David to woman; after which he accepted her offering, and returned her in peace to her home, whose savior she was. Abigail went directly to the scene of revelry. The feast was near its close, "And Nabal's heart was merry within him, for he was very drunken."

We can imagine Abigail's shrinking from the sound of rithal mirth, and ere seeking her couch, sending to the throne of grace her psalm of thanksgiving for her deliverance from the perils of the day.

Abigail waited quietly for the morning, and then, not until after "the wine had gone out of Nabal" did she tell him all "these things," all the horrible dangers that they had escaped. The wretched, terror-stricken man fell paralyzed to the ground, "and after ten days he died." Thus, God Himself avenged David, according to the word of Abigail, and releasing her from her bondage, He set her in a high place; for when David heard of Nabal's death "David sent and commended with Abigail to take her to wife. And she went after the messengers of David and became his wife." Thus ends the story of Abigail. As the many stories of our childhood days, in seeming perpetual joy and prosperity, I wonder how many of you, my sisters, have followed the fortunes of Abigail in the history of her royal husband? As a young reader of the Bible, I can remember feeling such disappointment over the brevity of the story, and trying to imagine the sequel of the Bible narrative. Of course, I made her life to be filled with great honor and pleasure, fitting to a beloved wife of a mighty king; but as an older student of the Scriptures, I discovered a very different sequel. In the forty-third verse of the chapter which contains the story of Abigail, we can find a key to her married life. "David also took Ahinoam, of Jezreel, and they were also both of them his wives."

Three times more Abigail's name appears in the history of David, and each time it is preceded by that of the Jezeelite. Abigail, as the wife of Nabal, was supreme mistress of her husband and household, perfectly fitted to the position, a strong, self-reliant woman, finding her happiness in the path of duty; but when "she went after the messengers of David and became his wife," all her strong personality was swallowed up by the stronger one of her warrior husband. Her whole nature, purposes, and habits had to undergo so entire a change that peace or happiness for her must have been an impossibility. Taken from a life of prosperous plenty and orderly living, surrounded by a large household of loving dependents, she entered a new life of hardship and great peril; her husband a bunted outlaw, living in cave or tent, his retainers "men of blood"—what we would call adventurers—ever restless for encounters with their enemies; while David, fickle in his loves, ere their honeymoon is at its full, brings to their tent a Jezeelitish woman, who, becoming the mother of David's first-born, naturally absorbed the greater portion of his affection and attention, until still another new love attracted him. So we see that Abigail but changed her lot of trouble, and what, with the perils of warfare, poverty, captivity, divided affections of her husband, and the uncongenial companionship of idolatrous women, I can but think her new position a very sorry one.

Another picture of what might have been comes up before me. Abigail, at the death of Nabal, as a "widow indeed," dwelling in the midst of her goodly possessions and people, with true wisdom managing her household and business, practising large hospitality, given to good works, serving God in all things, and growing day by day more noble and useful.

The story of Abigail is replete with instruction, and it would take several "Bible Talks" to use the prominent points of her eventful life. For to-day's practical application I have chosen her marriage with Nabal.

In all ages and all grades of society parents have been given to sacrificing their daughters to "eligible matches," silver and gold and social position magnifying themselves before moral worth. Even the maidens themselves are generally but too anxious to immolate their happiness upon some young, aye, aged, Nabal of society. There seems to be something horribly fascinating to some girls in the thought of captivating a dissolute society man. To their unsophisticated minds there is a certain pleasing notoriety in such a union, while they imagine that the promised luxurious life will be a sufficient compensation for any uncomfortable elements which the future might develop. But after the inevitable step is taken their eyes are opened to their real position, and at once their nature assumes its level. And what generally follows? Even mutual recriminations, fierce quarrels, many times blows, and sickly children born, to be brought up in an atmosphere of evil misery, their innocent lives made "to pass through the fire" of a worse than Canaanitish Molech. All this, it may be, is carefully guarded from the knowledge of the world, or else both parties, resorting to the law, fling broadcast a debasing and disgusting story of their private life, filling the air with matter which vitiate every home that it enters. And, just as a certain grade of boy life is influenced and led by such literature as "Buffalo Bill," many foolish girls deliberately make up their minds to undertake the mysterious and dangerous journey after "riches and ease." And just as many foolish—in fact, wicked—mothers eagerly encourage their daughters' fateful purpose.

I remember of once hearing of a mother saying, as a warning to her son's intended mother-in-law, that she would rather see a daughter of hers lying in her coffin than to see her the wife of such a man, yet the son was wed, and the beautiful, tenderly-nurtured girl suffered all, and more than had been foretold. Oh, mothers! so tender, so self-sacrificing in so many ways, why are you so careless, even heartless, in the most tender and important period of your daughter's life? Why are you not warned by your own failures or trials? or prompted by your own happiness and success to a greater watchfulness and sympathy?

There have been sweet girls whose young hearts have gone out to some Nabal, and they have tried to believe that their pure love and influence would win their Nabal from his folly, and in rare cases this belief has been fully answered, but at a woeeful price; even our noble Abigail did not win her Nabal. St. Paul gives a solemn word on this subject: "For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?"

Do you know of a wife who may come under this question? and yet, can you calmly see your child take upon herself the responsibility of an nnholy alliance?

The daughter of Leah "went out to see the daughters of the land," and encountered a Nabal that caused not only her own ruin, but the destruction of a people. Did you ever wonder what share Leah had in the downfall of her only daughter? Try to guess. There are daughters who are ever the exultation of their fathers, but the fathers and mothers are both under certain conditions of living.

King David in his old age discovered the cause of all degeneration in family life.

"Strange children." God's people linking themselves to the world's people. David says, "Rid me, and deliver me from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is the right hand of falsehood; and that our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner-stones polished after the similitude of a palace."

Throughout God's Word, we find, at near distances, warnings against "strange children."

It was the "mixed multitude" which accompanied Israel out of Egypt that caused Israel to long for the things of Egypt; and it is the world, in the Church of Christ, which now causes the Church to covet the things of the world.

I could not close this "Talk," dear sisters, with more pregnant words than the words of our "High Priest," in His prayer for His Church:

"I pray not that Thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldst keep them from the evil."

THE DAKOTA'S CONCEPTION OF GOD.*

In the treatment of my topic, I have taken the Dakota as the representative of the original inhabitants of the New World. Profoundly convinced that though the various tribes differ widely in many points, yet they are strangely one and the same upon the essentials of their beliefs about God, the world, and the life beyond the grave.

An old Mystic has bequeathed to us the saying that "God is an unutterable sigh in the innermost depths of the soul." In the words of Christlieb, "With still greater justice we may well reverse the proposition and say: The soul is a never-ending sigh after God; because she is from Him, she is also for Him, and tends to Him. In her deepest recesses there lives or slumbers, however hidden, an inextinguishable longing after God."

In studying the habits of now Biblical races, and more clearly still in the great ethnic religions of the world, the fact of a never-ending longing after God, "if happy they might feel after God and find Him," plainly shows itself. The method followed in this feeling after God is often dark, tortuous and misleading—at times almost hiding the One groped after. Yet in the history of the world God has never allowed Himself to become wholly obliterated from the hearts of His children. No matter how low in the scale of humanity, how ignorant, how corrupt, how superstitious a certain race may become, this never-ending longing after God—an inextinguishable fire—is the one great characteristic of their souls and hearts which distinguishes them from the brute creation, and forever stamps on their brow the wondrous truth that "God created man in His own image."

In the path of venture, conquest and civilization, men of science have followed with almost equal step, and gleaned what they could of the religious beliefs of races before unvisited.

*This essay, read at the graduation exercises of the Seabury Divinity School, is printed here not only because of its intrinsic interest, but because its writer, Charles S. Cook, of Santee Agency, is a Dakota Indian, a graduate of Trinity College and of "Seabury."

After a few years' sojourn and study among them, they return and tell us that this particular race of the human family is monotheistic or polytheistic; and another, so low in the scale of mankind that it lacks even the faintest conception of God, not possessing so much as a name indicative of any power higher than itself.

The observation as to monotheism or polytheism may be true in the majority of cases. But the other, namely, that even the faintest conception of a Being higher than man is absolutely and positively wanting is, I think, untrue.

A closer and more intimate acquaintance with such a race will often prove that previous inferences and conclusions were wrong.

The red man has been over and over put in the category of the pantheistic, polytheistic, or (the most unkindest cut of all) the absolutely nothingistic.

Poor creature of God! a more misrepresented being never lived on the face of the earth. While one class of over-refined, fastidious, and pessimistic whites cry out, from the depths of their wisdom, that the Indian is of the compound nature of the brute, the demon, and the ruffian—worthy, therefore, only of the doctrine of "desperation and abandonment," as the best solution of the so-called "Indian Problem"—a more humane and cautious Pope from across the Atlantic sings:

"Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutored mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind;
His soul proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk or milky way;
Yet simple nature to his hope has given
Behind the cloud-tops hills a humbler heaven:
Some safer world in depths of woods embaced,
Some happier island in the watery waste,
Where slaves once more their native land behold;
No bonds torment, nor Christians thirst for gold,
To be content his natural desire,
He asks no angel's wing, no seraph's fire;
But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company."

Yes, from the very first landing of the whites upon these Western shores the aborigine has been grossly misunderstood in every possible respect. Much the same [misunderstanding] continues to our own day, and it promises well to go on as it has in the past until the natives, as a race, shall rise and tell their side of every story which their white brothers may be pleased to tell to the world about them.

With the red man's usual fate of being misunderstood and misrepresented, of course he has not been spared the assertion that his conception of the Deity is polytheistic—in short, that he believes in no God whatsoever.

These two assertions are not true at all. An axiom in geometry is a truth so simple, so plain, so primary, that it does not require a demonstration. It is a self-evident truth. That the Dakota is a being possessed of strong religious tendencies is such an axiom. The truth of it is so manifest as to require no demonstration. We can simply repeat the axiom, and say the Dakota is a naturally religious being. His faith in a Supreme Deity is almost unbounded. His belief in things pertaining to God and his own soul is somewhat vague and confused. Yet his recognition of a Power higher than himself (Who is the Creator Governor of the world) is intertwined with his very existence. Such an extraordinary and anomalous being as an atheist is unknown among his brethren.

The stoicism with which novelists and newspaper writers have made the red man so famous would be greatly disconcerted were he to know that there lived a man under the sun who actually denied the existence of God.

A greater shock could not be given him than this revelation. Methinks I see the educated red man of the future writing a treatise on ethnic religions, with such words as these on one of his pages:

"But the strongest, most promising, most wholesome, yet the most divided, strongest of all religious systems is that called Christianity. For in it all shades of belief are allowed. The Christians hold to one Bible, and out of it they make many separate and conflicting societies called Churches. Under the shadow of Christianity there exists and are handed from age to age, Materialism, Pantheism, Deism, Rationalism, and (stranger still!) Atheism—out-and-out disbelief in the Being of God.

"How sad that such a prosperous, intelligent, educated, and highly refined race as the whites should become so estranged from their Father in heaven as to challenge His very existence."

So strong is the red man's belief in God, that his surprise—astonishment—at finding such a being as an atheist, in a nominally Christian country, would seek expression in such language as the above.

The Dakota has no special code of morals, nor any well-defined system of theology—yet, almost from his infancy, the Godward proclivities which are inherent in him begin to show themselves.

As he grows in age, his religious nature becomes more and more developed, apparent and positive. In a way, almost inexplicable, this religious tension lasts unbroken throughout "all the changes and chances" of life until he reaches the grave.

According to him, Wakantauka (the Great Holy) is the creator of the world and "all that therein is," both visible and invisible. Wakantauka is All-Wise, All-Seeing, All-Caring, All-Powerful, All-Just, All-Loving—existing from eternity to eternity. His Deity, therefore (though dimly conceived of), is none else than the God of Scripture, who "inhabith eternity."

The Hindoo has a curious cosmogony which supposes the "globe to rest on an elephant, the elephant on a turtle, and the turtle on nothing at all."

The Dakota, on the contrary, believes the world to be in the palms of God's hands—meaning thereby, that He governs it with such a perfect system of laws, so near and intimate His watchful care over it, so great His love, that He may well be said to hold the universe in this way; just as through intense love and tenderness the gentle mother holds her helpless babe in the palms of her hands and caresses it.

The laws that govern the world he looks upon as emanations from God—indeed, they are parts of His very Being. For this reason, the mysterious forces of nature he reverses, inasmuch as he believes them to be manifestations of God's power, and thus potentially to be the Deity Himself.

It is thus that his "untutored mind sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind."

I once saw a Frenchman, in the midst of a grand and severe thunderstorm, reverently lifting his hat, prayerfully looking up to heaven, or humbly casting his eyes to the ground. This he repented as each thunder-clap was heard, shaking the earth.

On putting to him the query, "Why do you do that?" he answered: "That is God's voice which you hear from the thunder-clouds. When I hear His mighty voice, I tremble and fear because of my sins. I lift my hat to show my reverence for Him."

It is precisely with such confessions as the above that the Dakota sees his Deity in the clouds, and hears Him distinctly in the thunder-clap.

This is the same God that David of old had in his mind when he said:

"It is the Lord that commandeth the waters; it is the glorious God that maketh the thunder. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire; the voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness; yea, the Lord shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh."

Not unlike the Roman, the Dakota sees God in the mighty cataract, the huge tree, the prominent rock, the sun, moon and stars. But he does it for the same reason as the one already given. They are potentially God, inasmuch as they are His handiwork. They show the depths of His wisdom, His power, His greatness, His image, His very Being.

But because he shows honor, and seemingly offers gifts to them, the red man is thought to believe in "Gods many and Lords many."

"Bowling before so many things in nature, why is he not a polytheist?" has been repeatedly asked. The native answers: "I do not worship these things!" They make me think of God. On the spot where I am thus reminded of God, I worship Him through these as media.

There is but one God and no other. These I call simply Wakon (holy, mysterious), because they are the manifestations of God's power and nature. Him alone I call Wakantauka (The Holy One—the Great Holy, the Chief Holy—the superlative Holy God).

Thus he scornfully rejects the charge of polytheism, and strongly asserts his belief in monotheism. His motto, like the Indian of the old world, is "One God and no other." With the red man there are several theories as to the origin of the human family. One is the following:

After the creation of the world, animals, etc., Wakantauka (The Great Holy) created three beings and immersed them, one by one, in a pool of wondrous purity and clearness. The first came out with a fair complexion. The peculiar reddish bottom of the pool is disturbed through the first immersion, and the water is slightly colored. The second creature is immersed and he comes out with a reddish complexion. By this time the second layer of the bottom (dark mud) is stirred up. The last of the three now enters, and emerges with a complexion dark and rough.

In this way the Dakota explains the white, red and black races of the human family. According to him, also, man was not created for this life only. His life is a journey. The grave is simply the bridge that leads into the other world. In this journey of life all is not plain sailing. For there are two ever-conflicting elements on earth which make this journey one of constant struggle and warfare.

These two principles are good and evil.

The habitation of the evil spirit is under the earth.

Not only must man fight the evil, but likewise God's army of the sky must engage in this seemingly endless warfare.

This army is made up of the wonderful thunder birds of the air. They are huge and terrible—strong of wings, mighty in battle. The peculiarity about these thunder birds is that their eyes are seldom open. When they open them, we see the flash from their immense eyes, almost blinding us.

The Dakota calls this "Wakinganton-waupit"—opening the eyes of the thunder birds. His white brother calls it "lightning." The red man looks upon a thunder storm as an actual battle in progress between the armies of the good principle and the evil.

In this warfare the good will ultimately prevail and reign supreme.

I am sure none of you will doubt that the red man strongly believes in a life beyond the grave.

His conception of the future state is simple and of the most comforting nature. For instance, he holds that when a man dies his spirit forthwith goes to the Spirit World.

The Milky Way he calls "Wanagitancu"—that is, the Spirit's pathway. Every soul must follow this on his journey to the Spirit World.

It was a belief with the Romans that the shade of a mortal is denied the joys of the Elysian fields, and miserably wanders through the Stygian darkness for a hundred years, unless due burial rites were bestowed upon the body.

So the red man says if the dead is not buried with his head toward the setting of the sun, he is refused admission to the spirit land, till he personally has redressed, through self-torture and untold misery, the greats in and neglect of his kin upon earth.

As to the location of this blessed spot—the spirits' home—the red man has no definite idea; but his imagination is vivid, his faith strong enough to make that happy abode a glorious reality.

Is not this a conception approaching the "Paradise," the "Abraham's bosom" of the Christian?

Curiously enough, according to the red man's theory, no spirit is immediately blessed with the beatific vision; when that shall be granted rests only with Wakantauka.

Awaiting that day, all must remain in the "home of the spirits"—the red man's intermediate state.

And so, after all, instead of having no idea whatever of God, or at best only a degraded polytheist, the red man, on the contrary, has a strong faith, Wakantauka (the Great Holy); and, ever confidently cries out "there is but one God and no other."

His conception of the Deity, when properly analyzed and understood, is not a shocking one, after all.

As a race, these strange people who came here from some cradle-land of monotheism, are intensely religious. To be sure they serve their Creator in a false way—yet it is because they have forgotten the better way. The truth is they erect their altar "To the Unknown God."

For this reason the Christian minister can easily direct their vague and confused ideas of the Deity into the right belief of the Triune God. Furthermore, he can build upon their inherent religious nature, and say to them as St. Paul did to the Athenians on Mars' Hill:

"Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you."

NEANDER, THE HISTORIAN.

This great Church historian and divine was an illustration of a great soul unhand-somely lodged—a vessel of gold in a casket of clay. His personal appearance was striking in singularity and uncountness. He was of medium size, with a rounded head covered with thick black hair, a nose of Jewish bent, and mild brown eyes over-shadowed by unusually heavy eyebrows. His eyes were rarely seen, as through excessive near-sightedness and incessant contemplation they were well-nigh closed. In his long, dark green overcoat, with high military boots, half-closed eyes turned upwards, a big hat resting on the back part of the head, he was the observed of all observers. He was careless of dress and unconscious of the speech of people. In this respect he reminds one of his colleague, Carl Ritter, the pre-eminent geographer; or the world-renowned Grecist, Boeckh, who, it was said, could describe the head-gear of the ancient Greek at any epoch, but could easily be confounded by being asked concerning the hat of the Berliners of his own day.

Neander was never married. A congenial sister was mistress of his home, and cared for him as for a helpless child. They were familiarly styled the "Neander children." She accompanied him on his enforced daily walk to the Thiergarten, and, hand in hand, attracted the respectful attention of passers-by, and the salutation of the king. This loving, faithful sister survived her brother many years.

The manner of life of Neander was exceedingly simple. His moderation in eating savored of asceticism. He seldom knew whether he had eaten or not, and herein was cared for by his ever-watchful, ever-indulgent sister. Yet he was given to hospitality.

Neander, as he fondly desired, was permitted to toil unto the last. At the close of life's busy, weary day, he exclaimed, "I am weary; I will now go to sleep." Gently placed in bed, he whispered, "Good night, good night," and almost imperceptibly "breathed himself into the silent and cold sleep of death," on July 14, 1856. A vast procession, two miles in length, followed the honored remains to their last resting-place. Students surrounded the hearse with lighted candles; in front of the body the Bible and Greek Testament of the departed were carried. Carriages of the king and of other members of the royal family were in the procession. A chorale by a thousand voices was sung, and a discourse was delivered by the friend of the deceased, the noted Krummacher.

It is a remarkable fact, and by no means a pleasant one, for the inhabitants of southern Sweden, that part of the country is sinking, an inch at a time, under the brackish waves of the encroaching Baltic. Streets in Swedish towns, originally built, no doubt (like other streets) above high-water mark, now lie below the tide with other earlier and still lower streets beneath and beyond them.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

"LITTLE BOY BLUE." OR WHICH WAS THE COWARD?

BY C. M. LYTTOS.

It was an ugly little house, but that was no reason why Tom and Holt Stuart should sniff the air disdainfully, and protest in a rudely loud whisper that they "didn't want to stay to the birthday party," when Mrs. Martin said, "Poor little fellows they aren't used to strangers, I reckon," and tried to lead them into the house.

The y clung obstinately to "mammy," who mightily ashamed of their behavior, exhorted them to "mind thar manners an' not cyar on like po' white trash. Why didn' dey go long an' play wid dat perlite, nice behaved y'ung gen'lmen an' dem putty y'ung ladies!"

"Yes," Robbie Martin said eagerly, turning very red with the effort to fight down the shyness, that was making him stiff and hot, and multiplying his arms and legs until he felt like an enormous centipede, "come and see who's to light the candles." Candles, with the sun so hot and bright that Tom's eyes were watering and Holt's head growing full and heavy!

"What do you want with candles in the daytime?" Tom asked.

Tom was the oldest and the clever one.

It was he who had discouraged Holt from staying to the birthday party.

"Candles in the daytime! Why he's never seen a birthday illumination," the girls cried with a burst of sweet laughter. There were only five of them—Sue, Belle, Letty, Eve, and Tina, but they looked a great many more piled on the steps one above the other, and Holt, who was not played the part of instructor in the mysteries of "Snake." He who had travelled from Arkansas to Texas on his own Indian-pony, and could tell thrilling stories of sleeping in tents, real tents like the soldiers slept in when they camped at "The Spring." He who had swelled and bragged the day before, and sent Robbie Martin home hopelessly despondent, not to know what lighting candles in the daytime meant!

"Hush, Holt," he said dictatorially. "Anybody can light candles," he cried. "Of course when you go to a matinee they make the room dark and pretend it's night and light gas."

Tom felt that his last word was not strong; he lagged over it a little doubtfully. Robbie had said candles.

The girls laughed again, but with a difference. They were puzzled too. A boy who could speak so glibly of a matinee, deserved respectful consideration.

"Oh! that isn't what we mean," they said. "Tell him

used to girls and did not like being laughed at, puckered up his face to cry, and said fretfully.

"Please, take us home, mammy; my head hurts."

But that laugh stung Tom into forgetfulness of the ugly, little house. That he, the clever one, should not understand! He, who only yesterday, had convicted Robbie Martin of ignorance upon the momentous question of velocipedes, and what it is 'Boy Blue.'"

"You see we have a cake," Robbie said, "and as many candles as birthdays, there are thirteen to-day, because Sue's thirteen years old; and we jump rope to see who's to light the candles, and the one that jumps it thirteen times thirteen without stopping lights them. Won't you come and try? And then I'll show you Char and Snow, and you may play with Fan and Tim."

Tom loosened his grasp of mammy's dress, but Holt hung back.

"Won't you come?" "Boy Blue" said persuasively; and just then two beautiful pigeons white and mottled, with gold glints hurling their breasts and wings, flew out from under the eaves of a shed back of the house, and perched on "Boy Blue's" shoulders.

Holt forgot that he wanted to go home. "Oh! mammy, the pretty birds!" he cried in an ecstasy of delight.

"You may hold them while we jump for the candles," "Boy Blue" said. "This is Fan and this is Tim—call them by their names and they'll make friends right away."

They started into the house. "He won't bite, I reckon," he said drawing back as Ross, Tom's Newfoundland, ran against him. And just then Ross snapped at a fly and "Boy Blue" gave a little cry and started back. This restored Tom's self-esteem and put him in a good humor. He laughed loudly.

"'Fraid of dogs are you? Oh! no, he won't bite. Here, Ross, old fellow; and he pulled Ross's ears and got astride of him and felt himself a hero, while poor Robbie had a struggle to keep back the tears. He had never been strong since Tina was burned. Mamma said he would outgrow his nervousness; but Robbie considered it disgraceful that a boy of fourteen should be afraid of dogs and jump at every unexpected noise, and called himself a coward. Mamma said he must struggle against it; so he put his hand on Ross's head and Ross snapped at another fly, and Robbie screamed again and Tom laughed louder than before and said, "Why I believe you're a coward."

They jumped the rope and "Boy Blue" won the honor of lighting the candles, which he immediately handed over to Tom, and Tom, quite in his element, swelled, and bragged, and told wonderful stories of which he was the hero; and after supper, when the fun flagged, Mrs. Martin said:

"'Boy Blue,' take Tom and Holt out and give them a ride on Char and Snow."

"What makes her call you 'Boy Blue'?" Tom asked, on their way to see the ponies.

"I asked her to," Robbie answered, coloring.

"What for?"

"To remind me," Robbie said, slowly.

"To remind' you? How, what, why? Oh, please do tell me!" Tom exclaimed.

"Don't you remember how 'Little Boy Blue' went to sleep and let the cows get into the corn? Well, I did worse than that—I'm awful trifling. One day mamma left me to take care of Tina, and I got tired and didn't watch her and went to sleep, and when I waked up she was all in a blaze. That's how she got those scars on her face, and my hands won't ever be real strong any more. See there? I got 'em putting her out."

He opened his hands, and Tom saw they were shriveled and drawn inside, and that one wouldn't open wide.

"I was awful sorry, but that didn't do any good. It was all my fault. I asked mamma if she couldn't do something to keep me in mind, because I'm always forgetting, and she said she'd call me 'Little Boy Blue.' People wouldn't know what it meant, and I would. Nobody ever asked me before. You won't talk about it!"

"Oh, no," Tom said, patronizingly, thinking that Robbie ought to be as ashamed as he looked, and that he would never have been so good-for-nothing.

"Here they are," exclaimed "Boy Blue," in a tone of fond possession—"all of 'em."

"All of 'em," were the pigeons Holt had played with early in the evening and two mustang ponies. Char was black, with a tail and mane burned rusty by the prairie suns, and Snow was a round white ball of a pony.

They looked up and whinnied when they saw "Boy Blue." Fan went on picking up grain from the trough, and Tim turned his head on one side and stared at them out of his round, bright eyes in such a funny way that both boys laughed.

"They're old friends," "Boy Blue" said. "Fan and Tim were hatched in that corner over the trough. Sometimes when I come in to feed I'll find Fan perched on Char's head and Tim on Snow's—all of 'em dozing."

The boys took their ride, and when they got home agreed that it had been a very jolly birthday party; though Tom was inclined to ridicule the mustangs because they were so small, and, "Boy Blue" because he was afraid of Ross.

"He's a real coward," he said contemptuously. And, then, he forgot his promise and told about Tina and Robbie's hands.

Mr. Stuart looked up from the book he was reading.

"I'd call a boy who saved his sister's life at the risk of his own anything but a coward," he said. "And I wonder Tom, if you would have had the moral courage to say it was all your fault!"

Tom wrinkled up his forehead and kept quiet, thinking what a queer way papa had of talking. That night he dreamed that he was a knight and wore a suit of silver armor, and that Robbie cried because a beetle crawled over his bare foot. While "Boy Blue" wondered wistfully if a fellow who had done the wonderful things Tom had done would ever condescend to make friends with a coward like him.

Three or four weeks after the party, Mr. Stuart rode down to look at a farm about fifteen miles from Pleasant Run. It was the first time he had been on horseback since, disabled from active service by the shell that cost him a leg, he joined his family, who were refugeeing in Texas.

"You aren't fit to go off by yourself," Mrs. Stuart said, anxiously. "Take Tom along."

"And, papa, please mayn't I stop and ask 'Boy Blue,' I mean Robbie Martin, to go with us?"

Tom had learned in the last three weeks that a boy may be afraid of dogs and still be good for something, and that mustang ponies can outrun horses twice their size. It was a gay party that Mrs. Martin watched ride off across the prairie, and they had a merry day. Mr. Stuart finished his business satisfactorily, and then they played camping out for "Boy Blue's" benefit, and ate their lunch gypsy fashion under the stunted trees that bordered the prairie. It was four o'clock when they started home; and Tom and Robbie felt so fresh after resting that they ran races, which was very pleasant for them but rather hard on Tom's pony, who wasn't used to the Texas sun and got into a white foam, while Char never turned a hair, and seemed as ready for another run as if it were October instead of August.

They were half way across the prairie, when suddenly the sunshine got, as Tom said afterward, "all bloody," and hot as fire. Rex and Peaks snorted and pawed the ground, and Char pricked up his ears, neighed a quick, sharp neigh, and stood still, trembling all over.

"It's the prairie!" Robbie screamed. "The prairie's on fire! Run, Tom, run!" and touching Char lightly, started off.

But Rex and Peaks wouldn't stir. They snorted and neighed, plunging violently. Mr. Stuart and Tom whipped and spurred in vain; they would not budge.

Robbie looked back, saw, hesitated, then turned Char's head.

"Ride on, my boy," Mr. Stuart said, hoarsely. "You can't help us."

But "Boy Blue" was already on his feet, unstrapping Char's girth.

"Quick! your saddle-blanket!" he cried. "It's the only chance!"

He struck a match and lighted the grass around them, beating it out as soon as it threatened to spread. Mr. Stuart obeyed him mechanically. Tom clung to his father, sobbing pitifully. The fierce flame scorched their faces—the smoke choked and blinded them. Mr. Stuart said afterwards that he would have given up the fight, but the energy and strength of ten men were in Robbie Martin's little body. When the fire reached them there was nothing but bare, black earth to feed it. "Little Boy Blue" had saved them. Rex and Peaks ran into the flames and perished

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1885.

—The notable event of the past week in the Church was the Centennial Convention of the Diocese of New York. It was remarkable, not because it was a centennial, for this is the day of centennials in this country, but because it exhibited a powerful diocese working vigorously and harmoniously.

The number of delegates in attendance was very large and very persistent. As many as four hundred gathered at the outset, and more than three-quarters continued to the end. There was more, too, than a mere attendance. There was an enthusiastic, as well as conscientious, attention to the business of the convention.

The most touching feature of the convention was the veneration and love shown for the bishop of the diocese. In reply to the bishop's resignation of his salary, the convention voted heartily and determinedly that he should continue in the use of his house and of his salary for the remainder of his life. It is said that the bishop has shown an equally courteous persistence, since the convention, in causing to be prepared, and in signing, papers legally depriving himself of any further emolument from the diocese. The latter seems to be powerless in the matter, and cannot prevent the bishop having his own way.

The debate touching the proposed revision of the Prayer Book was both dignified and able, as might be expected from such a body of men.

It is a gratifying fact, in connection with the revised book, that the Rev. Dr. Huntington, although a new-comer to the diocese, received not only a courteous but hearty election to the next General Convention. It was not only a graceful tribute to him, but it was also the discharge of a duty which the diocese owes to the Church that the proposed Prayer Book shall come before the next General Convention with the advantage of his careful liturgical study in its advocacy.

The presence of the Bishops of Western New York, Long Island and Albany was a special feature of this convention.

The heartiness with which they were received, and the important part they took in the proceedings, made it appear that much advantage would come from the realization of the Province of New York, which, up to this time, has been only theoretical.

There are great possibilities in the Diocese of New York, and these possibilities are probabilities, and what is better still, the near future is to show great realities. Never could a diocese have a greater confidence and reliance and affection than New York has for its present leader.

— Chinese Missions almost seem to have been transferred from China to this country. The Chinese residents in New York, as in other cities, are apparently very earnest in laying hold of the instruction, religious and secular, which is afforded them by the Church, and we believe, by all religious bodies.

The rector of the most fashionable church in New York, on Sunday last, made an appeal to his congregation for assistance in the instruction of nineteen Chinamen who have placed themselves under his care.

As it is the purpose of all the Chinese to return, dead or alive, to their own country, those who go back alive must necessarily bear with them the impressions that are wrought upon them in the midst of the Christianity of this land.

It is true that some communities are doing their best to send the Chinese back in their coffins. It is to be hoped, however, that the culture of the cities and the Christian fellowship of parishes may still have a large influence for good in the Chinese Empire, by means of those Chinese who escape the murderous attacks of Western laborers.

— The opposition of the French Canadian population of Montreal to vaccination broke out last week in rioting and much disorder. The attempt of the health officers to deal intelligently with the epidemic excited the ignorant and misguided masses who most needed such help, to a fury of antagonism; and large numbers of men paraded the streets crying out, "Vive la France!" "Vive la Commune!" "Bravo Riel!" "Down with the English and vaccination!" Public buildings were stoned, policemen and other officers were roughly handled, the placards on the houses infected with small-pox were torn down, and threats of further violence were freely made. At one time the situation became so grave that it was necessary to call out the military in large force, and General Sir Frederick Middleton was summoned from Ottawa for conference. Meantime the ravages of small-pox continue to decimate the French population. Business of all kinds is most seriously affected. With the sufferings of the sick are coupled the want of the classes dependent upon the movements of commerce and trade, and the terror and privation of multitudes who as yet are only indirectly affected. Certainly a worse condition of affairs could hardly be conceived of, and we in the United States can with difficulty understand the peculiar circumstances which have rendered such a state of things possible.

— It is significant of much, that the Protestant population of Montreal are almost entirely exempt from the plague. The following statement of the deaths from small-pox up to September 18, has been given: French Roman Catholics, 641; or 8.32 per 1,000; other Roman Catholics, 52; or 2.00 per 1,000; Protestants, 35; or .95 per 1,000. This means that the Roman Catholic Church is largely responsible for the lamentable ignorance and superstition which have made its portion of the population peculiarly obnoxious to the scourge, and have moved them to oppose the sanitary precautions which more intelligent populations have effectively employed. The education and domestic economy of the French people in Canada are altogether under the influence of the priests, and control in matters of this kind for generations has made the Roman Church absolutely responsible for the intelligence and civilization of that people. How far the clergy may have immediately encouraged resistance to vaccination it is difficult to say. It cannot, however, be denied that if they had favored it all along it would have been submitted to, and an epidemic of small-pox would have been impossible. Some of the clergy have taken an active part in defying the authorities and in lending the sanction of religion to performances that must widely spread the disorder. On a recent Sunday it is said that a religious procession headed by a priest with a crucifix marched through the worst small-pox districts of the city—chanting prayers for deliverance from the scourge. The priest was followed by three hundred school boys, then by three hundred little girls, then by six hundred young men, then by two thousand working men, then by mothers leading their children, and then by a promiscuous crowd of more than ten thousand persons. They passed by and halted in front of many houses where recent deaths from small-pox had occurred, and many more where the disease was raging; and from those houses persons sick and well came out to greet the procession. It is easy to understand, in the light of such exploits as these, why the pestilence rages so widely.

— Beyond doubt there is a deeper question underlying the disturbances at Montreal. The opposition of the French Roman Catholics to compulsory vaccination is but a phase of the intense and persistent antagonism that has all along existed in Canada between the French and English races. It was hoped by Canadian and English statesmen that the Confederation of 1867 would help to reconcile the two peoples. The attempt has signally failed. The dominion vice-regal authority has simply been a flag for French hostility to fire at, and the Dominion Parliament but an arena for the public array of ethnical diversity. The Province of Quebec has fallen more and more under the dominion of French ideas in politics. Ontario on the other hand has been stiffened into more obstinate insistence upon English traditions. As was inevitable, religious differences have been brought forward and have become potent factors in the ethnical strife. The summary suppression of the recent rebellion of the half-breeds in the Northwest by the English soldiery, followed by the speedy trial and condemnation of the leader Riel to death, have fanned the flame until there is danger of a war of races in Canada. To the above causes of uneasiness is to be added the declared purpose of the English Liberals to form an elaborate scheme for the imperial federation of English colonies—a scheme so unwelcome to the Canadian French population at least, that the question of Canadian independence is being hotly discussed in the Province of Quebec.

— Meantime we of the United States are not exempt from the embarrassment of more than one race antagonism, though ours are not, as in Canada, between members of the great Aryan family, but between peoples more utterly unlike than Kelt and Saxon. One of these race antagonisms was recently exemplified in the massacre of Chinese laborers in the Northwest, and in the agitation which continues to aim at driving their compatriots from the country. It is true that the immediate occasion of this hostility against the Chinese is economic. American workmen, both of native and of foreign birth, are not willing to endure the competition of Chinese cheap labor, and the un-American power of trades-unionism is freely invoked to put it down. Underneath the economic question, however, is the ethnical one. It is because the Chinaman is a Turanian and a heathen that he is not believed to be a fair competitor with Aryan labor. His ideals are different. His purposes and ambitions are such that he can live and thrive where an Aryan will starve.

— It is easy, of course, to say that hostility to the Chinese is altogether indefensible in this land of freedom and equality. The doctrinaires have it all their own way, apparently, when they contend for equal protection for all. No doubt the government is under a solemn treaty obligation to protect all such Chinese as were domiciled in this country prior to the late treaty, when the cessation of Chinese immigration was decided upon. Beyond all question, the high-handed efforts of the Knights of Labor and other like bodies to take the law into their own hands ought to be repressed by strong and vigorous measures. Nevertheless, the question of antagonism between the Chinese and the whites is not one that is going to be settled by legislative enactment or by armed battalions. There are differences between races of men which have been enacted by the Supreme Lawgiver, and intensified by centuries of diverse religious, social, political influences, which cannot be obliterated or reconciled by act of Congress; and it is time that our statesmen should acquaint themselves with the great philosophical, religious, and ethnical problems which lie at the bottom of all such outbreaks as that which lately disgraced civilization at Rock Springs, in Wyoming Territory.

— Among the topics to be discussed at the approaching Church Congress at New Haven is "The Ethics of the Tariff Question." It is a timely topic, and will receive, no doubt, the serious consideration it deserves. Meantime, another topic of a like kind is beginning to demand the attention of our political and ethical philosophers, small and great, and that is the Ethics of the Silver Question. The coining of silver dollars in practically unlimited quantities by the government, and the attempt to maintain a bi-metallic standard of values, have led to some consequences not originally contemplated. One of these has been the complete elimination of gold from the currency of the country, and the establishment of the silver dollar as the sole measure of the value of property. This result is due to the increasing difference between the actual value of the gold and the silver dollar—a difference that depends on laws of trade which legislators have not enacted and cannot annul. Under the operation of these laws the value of the silver dollar has now become only about four-fifths of the gold dollar, and so, without intending it, all the business values of the country have been driven down to a lower basis. There is, therefore, an ethical as well as an economical question involved in considering whether the loss which has thus been inflicted on all values has been justified by the exigencies of the national finance, whether the discrimination which has been made against the creditor class has been balanced by the advantage reaped by the debtor class, and, finally, whether any attempt to fix the relation between two such variable values as gold and silver falls within the legitimate province of government, or can be defended on the grounds of either expediency or necessity. By all means let Church congresses and other deliberative bodies consider such questions more and more.

— Mr. Chamberlain, the English Radical, has been making a remarkable speech at Glasgow, from which it is evident that a motus vivendi has been arrived at by the leaders of the various divisions of the Liberal or progressive party. The speech is distinguished by greater moderation than has characterized many of his recent utterances, and is to be regarded as an authoritative setting forth of the working plans of that large body of which he is the representative. Since Mr. Chamberlain is a Dissenter and an avowed Liberalist, it is quite significant that he should declare, as he does, that Disestablishment, in England at least, is not yet within the range of "practical politics." Even in Scotland, where the masses of the people are much more in sympathy with Liberalist ideas, he pleads for a postponement of the question until Disestablishment shall be distinctly demanded by the people.

That so candid and radical an opposer of the English Church should take such ground at a time when the franchise has just been extended to large numbers of those classes in which dissent has had its chief strength, is a welcome evidence of the hold that the Establishment has upon the confidence and affection of the entire people.

Nevertheless, it is one of the signs of the times that many of the leaders of the masses in England are either Non-conformists like Mr. Bright and Mr. Chamberlain, or unbelievers like Mr. John Morley and Mr. Bradlaugh. Such men are sure to make their power effective in the near future against the continued establishment of religion; and with the aid of a secular and non-religious press, it is to be expected that they will succeed at no distant day in securing the overthrow of the English Establishment. There are many reasons why American Churchmen would deplore this; but there are, perhaps, even stronger reasons why we may contemplate such result without any misgiving as to the perpetuity of our Mother Church and her growing influence upon the destinies of Anglo-Saxon Christianity.

— The utterances of Mr. Chamberlain on the subject of local government are full of interest of another kind. In a recent number of the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Matthew Arnold discussed, in his lucid and engaging way, what he considers most excellent, about American "institutions." Among the features of our civil "machinery," as he prefers to call our institutions, which he considers most admirable, are the relegation to the general government of national powers only, and the reservation of all other powers by the several States; in other words, the practical recognition and maintenance of a distinction between general and local government. He then proceeds to advocate the adoption of a similar arrangement in England, the institution of a thorough municipal system, and the constitution of local assemblies having important legislative powers, in such divisions as Ireland, the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland, North and South Wales and certain homogeneous groups of the English counties.

In his Glasgow speech Mr. Chamberlain follows the lead that is thus indicated, though he does not so plainly avow himself a student of our affairs. Certainly it is interesting to observe that the statesmanship of the mother country is beginning to follow along the track marked out by the daughter; but it is not strange that it should be so. American institutions are but the development of English ideas under conditions the most favorable and free. Among the traditions which we have inherited with our Saxon blood and English speech is the instinct of local self-government. The circumstances of English history have overborne it in the British Isles, but it survives even there, as these utterances of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Matthew Arnold abundantly testify; and they are right in turning to American institutions as the model of what England, under fairer conditions, might have been and still may be. It is remembered that when Mr. E. A. Freeman visited the United States, he expressed a wish to attend a New England town meeting as the purest survival of the traditional local self-government of the Anglo-Saxons of which he had any knowledge.

— It is reported through the daily press that General Miles, Commander of the Military Department of the Missouri, in his report to the Adjutant-General of the Army, recommends the opening of the Indian Territory to settlement by white people, after reserving to the Indians enough to give each a farm. Whether this would be practicable without violating treaty obligations there is not space here to consider.

The important thing to consider is that one of so much experience in Indian affairs as General Miles should believe that the Indian can be safely and wisely called to citizenship, and so be made responsible and independent. Hitherto this has not been considered practicable by those best acquainted with Indian character. And yet it is to this that a really effective administration of Indian affairs ought to conduct us, unless we are prepared to believe that the Indian race must inevitably and speedily perish. For it is quite impossible that the tribal condition of the Indian should long survive in the midst of our civilization. The only enduring relation that can be maintained toward our government in the midst of the busy contentions of civilized life, is that of responsible citizenship; and unless we can conduct the Indian to this, the most we can hope to do will be to give him such a euthanasia as military tutelage and religious guardianship may be able to provide while he is perishing as a race from the face of the earth.

—The Bishop of Long Island, as a preparation for the celebration at Philadelphia, next month, of the semi-centennial of the Domestic Missionary Organization in the Church, is writing a careful and exhaustive history of its work. The publication of this history will be begun in THE CHURCHMAN of October 17, and will be continued during the next four weeks.

THE CHURCH IN CANADA.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.

Archdeacon Farrar is being accorded a reception little short of an ovation in Canada. He has received marks of respect and attention from the representatives of every religious body in the country, including the Roman Catholics. Last Sunday he preached in Montreal, in St. George's church and Christ church cathedral, to immense and overflowing congregations. The sermons are described by the secular press as magnificent, and created a profound impression. He has already delivered several very successful lectures. Besides participating in the American Church Congress, he will also take part in our third congress, to be held next month in Montreal.

Major-General Strange, commanding the Alberta field force during the late Northwest rebellion, has written a letter to Bishop McLean of Saskatchewan, very warmly commending the action of Canon McKay of that diocese for his assistance to the troops, often rendered at the expense of great personal danger to himself. On one occasion he penetrated alone into a camp of hostile Cree Indians for the purpose of endeavoring to effect the liberation of certain white female captives. During an engagement, and under a heavy fire, he carried a flag of truce to the enemy. Canon McKay is himself a Cree Indian, and was, I believe, educated in Bishop McLean's Divinity College, in Prince Albert. It is pleasing to note that the energetic bishop seems to have got things running again in the diocese, and that during a late tour he confirmed over two hundred Indians, and performed a number of episcopal acts.

The execution of Louis Riel, the late leader of the rebellion, which was to have taken place last week (18th.), has been postponed for a month, pending an appeal of his council to the privy council of England, touching a technicality as to the jurisdiction of the court before which he was tried. The Cabinet, it is said, are resolved upon the law taking its course, an eventuality that no doubt would be agreeable to the majority of Canadians. However, Riel has a large number of sympathizers among the French of Quebec, who are making very determined demonstrations on his behalf, which of course tends to embarrass the government not a little. An impression seems to be gaining ground that an appeal will be made to the Queen to exercise her clemency by a commutation which would probably be successful and would relieve the government from the present awkward dilemma. Riel, who shows unmistakable signs of mental aberration, seems a mental and moral counterpart of Guiteau. Since his trial and conviction he has become reconciled to the Roman Church which, during the rebellion, he openly defied.

On the 9th of September was opened by the Bishop of Toronto the new hospital in connection with the work of the Sisters of St. John the Divine in that city. The house will accommodate about fifteen patients. The opening ceremony comprised the reading of the 1st., cxvii., and cxlvii. Psalms, the offering up of some collects, and the singing of a hymn, after which the bishop declared the hospital duly opened in the name of the Holy Trinity.

The hospital will be entirely dependent upon voluntary contributions.

There are at present no less than fifteen vacancies in the Diocese of Huron, with the prospect of still more before long. This seems to be an unprecedented state of affairs not only in Huron but in any Canadian diocese. A general rearrangement of missions has been recently effected, which will come into operation very shortly, and which may help matters somewhat, but prospects are at present somewhat gloomy. Many prominent clergymen and laymen favor the summoning of a special synod to take steps for the amicable settlement of the old standing lawsuit of Wright vs. Synod of Huron, of which I have spoken in previous letters. Meanwhile money is being collected throughout the diocese for the purpose of promoting an appeal to the Privy Council of England.

The projected division of the unwieldy Diocese of Ontario seems to be making satisfactory headway, and the committee appointed to take steps in the matter recently met at Kingston. Appeals to the communicants in the diocese have been issued, and application will also be made to the great missionary societies in England.

Bishop Lewis, who has lately undergone a somewhat critical operation for abscess in the side, has, I am glad to say, entirely recovered his strength, and is actively engaged in the prosecution of his duties.

The Rev. William Haslam, the well-known English missionary, and author of the work "From Death unto Life," is shortly expected in Canada, where he will remain during the winter. He comes to devote himself gratuitously to mission work.

Next month, in the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will be consummated a great national undertaking, second only in importance to the confederation of the provinces. Sir Charles Tupper, our High Commissioner in England, will drive the last spike. It is to be hoped that ecclesiastical as well as political unity may result from the completion of the great national highway, and that by its influence organic unity between the three branches of the Anglican Church in Canada may be effected. It may be news to some Americans to know that Winnipeg is nearly the geographical centre of the Dominion.

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE ON CHURCH SELF-SUPPORT.—At the annual meeting of the Carlisle Diocesan Church Extension Society, which was held recently at Windermer, the bishop, speaking from the chair, pointed out that during the three-and-twenty years of the society's existence it had expended £32,000 of its own funds upon the buildings and improvements of churches and parsonages, and the augmentation of small benefices, and in addition had expended upon the same objects £288,000 received from private and public sources, of which about a quarter of a million had come from private sources. There was an idea in some persons' minds that everything was done for the Church by some benign fairy outside; but, while he expressed profound gratitude to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and Queen Anne's Bounty for their grants, yet if anybody wanted to see what kind of life there was in the Church of England and what she was doing for herself, he pointed to such figures as these, and if the time should ever come when the Legislature should pass an act for the separation of Church and State—which might, God forbid—he trusted those figures would be borne in mind. To take away what they had been doing for themselves during the last three-and-twenty years would be nothing short of absolute and rank robbery.

IRELAND.

MONUMENT TO BISHOP BERKELEY AT CLOYNE.—It is a little more than a century and a half, says the Irish correspondent of the John Bull, since Bishop Berkeley was appointed to the See of Cloyne, and at last a monument is to be erected to his memory. It will be set up in the course of the present month in the cathedral in which he often officiated, and if the recognition is tardy, at least the homage comes from a wide area. Much of the money is subscribed from America and some of it from England.

FRANCE.

THE POPE'S DIRECTIONS TO THE BISHOPS.—The pope has directed the French bishops not to attack the Republican form of government, and to adopt no political banner during the elections. It is enough for them to defend the interests of the Church, and discharge their pastoral duties.

DENMARK.

AN ENGLISH CHURCH IN COPENHAGEN.—On Sunday, September 19, the Prince of Wales laid the foundation stone of the English Church at Copenhagen, of which the Rev. C. A. Moore is chaplain. The Prince and Princess of Wales have taken a great interest in the promotion of the building scheme and have aided it largely. Hitherto the congregation has had to hire a room belonging to the Moravians, but it was thought that the Church of England should be more worthily represented. For years the cost of a suitable site has been a difficulty, but now that has been overcome.

SCANDINAVIA.

DR. HALE'S VISIT.—The Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale, Secretary of the Joint Commission of the General Convention on Ecclesiastical Relations, has paid a visit to Norway and Sweden, carrying with him, besides his own credentials, letters from Lambeth and from the Anglo-Continental Society. One of his chief objects was to induce the making of more adequate provision for the religious needs of emigrants to the United States.

INDIA.

ANGLICAN AND ROMAN MISSIONS IN INDIA.—In referring to attacks made on Anglican Missions in India by the Romanist Indo-European, the Indian Churchman observes: "In Madras our angry brethren, by their own account, do a great deal of preaching instead of real mission work. Here, in Bengal, they have no really organized mission, but live on the reputation of the past, while their efforts are almost entirely confined to trying to draw away from other Christian bodies the converts they have made. Among the ranks of their clergy they have no natives of the country, unless they be 'East Indians' or Portuguese. We have never met with a Roman priest of pure Indian blood. Go through the Roman Catholic Directory of all their clergy and brothers, and you cannot find four names among the whole which indicate natives. How different is the case with the Anglican Church! She has a real hold on the country itself, and shows that hold by the very large body of really Indian clergy which she possesses—men, some of them, of remarkable ability, able to hold their own with their European brethren, and giving the best promise for the future of the Church in India."

SOUTH AFRICA.

DEATH OF THE DEAN OF GRAHAMSTOWN.—The death of the Rev. Dr. Williams, Dean of Grahamstown, is reported. Dr. Williams was an earnest supporter of Bishop Colenso, and an equally earnest opponent of Bishop Gray, Bishop Webb, and the Church of South Africa. He figured before the colonial courts in this opposition, more than once, and before the civil courts in England. He was successful in keeping the Bishop of Grahamstown out of his own cathedral. Personally Dean Williams was very popular, and the funeral was attended by thousands of people. The Bishop of Grahamstown was reported to have forbidden one of his clergy to officiate at the funeral, and great excitement was caused by the fact. It was explained however that Bishop Webb had only refused to sanction a clergyman of the Church of South Africa entering the cathedral from which the bishop was barred.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

DIOCESAN CONVENTION.—The eighty-fifth annual convention met in St. Paul's church, Concord, on Wednesday, September 30. There was a preliminary service on the preceding evening, at which the sermon was preached by the Rev. H. E. Hovey. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. W. L. Himes and H. C. Remick, after which the convention was called to order, and organized by the reelection of Mr. H. A. Brown as secretary. The regular committees were appointed by the bishop, and the Standing Committee presented its report. The notification of the proposed changes in the Prayer Book was read, and referred to a special committee.

The treasurer of the Fund for Aged and Infirm Clergy reported that the fund now amounts to a little over $1,100.

At 11 a.m. the bishop celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. E. A. Renouf and the Rev. Dr. H. A. Coit. In place of the sermon, the bishop read his annual address.

In the afternoon the convention reassembled. Reports were presented from the Diocesan Board of Missions, the treasurer, the Holderness School, the treasurer of the Fund for the Support of the Episcopate, St. Mary's School, and the Committee on Divorces. This last committee was increased to six members, and continued.

The following Standing Committee was elected: The Rev. Dr. H. A. Coit, the Rev. Messrs. D. C. Roberts and E. A. Renouf, and Messrs. H. A. Brown, W. L. Foster, and John Hatch. The Rev. Messrs. I. W. Beard, H. E. Hovey, and G. B. Morgan, and Messrs. F. L. Abbott, John Hatch, and Thompson, were elected as the Board of Missions. Mr. George Olcott was reelected treasurer.

A change in the order of services was determined on, so that the session of the convention hereafter will begin with the celebration of the Holy Communion.

After the usual resolutions, the convention adjourned.

MASSACHUSETTS.

LYSN.—Chapel of the Incarnation.—The corner-stone of this chapel (the Rev. J. L. Egbert, rector), was laid on Friday, Sept. 25, by the bishop of the diocese, assisted by the rector, the Rev. Dr. G. W. Porter, the Rev. Messrs. George Walker, Edward Benedict, T. L. Fisher and others. The chapel is to be of the stone quarried in the neighborhood, (a beautiful red porphyry) laid in red cement, with sand stone trimmings. The dimensions are to be thirty feet by fifty-eight, with a height of twenty-four feet from floor to ceiling.

The new parish has a Sunday school of twelve teachers and eighty scholars, and the congregation numbers one hundred and twenty-five adults.

The bishop in his address congratulated the people upon the peace and harmony in which the new enterprise started.

ALBANY.

PALENTVILLE—Gloria Dei Church.—This church, (the Rev. W. C. Grubbe, rector), the corner stone of which was laid in July, 1879, and which has been used for several years in its unfinished condition, was consecrated on Sunday, September 20, the Sixteenth Sunday after Trinity, by the bishop of the diocese.

A large congregation, composed of residents, summer visitors, and friends from neighboring parishes, filled the church to its utmost capacity. The opening Psalm xxiv, was chanted antiphonally by the bishop, clergy and choir. The instrument of donation was read by the warden, Dr. C. H. Chubb, and the sentence of consecration by the rector. After Morning Prayer, the bishop proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, preaching from Genesis xviii, 18, 19.

The indications of real growth in the knowledge of Church principles, and an increasing appreciation of her services among the residents of this neighborhood, are very encouraging.

NEW YORK.

DIOCESAN CONVENTION.—The opening service of the centennial of the diocese of New York was held in Trinity church (the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, rector) on Wednesday, September 30. Admission to the main door was by ticket, and for those passing through this entrance seats were reserved on either side of the central aisle. At 9 o'clock Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Geo. W. Douglas, D.D., assisted by the Rev. Henry Bedinger, and the Rev. J. W. Hill. At 10 a.m. the procession entered the church from the robing room in the order of the choir, the rector of Trinity, certain of his assistants, the Rev. Drs. Hobart, Seabury and Lobdell, and the clerical representatives of the four other dioceses in the State of New York, followed by the assistant-bishop of the diocese, the bishops of Western New York, Albany, Long Island, New Jersey, Central Pennsylvania and Tennessee.

The Communion Office was begun by the assistant-bishop, the Bishop of Long Island reading the Epistle, and the Bishop of Western New York reading the Gospel. The sermon was by the Rev. Dr. William J. Seabury, a descendant of the first bishop of Connecticut. Taking his text from Psalm xlviii, 12, 13, the preacher reviewed the work of the diocese in a historical address, dwelling especially upon the wisdom of those who a century ago gave us unimpaired the faith and order of the Church, and admitted the laity to representation. He gave some account of the good work done by the successive bishops of the diocese, and especially by Bishop Hobart, in boldly affirming and maintaining the true principles of the Church. Bishop Onderdonk, he said, was the first to give an impulse to liturgical worship, and, also, to emphasize the idea that men should be allowed the widest diversity of opinion consistent with the law of the Church. Dr. Seabury spoke in affectionate terms of what had been done by the present venerable bishop of the diocese, and said that though absent, all cherished towards him the kindest of remembrances.

In the next place, he spoke of the need of handing down the principles of the Church in their integrity as they had been received from the past, and dwelt especially upon the excellent work that had been done by Trinity parish in aiding churches and institutions of learning. As examples of the latter, he instanced the General Theological Seminary and Columbia College. Albany and Long Island, he said, had their cathedrals, and a cathedral was the great want of the diocese of New York. This want he believed, would in due time be provided for. He congratulated the diocese and its branches upon their growth and high standing, upon the number and character of their benevolent institutions, and hoped that the divine mercy would in future enable the diocese to make still greater progress in all that concerns the glory of God and the welfare of man.

The sermon being ended, the assistant-bishop continued with the Office of the Holy Communion, the Bishop of New Jersey reading the longer exhortation, the Bishops of Long Island, Albany, and Western New York, Tennessee, New Jersey, and the Rev. Dr. Dix, assisting in the distribution.

Immediately at the close of the service, the Convention was organized, the assistant-bishop presiding, and the secretary, the Rev. Dr. Lobdell, calling the names of the clerical and lay delegates. The Standing Committees and inspectors of elections were appointed, and the bishops and the clerical and lay representatives of the four dioceses that had been formed within the original limits of the Diocese of New York were welcomed, and on motion of the Rev. Dr. Eigenbrodt, they were invited to seats in the Convention whenever it should be their pleasure to attend. This being done, the session took a recess until evening.

In the evening a service was held in St. Thomas's church, (the Rev. Dr. W. F. Morgan, rector) commemorative of the centennial of the diocese, a large congregation attending. After a brief service, an historical sketch was then read by the Rev. Dr. B. F. De Costa.

At the close of Dr. De Costa's address the assistant-bishop introduced the Bishop of Western New York as the successor to the great Dr. Lancelotti, and one who was schooled at the feet of Bishop Hobart.

There was no time, the bishop said, to give a historical survey, or to show what wonderful things God had done in connection with this diocese and the other dioceses of New York. And yet how much more might have been done if all, both clergy and laity, professing the faith of Christ, had done their duty. Oh, for the spirit of the apostolic age! Were we to pause to recount the history of our unworthiness, we should have little cause for congratulation, and should be ready to exclaim, "Not unto us, but unto Thy name be all the glory!" On the other side, we may speak with joy and gratitude, in view of what has been accomplished.

In regard to having been born in New York, as said by the assistant-bishop, Bishop Cox said he was born in New Jersey, but came to New York in early childhood. For some years he was connected with St. Thomas's church.

Speaking of Bishop Hobart, Bishop Cox dwelt lovingly on his memory, telling how he revered him when a child, and how much he had learned from his teachings. The great bishop reaped the latest fruits of his labors in the Diocese of Western New York. He was the forerunner of the Oxford Movement, stripped of what is to be regretted in it, and he was the master of Bishop Whittingham.

The Bishop of Long Island said we might do well to drop out of sight dry, external facts, and speak of that associated work which was common to all. Loyalty to the truth, devotion to the souls for which Christ died—this had been instrumental of our centennial growth. We were able to show that in becoming more catholic, we were none the less evangelic. In including all that is best in the nineteenth century, we should none the less follow the old paths.

The men whom God raised up in the former century had sounded the battle-cry, and had worked out the Church of our own day. Such men as Seabury, and Hobart, and De Lancy had built up the Church on deep foundations, and kept it in the way of moderation and truth.

The things to be done, were to make provision for better schools for the training of our young, to have a better Church literature, while we wanted better plans and methods of Church extension. Between the five great dioceses of New York there should be more sympathy. Diocesan individualism was to be complained of, and our special want was a more vital bond, by which to bring the dioceses and clergy all together.

The Bishop of Albany gave some account of his diocese and of the men it had given to other dioceses. The venerable Bishop of New York was for years rector of the old mother parish in Albany, while the diocese had given two bishops to the Church. Catholic theology, as Bishop Hobart taught it, had given tone and standard to Church teaching.

The convention assembled on Thursday morning, in St. Augustine's chapel. Prayer was said at 9 A. M., by the Rev. Olin Hallock and the Rev. T. R. Harris. At 10 o'clock, the bishop took the chair, when the proceedings of the previous day were read and accepted. He then read his annual address in part, as follows:

"Brethren of the Clergy and Laity: Grace, mercy and peace be multiplied among you from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ!

"We are assembled to-day after one hundred years of organized life as a diocese. In view of the admirable arrangements made and consummated by your own committee for the commemoration of this anniversary, I may not and need not attempt that review of our diocesan history which has already been presented to you by hands more competent far than mine, and under circumstances which, I am sure, we shall all gratefully remember. But as we gather here this morning, the successors of those who laid for us such broad and strong foundations, and that not so long ago, we may at least remember that we look in vain to find one single successor of those first and memorable days, and that as we ask, 'Our fathers, where are they?' a silence eloquent and expressive reminds us that one and all, they have passed to their reward.

"Nor only they. It is the inevitable shadow in the joyousness of such a reunion as this that there are other and more recent departures, and it is, I apprehend, the distinguishing characteristic of this convention that they have been so many and so conspicuous. We may well begin this annual record by making mention of those who a year ago were present with us, and who since we adjourned, have been called to their rest. The list is as follows: The Rev. George C. Athole, rector of the Church of the Holy Innocents, in this city, a man who, though young in years, had already done a remarkable work; the Rev. George James Geer, D. D., rector of St. Timothy's church, who did a work whose courage, patience and completeness must have been the admiration of all who knew him; the Rev. George B. Reese, rector of Zion church, Dubbs Ferry, who wrought so successfully in view of what he was, by the simple force of a winning and stainless character; the Rev. John W. Moore, rector of Christ church, Red Hook, who, though he lived a retired life, had done faithful service; the Rev. Augustus C. Hoehing, a minister of the Church of the Holy Cross, who had among his people warm friends who gratefully appreciated his ministries and sacrifices in their behalf; and the Rev. John Peterson, deacon, who was a remarkable instance of devotion to the welfare of his brethren of the African race, and, especially, in St.

Phillips, with which Mr. Peterson had been so long connected.

"Our record of departed clergy ends with the death of the Rev. Dr. Stephen Higginson Tyng, rector emeritus of St. George's church, in this city. Dr. Tyng's departure terminated a connection with the venerable parish of which he was rector extending over nearly forty years, most of them fruitful in their influence upon individual souls, to a rare and exceptional degree. No one who saw the vast throng in St. George's church on the day of his funeral could well have mistaken its significance. It was an assemblage of the people, representing all classes and drawn from all parts of the city and from distant neighborhoods as well. It was a testimony to a ministry of commanding qualities, and of enduring results. Dr. Tyng was preeminently a preacher. His pulpit was his throne, his voice a trumpet, and his whole personality one that compelled attention, even where it did not command assent. But besides this, his services in the missionary work of this city, the mission chapels, which, under his leadership, his people reared and maintained, his immense Sunday-schools in which it has been said that he knew every child by name, his power on the platform as the exponent of great reforms, his devotion to a school of theology which supremely revered the Bible and the voice of the individual conscience as enlightened by the work of the Holy Ghost—all these features of his character and ministry would have made him a leader in any community, and a foremost figure in any age. There have been those who accounted him as disesteeming the Church of his fathers and undervaluing its apostolic order and ministry. But his published words remain to contradict such an impression, and his vast confirmation classes witnessed, as his bishop said of him many years ago, that almost no one else in this or any other diocese had been instrumental in bringing so many, born and nurtured amid other associations, within the Church's doctrine and fellowship. Like all men of his temperament, Dr. Tyng had strong antagonisms, and was not always careful to avoid expressing and emphasizing them; but there are pages in the history of this diocese which, if they could be written here, would show that he could illustrate the noblest and most generous magnanimity and the largest spirit of Christian brotherhood. The Church witnesses to her catholic mind in honoring such men as he, even as she illustrates her many-sided adaptiveness in finding a place for their rare gifts and a sphere for their powerful influence."

The bishop here called to mind those godly laymen to whose services this diocese and this city have been so largely indebted, and whose absence we mourn to-day. "It is a very unusual fact that since our last convention five of the foremost parishes within our American Church, or in this diocese, have lost by death their senior wardens. I mean Grace church, St. George's, the Church of the Ascension, and St. Bartholomew's church. Of the first-named, Mr. Lloyd W. Wells was an officer for more than a quarter of a century, as he was also treasurer of the General Convention, of the Domestic Committee, a member of our own Standing Committee, and connected with other Church trusts and corporations of almost every variety. So large a measure of confidence indicated qualities that attracted and deserved it, and Mr. Wells possessed them in a remarkable degree. Lucid, exact, untingering laborious, he added to these less interesting characteristics a native refinement and unfeeling gentleness and benignity which made intercourse with him a pleasure and a benefit. His serene presence, gracious with the beauty and dignity of a Christian old age, was a picture which will live in our memories in vivid and enduring lineaments.

"In marked contrast with Mr. Wells were the temperament and character of his associate, here and elsewhere, Mr. Frederick S. Winston. Mr. Winston's was the fervid spirit and the aggressive zeal which, in the early days of our city missions, took him across the East River on stormy winter days in an open boat, and made his example one that (as one of them told me) often shamed the half-heartedness of younger men. Generous in every relation, of strong convictions, and deep and serious aims, he neglected no duty and spared himself no pains, whether in the service of this body or in the work of the Church outside of it.

"Of a different training and unlike his associates whom I have named, was the late Mr. Charles Tracy, in that he was often heard on this floor, even as he won here the hearty respect of those from whom he most widely differed. His excellent knowledge of parliamentary usage, his readiness as a debater, his clear and acute legal mind, made Mr. Tracy one of the most helpful and influential of our laymen who ever rose upon this floor. And his strict integrity, his upright life, his warm sympathy made him a power outside of it wherever he was heard and known. To say that we shall miss him, especially here, is feebly to indicate the void which has been made by his departure.

"Two others there are, who were the senior wardens, respectively, of the Church of the Ascension and St. Bartholomew's church, in this city, Mr. Francis Leland and Mr. Jacob Reese, the one widely known as the head of an important banking institution, and the other as the custodian of the funds of the parish which owed so much to his scrupulous fidelity and watchful care. Both these gentlemen were types of the Christian man of business, and each of them has made the world richer, not so much by great personal gains, as by an example of stainless integrity and unending uprighteousness. As I name them, let me not forget Mr. Benjamin B. Sherman, a friend so dear to me and mine, that I may not trust myself to speak of him as I would, but better than that, a leader in the world of business and finance whose columnar honesty and princely benefactions taught to men on 'change a new meaning to the stewardship of wealth and its manifold opportunities of good rather than evil. The list also included the names of Mr. Popham, of Scarsdale; of Mr. William Moore, of St. Philip's in the Highlands; of Mr. Fisher, of Grace church, White Plains; of Mr. Daniel LeRoy, of this city; of Mr. James H. Rutter, of Irvington; and of Mr. Edmund Haight, of Westchester. Each one of those brethren represented a record of beneficial service in the Church, and in their relations, often large and important, which we should be greatly losers to forget. Our responsibilities are so much the larger because they no longer remain to share them with us. May the memory of their examples quicken and animate us to their more faithful discharge."

In the record of official acts the past year, the baptisms were 8; marriages, 8; funerals, 8; confirmations, 3,557; number of celebrations of the Holy Communion, 50; sermons and addresses delivered, 35; confirmations in private, 12.

Here follows the record of corner-stones laid, and of churches consecrated.

The total number of postulants the past year was 8; of candidates for Deacon's Orders only, 9; for Deacon's and Priest's orders, 33; of candidates for Holy Orders ordained deacons, 12; advanced to the priesthood, 6; clergymen received into the diocese, 18; letters dismissory granted, 18; clergymen appointed to cures, 23; clergymen resigned their cures, 7; deposed, 2; commissions to lay readers, 62; total number of clergymen deceased, 8.

In the matter of services of special interest and importance, the bishop mentions a service of benediction of the new school-house or parish building of St. Mary's parish, Cold Spring, and later at Walden the laying of the corner-stone of a parish house for St. Andrew's church.

These follow the example of various parish homes in this city, among which the bishop mentions the complete and very interesting enterprise known as the Christian Institute, in East Thirty first street, the latter built and maintained by a single layman at a cost of some $50,000, and conducted, it is believed, entirely at his own expense. "Such buildings are an especial recognition of the Church's duty to adapt her activities to the changing wants of the changed times." "If we are afraid of a supreme faith in complicated and multiplied machinery, as we may well be, we should no less be afraid of that slumberous and suspicious conservatism which disdains all untried methods, and which refuses to adapt itself to great and unprecedented emergencies by calling to its aid new agencies in dealing with them." The bishop has in mind "not only the buildings that we rear, and the reading or recreation or club-rooms that are open, but any and all of those other agencies which in our day are being devised for helping men and women to find their way out of darkness into the light, to be purer and more temperate or more devout, and which are in some aspects of its associated life the most conspicuous features of the work of the Church."

The bishop instances the Church Temperance Society, the White Cross Society, the "Girl's Friendly," sisterhoods and brotherhoods. "From the beginning there have been special aptitudes to be exercised and special interests to be cared for, and the apostolic creation of the diaconate is a recognition of that fact which it is in vain to belittle or ignore. To make all these voluntary agencies a part of the canonical system of the Church is not in my judgment necessary, nor would it be wise. They imply by their very existence a certain freedom of action which it would not be possible to control, and which it would, perhaps, be fatal to their existence to attempt minutely to direct."

In this connection the bishop speaks of the mission which it is proposed to hold in this city. He has had no special opportunities of looking into the actual methods and results of missions, but he is one of those who is profoundly sensible of the indifferent success with which we are doing the Master's work. He spoke here of the advantages which, all acknowledge, may be derived from the season of Lent in warning the careless, etc., and says that though such special services may sometimes fail of success, "one thing we do know—that they do not leave us where they found us, and that more than once it has happened that whether they for whom we have striven have turned and repented or no, God has left a blessing behind Him. The cross has come to be a more real thing to us, and its august and awful sacrifice a mightier power in our own lives."

While the proposed mission may not accomplish all that is hoped for because not adapted to this ecclesiastical meridian, and while this and the other objection may be raised, this at least may be said, that "never has so nited, so extensive and so many-sided an effort been proposed among us to enlist all classes of Church people and every individual layman and laywoman of whatever gift and opportunity in one common effort to lift the spiritual level of our people, and to send us all forth together to seek and to save that which is lost. And, therefore, I cannot bring myself to believe that, however little a mission may realize our immediate hopes as to the rescue of those for whose salvation it is primarily intended, it will not issue in a general quickening of our own spiritual life and real awakening of our united activities. For that awakening, the cause of God stands waiting, and if I could repeat to you here what has been said to me by those who have been conferring together during the past year, of that quickening and deepening of their own spiritual life which has come to them from these Monday celebrations of the Holy Communion in the early morning, with the subsequent meetings for prayer and conference—how hearts have been stirred and warmed, how mutual suspicions and prejudices have been dispelled, how the gravity of a great crisis in the Church has dawned upon them, how the need of making our common Christianity a more real and helpful thing to that great multitude who now disdain its influence or neglect its ordinances, how the work of the ministry and the tremendous responsibilities of Christian discipleship, in these days and in this city—how all these have been brought back to them, I am sure you would own with them that no method was to be neglected which had in it the promise of still larger benefits and yet more enduring results."

The bishop next speaks in a more enlarged sense of the missionary work of the diocese as it waits to be done in this city or beyond it, saying that in the past year no one thing has so engaged his attention. He hoped that changes, for which the way is gradually being prepared, may enable us to undertake this work with increased activity and with a larger measure of success. The matter had been referred to a special committee, who would report upon it, having given the subject careful consideration.

Meanwhile, in regard to some conclusions to which the bishop had been brought touching mission work outside the city of New York, the parochial system, he said, had been fairly tried, and in considerable communities, where the Church was self supporting, it had undoubted advantages, and was doing excellent work. Where the population was sparse and other religious bodies had largely occupied the ground the results had been unsatisfactory. The record was one of frequent changes in ministerial service, a large expenditure of strength and means offset by slender gains, and, most discouraging of all, a growing sense of labor spent in vain. Touching the criticism of our brethren in country parishes, as if they were restless and fickle, we should judge them more intelligently, if we better understand their circumstances. It was disheartening to be set down where there was small promise of growth, and it was doubtful whether we were making the best use of means at command. Statistics would be of value, showing the proportion of the clergy to the denser and more sparsely-populated parts of the diocese. It would be worth while to see the missions and missionary stations on the one side, and the souls to be ministered to on the other.

Outside of the city there was little opportunity for aggressive Christian work, and we could do little more than hold the points already occupied. There was not a missionary outside of the city who was not also the rector of a parish. How could such a one, bound hand and foot as he is by particular engagements, go out into the wilderness after the lost sheep? The deans of convocation too were only deans in name, being able to go to a vacant parish only on a week-day, when the people are all at work. The bishop comes to them in his perplexities, and they are powerless to help him. The bishop was satisfied that the only remedy for this state of things was to be found in the primitive diaconate. We must not be above learning from the past and the present. Other Christian bodies were doing a successful work in this direction, and doing it because, whatever may be the constitution of their ministry, they were following the apostolic pattern. They had a diaconate in itinerant ministers and local preachers. Until the Church had something answering this—a light infantry, mobile, enthusiastic and, above all, under constant and competent oversight, she would be doing her work to an enormous disadvantage.

To this end three things were necessary—the men, the training of the men, and an organized system under which they might do their work.

The bishop had been much occupied the past year in securing these three conditions. The greatest difficulty was to find the men. The Church craved annually many deacons, but implied in her treatment of them that the diaconate was a fiction, and by announcing them straightway to the care of a parish, implied that they were equal to more competent tasks.

"In our own case, however, this condition of things is graciously qualified by the fact, that a large proportion of our candidates for orders are beneficiaries of the Society for the Promotion of Religion and Learning." The society now says in substance to the beneficiaries, "You owe your education to the generosity of your mother, the Church. It is true that long continued custom has largely abridged the authority of the diocesan to direct the services of deacons as he may require; that they are usually practically at liberty to accept calls and to seek out such fields of labor as they may see fit. But plainly in your case such liberty, even if canonically it existed, as it does not, may wisely be abridged. You are to-day in debt. The Church asks you to pay that debt by your voluntary service in the diaconate, for such compensation and at such places as may be assigned to you in the missionary work of the diocese. And in accepting her benefactions this is to be explicitly understood between you and her as an honorable, and invariable compact. As to the training of the men, a clergy house, in which some, at least, of the deacons can for a time be resident, and where some system of training may be a part so to speak, of the super-graduate course of the seminary, in what might well be called the science of applied Christianity, could be carried on. I am deeply gratified to be able to record that the munificent generosity of one to whom the Church in this diocese is already indebted in many ways, has enabled me to announce that the realization of this plan is not far distant. It is proposed that this building shall contain accommodations such as shall make it the working headquarters of the diocese, an office for the bishop, a hall for business meetings of the clergy, reading, lodging, and other rooms for the deacons in residence and engaged in mission work in the city, and also for others engaged in diocesan missions, and who may be in transitu. It is also intended to provide for the superintendent, who will have the more immediate oversight of the practical training of the deacons, and consequently the general charge of the work of City Missions.

"In regard to the third requirement, there exists a most serious desideratum—a scheme of instruction and practice combined, which shall make of the theorist an efficient minister of Christ, trained in approaching and in dealing with men, in the problems of parish life and personal ministrations to the sick, in the hand-to-hand work, in a word, which our needs demand, and for which the Church today preëminently waits.

"And in those who are competent to give to their brethren in the diaconate such instruction, this diocese and this city are preëminently rich. We may claim, without boasting, that nowhere else in America are the moral and spiritual problems which challenge the ministry today so focalized as in this great city, and, as one who knows something of his brethren and their work, I do not hesitate to claim for the men who are at the head of our city parishes—some of them a diocese almost in itself, and carrying on a work as large and important as many a diocese—the knowledge and experience and trained ability which will make their instruction, if we can secure it by courses of lectures or otherwise, of incalculable value to those who may be able to avail themselves of it. In the training of a physician, what was once known as 'walking the hospitals,' or clinical teaching, is still a large part of his professional education. When we have something of the same sort in connection with what may be learned from the work of such parishes as Trinity, St. George's, Calvary, Grace, the Church of the Holy Communion, and many others, we shall have secured, I believe, a large and lasting increase in the efficiency of those whom we admit to the higher ministry of the Church."

This plan, the bishop said, would involve some considerable modification of our city mission. "The importance of this is not always recognized amid more pressing claims of a parochial character, we all nevertheless admit. But to give it its due recognition, our city mission work needs to be at once more compact, more mobile, and I do not hesitate to add, in more direct contact with the bishop. The poor of a great city, the outcast and the stranger, the criminal and the pauper, should be preëminently his parishioners, and on the other hand, they who seek them out should be in a very close relation of service and counsel, and his assistants and vicars. I am glad to be able to say that a movement to this end in our Board of Management of the City Missions, originating largely with a judicious layman, is already, I think I may say, on the way to successful accomplishment.

"So exclusive a scheme as I have thus indicated, involving so many interests, calling for considerable expenditure, and necessitating the harmonizing of such various forces and activities, cannot I need hardly say, be set to work in a day, indeed it can only be set to work at all, so far as I am able to secure the generous confidence and co-operation of those to whom I speak this morning.

"I would that I were as sure of my own strength and wisdom as I am of that! Already I have been much encouraged by the interest and sympathy shown for the general plan which I have here rehearsed by our various convocations to whom I have spoken freely on the subject at various times during the past two years."

The bishop next spoke of the increased importance of the several convocations to the work of the diocese, saying that in the convocation idea there was the germ of an agency capable of large efficiency just in proportion as its responsibilities were increased, and its duties and powers defined.

At present the convocations were purely voluntary associations, unrecognized by this body, and wholly disconnected with the organic system of the diocese. In Connecticut, on the other hand, the various convocations or archdeaconries were defined both as to boundaries and powers by canon, and were a very efficient as well as strictly integral part of the missionary work of the diocese. Some such changes as would effect something like this, the bishop hoped, would engage the attention of the convocation.

Speaking of the conferences for women begun during the winter of 1883, the bishop said the work of Churchwomen had much to do with the organization and administration of charity. He desired to call the attention of his brethren to the Charity Organization Society of this city, and its important and helpful relation to our individual, parochial and institutional alms-giving, and methods of charitable relief.

This society recognized the fact that next to the help of alms-giving, is the positive peril of it, and aimed by a wise system of intercommunication and registry to discourage the growth among us of a chronic mendicancy, and to facilitate a personal and elevating administration of the various forms of relief. It had already vindicated the wisdom of its founders, and the bishop trusted that its operations might be extended throughout the diocese, but it largely depended upon the cordial co-operation of the clergy, and he hoped that those to whom he spoke might see their way to give it without reserve.

The bishop spoke of the gains to our American episcopate in Bishop Worthington and Bishop Ferguson, in the consecration of both of whom he took part, and recorded the one loss. "The Bishop of Easton has finished his missionary work—for a missionary work it was from the beginning to the end—and the tired brain and hands are at rest. He died, I believe, of angina pectoris, and appropriately, for his great heart throbbed responsively to every sorrowful plea, and went out nervelessly to the least and lowliest of his brethren. Bishop Lay was sometimes called the Leighton of the American Church, and the gifts and graces of the great archbishop lived anew in him in such generous measure that no one disputed the fitness of the designation. What he was as a writer, a scholar, a preacher, a citizen, most of you know as well as I, but observing him as I did while serving him and others for seventeen years as Secretary of the House of Bishops, I came to think of him chiefly as a counsellor. He was a wise man and fearless. He saw the issues of proposed lines of action with a marvellous and almost unerring vision. His voice was never uncertain, and it was never feverish or impatient. His very presence calmed and restrained, and his opinions gently and quietly expressed and singularly just and fair, had the force and solemnity oftentimes of a judicial decision. His loss to the house in which he sat for nearly thirty years, to the diocese of which he was the first bishop, and to the whole Church in this land is one which may well make us go mourning for many days. May God give to us all something of his singular simplicity, dignity and devotion in his Master's work!"

In the course of his address the bishop gave two words of caution. The first related to the due protection of our people from the ministrations of those who had not been licensed for that purpose, and who sometimes coming from foreign countries, had been admitted to the ministry of our Church without any knowledge of their ministerial character. "It will be a safe rule to follow, that before any stranger be permitted to officiate he shall exhibit to the minister or wardens some proper credentials of his authority for doing so."

The bishop next called attention to the grave responsibility involved in recommending persons as candidates for Holy Orders, and said he could not receive and would not accept men who were sent to him without clear, definite and intelligent testimony on the part of those who sent them, as to their fitness for the calling to which they aspired. It was a matter of profound thankfulness that the General Theological Seminary was now in a position to maintain a resolute front on this question. It would be admitted, he thought, that its standards both of scholarship and character were thoroughly creditable to those who were responsible for them.

The bishop finally spoke of the dangers to be apprehended from the decay of simple manner, the decay of reverent faith, the appalling growth of luxury, etc., and could not persuade himself with some that this was the dawn of a more rational and right-seeing era. In an age which dismissed Christ to the realm of myths, classed the Holy Scriptures with the Vedas and Korans and disesteemed the order and sacraments of God's divine society in the world, he could not see in these things the harbinger of a brighter day, nor did he find that the men who deny the most are the ones to solve the problem of our human society. "We may well pause before we consent to forsake the faith of our fathers or the fellowship of the saints."

In this connection the bishop spoke of some tendencies in the Church which might well give us cause for watchfulness, if not for grave and anxious apprehension. In addition to the love of ease, the love of gain, etc., there was one particular drift of which no thinking man could be insensible, and whose issues it needed no seer to foretell. "If I were asked to say what was that other tendency in matters of religion which stands ever against the bald humanitarianism which disparages Christ and disowns the saving power of the Cross, I should say it was especially in the outward expression of religious faith and worship, a widespread tendency to the scenic, and I had almost said, the acrobatic and spectacular. This tendency exaggerates the value of impressions over convictions, emotion over conduct, etc. It is an era when the theatre has come to be an integral factor in the lives and interests of more people in this land than ever before. It is a time when more Christian and Church people frequent the theatre than ever before. Let us take care that we do not bring the theatre back with us into the church! The springs of human character will never be touched and changed by merely outward shows. That is the work of the Spirit of God upon the conscience, the affections, and the will."

Over against this meagre intellectualism and scenic formalism was another and nobler fabric. "It is a temple where sober and solemn worship is characterized by an august simplicity and founded upon essential truths. It is a temple to which men shall be drawn, not to gratify a vagrant curiosity, but to meet and satisfy undying wants. It is a temple which witnesses to historic facts, and which begets and deepens profound convictions. Believe me, nothing short of this will long influence thoughtful men or permanently control their conduct.

"The demand of the hour, we are told, is the divorce of theology and morality. Men and brethren, the decay of the one means the doom of the other. Men may disparage the Trinity and the Incarnation, and the being and mission of God the Holy Ghost as they will. But the men that shook the world were the men who believed these things, and believed them with their whole mind and heart.

"When I look for the saints of God I do not find them among the men or the women who were without a positive faith. At the bottom there was a theology in which God and His Eternal Son, and His redeeming work and His enlightening Spirit, speaking through His Word and in His Church, were the foundation-stones, and upbided on this sure foundation a strenuous life of duty and of sacrifice." The Committee on Canons made a report recommending certain changes in the canons for the purpose of making their meaning clearer, which recommendations were adopted.

The Rev. Dr. Satterlee presented the following resolutions relating to the general missionary work of the Church, and moved that the general secretary be invited to address the convention. The bishop then welcomed and introduced to the convention, the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford, General Secretary of the Board of Missions. The secretary briefly responded, and the resolutions as moved by Dr. Satterlee, were adopted.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the clergy and laity of the Diocese of New York, to observe St. Andrew's day as a day of intercession for missions.

Resolved, That it be recommended that every congregation in the diocese take at least one offering for Domestic Missions and one for Foreign Missions within each convention year.

Resolved, That the secretary be requested to have published the Journal of the Convention, a table of all parishes, chapels and missions within the diocese, with the offerings of each, respectively, for diocesan, domestic and foreign missions.

The Rev. Dr. Thomas Richey, referring to the proposed revision of the Book of Common Prayer, said it was one of the most important questions brought to the attention of the Church in the present century, and submitted a preamble and resolutions as follows:

WHEREAS, The character of the proposed revision of the Book of Common Prayer makes it evident that the time has not yet come for any general or comprehensive revision of the offices of the American Church, while it is nevertheless to be acknowledged that some alterations are desirable and expedient, therefore,

Resolved, That it is not expedient for the present to proceed with the revision of the Book of Common Prayer further than the correction of long-standing and generally acknowledged errors and defects, and the concession of greater freedom in the use of the hortatory portions of the daily offices and the office for the Holy Communion.

Resolved, Therefore, that the following alterations, without disturbing our long-established order, will be found sufficient to satisfy all present needs and go far to rectify the most glaring liturgical blemishes in the Prayer Book, viz.:

Permission to omit the opening portions of Morning and Evening Prayer in all week-day services, and to begin with the Lord's Prayer, at the discretion of the officiating minister.

The insertion in the office for Evening Prayer of the magnificat and nunc dimittis, which may be used at discretion as substitutes for one or other of the canticles now found there.

Permission to omit the prayers after the collect of grace in the Morning Office when it is followed by any other office.

The use of the Apostles' Creed, unbracketed, in the office for Morning and Evening Prayer to the recitation of the Nicene Creed in its proper place after the Gospel in the office for the Holy Communion.

Resolved, Further, that it is the sense of this convention that, for the full consideration of all matters connected with the liturgical revision, it is expedient that a standing commission consisting of men learned in liturgical science be appointed by authority of the General Convention, and whose duty it will be to report to the same from time to time, and whose recommendations shall be accepted or refused by that convention.

The adoption of the preamble and resolutions was opposed. The convention offered, however, to put the matter in the hands of a committee of five, to report at the next General Convention, and at length decided that the preamble and resolutions should be the special order for the day following.

On motion of the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, it was voted to memorialize the General Convention on the advisability of issuing a supplement to the Hymnal.

The Standing Committee was elected as follows: The Rev. Drs. Morgan Dix, W. F. Morgan, Thomas Richey, and Francis Lobdell, Messrs. Stephen P. Nash, Henry Drisler, George Macculloch Miller, and Hamilton Fish.

The Missionary Committee was elected as follows: The Rev. Drs. C. E. Swope, O. Applegate, and the Rev. Messrs. H. L. Ziegenfuss, E. W. Donald, F. B. Van Kleeck.

Delegates to the General Convention were elected as follows: The Rev. Drs. Morgan Dix, C. E. Swope, Eugene R. Hoffman, and William R. Huntington, and Messrs. Hamilton Fish, Stephen P. Nash, J. Pierpont Morgan, and William Bayard Cutting.

At the evening session, the Rev. E. W. Donald moved that a special committee be appointed to report at the next annual convention what, if any, conditions should be ignored on those who apply to be married. It was difficult he said, to avoid trouble even when complying with the law, since any Protestant minister might refuse to marry those who did not belong to his own denomination. The motion was seconded by the Rev. W. S. Rainsford and carried.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Thomas Richey, a committee of five clergymen and five laymen were appointed to take into consideration the existing mission, parochial and diocesan organizations of the Church, and to suggest what modification, if any, may be desirable for the extension of the work of the diocese. The duty was referred to a committee previously appointed to prepare a canon on the same subject.

According to the treasurer's report, the balance in the treasury at the beginning of the year was $318.84; cash on hand, $1,031.26.

According to the vote taken in the morning, the discussion of the resolutions offered by Professor Richey was made the order at the session on Friday.

Dr. Richey opened the discussion, saying that though he knew it harsh to disturb old and settled convictions, he thought that in this case, as in so many others, it was necessary to do so. He was followed in a strong plea for the passage of the resolutions by the Rev. T. McKee Brown, who asked that the words "long-standing and generally acknowledged errors and defects and glaring liturgical blemishes" be stricken out. Dr. Richey accepted this amendment. The Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington followed in a speech in which he deprecated the resolutions even as amended, said they held out illusory promises, and were couched in vain and undetermined language. Dr. Richey followed with a reply, when at length a vote being taken, 103 voted in favor of adopting them and 105 against it.

The convention was informed by Dr. Dix that he had been commissioned by the venerable and infirm bishop of the diocese to say to the convention that he absolutely declined to accept further salary. A resolution expressive of sympathy, and pledging to the bishop for life the house now occupied by him at No. 38 East Twenty-second street, was offered by Dr. Dix. This resolution was amended by Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, in refusing to accept the offer of the bishop, and the amendment was adopted.

Trustees of the General Theological Seminary were elected as follows: The Rev. Drs. E. A. Hoffman, W. R. Huntington, H. Y. Satterlee, C. E. Swope and A. B. Beach, and Messrs. Henry Drisler, S. P. Nash, W. G. Langdon, W. B. Cutting and C. Vanderbilt. As Dr. Huntington declined to act, the Rev. Dr. C. C. Tiffany was elected in his stead.

According to a resolution offered by Dr. Dix, these trustees are to serve until the meeting of the General Convention of 1889.

The convention tendered thanks to the rector, church wardens and vestry of Trinity church for the use of St. Augustine's chapel. The assistant-bishop having congratulated the convention on the efficiency of the work done, and, wishing it God-speed, pronounced the benediction, a few collects having been said, and the convention adjourned.

LONG ISLAND.

GARDEN CITY.—Cathedral of the Incarnation.—Services of peculiar interest were held in the cathedral on the morning of Sunday, September 27, a special sermon being addressed to the pupils of St. Paul's and St. Mary's Schools, who were assembled for worship on the Lord's Day for the first time since the opening of the session, September 24. The congregation completely filled the pews and many additional seats which had been provided. By appointment of the bishop, the Rev. Dr. James H. Darlington delivered the discourse, his text being from I. John ii. 14, "I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong." The members of St. Paul's School, one hundred in number, wearing neat uniforms, marched to the cathedral under the command of a lieutenant of the United States Army, who has been detailed to train them in military tactics. They were accompanied by the Rev. Charles Startevant Moore, head-master of St. Paul's. The young ladies of St. Mary's were under the charge of their principal, Miss H. Carroll Bates. The bishop was assisted by the Rev. Dr. T. Stafford Drowne and others, and Mr. William H. Woodcock directed the music.

The sermon of Dr. Darlington was exceedingly appropriate, and very happy in its treatment, developing the idea of strength under the three heads of physical, mental, and religious strength. The characteristics of all these were illustrated from familiar life and by reference to historic examples. Athletic games and literary contests were described with graphic vividness, and some fine pictures drawn of the triumphs won in such many struggles. Coming to speak of religious development, he said: "Childhood is the time for bodily growth, youth for mental improvement, manhood and womanhood for spiritual robustness and perfection. But each state has its beginning in the former. It is necessary that the infant be well born, or its childhood will be puny and its body dwarfed. Childhood must be healthful, or the mental improvement of the youth time following will be grievously retarded. During the years of youthful study must be learned and practiced the truths of religion, or maturity will witness no corresponding ripeness and beauty of Christian character. A symmetrical, consecrated life can only be erected on well-laid foundations, by years of earnest effort. Character-building is slow. It cannot be wrought in a day. This is the reason, young men of St. Paul's and young women of St. Mary's, that your parents or guardians have placed you for instruction in these, which are known emphatically as Church seminaries, the cathedral schools of the Diocese of Long Island. If they had wished for you but physical culture, membership in a turn hall or athletic association would have done as well. Had they deemed intellectual training, added to the former, sufficient, any one of a hundred schools and academies supported by State aid, and so strictly 'undenominational' that no religious teaching is heard within their walls, would have answered. But take it, from the known character of these cathedral schools, that you have been sent here because there was one whole side of your triple nature which would be untainted unless, as well as earthward and manward, your thoughts were also directed Godward."

The preacher explained how his text, written originally to young men, applies, so far as relates to spiritual strength, with even greater force to young women. "Gifted by the Creator," he said, "with less, perhaps, of mental and bodily strength, woman seems just as evidently man's superior in the realm of spiritual realities. Delicate in form, and less moved by stormy gusts of passion than her brothers, her mind is more open, apparently, to the teachings of God's Spirit, and with quick intuition she seems to grasp, without the effort of abstract reasoning, the deep and great things of faith. I doubt not, were any of us to-day compelled to name that human being whom, of all our acquaintance, we esteem as leading a life most like that of Jesus in humility, consecration, and charity, we would almost unanimously pass over the names of our masculine friends, and award the pre-eminence to some woman who, in sincerity and truth, is in constant communion with the unseen, and has all her hope and affection 'hid in Christ with God.'"

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

HAMILTON—St. Thomas's Church.—This parish (the Rev. J. E. Wilkinson, rector,) celebrated its fiftieth anniversary on Wednesday, September 23. The Litany was said at 9 A. M. by the Rev. S. S. Roche. At 10:30 A. M. the bishop of the diocese, the rector of the parish, the Rev. Drs. J. H. Egar and J. B. Murray, and the Rev. Messrs. C. T. Olmsted, W. D. L. Wilson, J. A. Russell, J. E. Cathell, C. J. Clausen, W. Cooke, and J. S. Lemon, presided by the vested choir of Grace church, Utica, proceeded from the rectory to the church, singing "Jerusalem the Golden." Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. J. B. Murray, after which the rector delivered an historical address. The following gifts were there presented by members of the parish, and consecrated by the bishop: a carved black-walnut altar, memorial of the late Nelson Fairchild, connected with the parish for over forty years, a solid brass altar cross, an altar desk, an altar service, and Hymnal. The bishop then preached the sermon, a masterly argument against the claims of the Baptist sect.

The bishop then proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, assisted by the Rev. Dr. J. H. Egar.

After the service the bishop, clergy, choir, and guests were entertained by the ladies of the parish in the school-room.

At 6 P. M. there was a choral Evensong, the Rev. C. T. Olmsted officiating, assisted by the Rev. S. S. Roche, the music being rendered by the choir boys. The sermon was by the Rev. Dr. Egar from Hebrew viii. 1, 2, on "Christ, the High Priest."

The whole celebration was most successful, proceeding without a break from beginning to end, and the day was one long to be remembered in the history of this parish.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

SHMIT HILL—Convocation of Reading.—The meeting of this convocation was held in St. Philip's church, Shmit Hill, (the Rev. C. E. Fessenden, rector,) on Tuesday, September 23. There were present, besides the rector of the parish, the dean of the convocation, (the Rev. Chandler Hare,) the Rev. Dr. L. P. Clover, and the Rev. Messrs. M. A. Tolman, J. F. Powers, L. C. Washburn, E. J. Koons, J. P. Hawkes, F. B. Crozier, C. A. Marks, J. Turner, and B. F. Thompson.

After Evening Prayer a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. F. Powers. A business meeting was held in the basement of the church. Letters were read from the bishop and assistant-bishop. The Rev. Chandler Hare was re-elected dean, and the ordinary routine business was transacted.

On Wednesday morning, after another business meeting, there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, preceded by Morning Prayer. The dean of the convocation was the celebrant, and preached the sermon. In the afternoon the convocation reassembled under the presidency of the rector of the parish. Reports were made by the missionaries present, and a general discussion on the subject of missions followed, in which the Rev. Dr. Clover and the Rev. Messrs. Tolman, Powers, Koons, and others took part. At the evening session the subject for discussion was the most effective means to make instruction in the Catechism interesting and profitable to children in the Sunday-schools, and to render the services of the Church more impressive and attractive.

All the services were well attended, and the spirit manifested by the laity, not only in their liberal provision for the clergy in attendance, but in the deep interest they evidently took in the services, gave proof of their devotion to the Church and their affection and confidence in their laborious and self-sacrificing rector.

Summit Hill is a unique place, differing in its location and surroundings from every other parish in the diocese, and occupies, with one exception, it is said, the highest point in the State. As the chief centre of the Molly Maguire tragedies, it has a sad and historic interest. Some few of the Church people here, to whom are committed the care and supervision of the extensive mining interests, are refined and cultured and liberal to the Church, while all, even the plainest and most unpretending, are liberal according to their means, some of them, in proportion to their ability, doing more than many in other places, to whom God in his providence has vouchsafed a much larger portion of this world's goods. In whichever direction the spectator turns—to the right, to the left, in front, behind—immense deposits of refuse coal-matter are to be seen on every side, piled up like mountains, while far down beneath the surface of the earth are mines that have been worked for the last half century, are now being worked, and for a century to come will continue to yield their rich and almost inexhaustible deposit. From any of the public streets of the town jets of gas and smoke may be seen issuing from crevices in the surface of fields under cultivation, beneath which are coal-beds that have been burning for the last thirty years, and cannot be extinguished—fields which, from their sterile appearance, would seem to offer no inducement to cultivation, unless it be that the soil is warm both in summer and winter.

It may readily be conceived why the sea has an irresistible fascination for sailors, but why the delver in coal mines should find a like fascination in his work, which it is said he does, is one of the many mysteries connected with the operations of the human mind. One poor fellow, terribly mangled by the falling of a mass of coal in a mine where he was at work, had just been brought on a litter to the depot to be conveyed to the hospital, as the writer was waiting for a train.

Summit Hill is the terminus of the famous Switch Back Railroad, along the line of which to Mauch Chunk the scenery for wild beauty and grandeur is unsurpassed, and presents to the artistic eye and cultivated mind an attraction not to be found elsewhere.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE—Archdeacon Farrar's Address.—The academic year of Johns Hopkins University began on Thursday, October 1. Archdeacon Farrar delivered the opening address.

In the course of his address he said our nation was distinguished by many splendid institutions founded by private munificence. In reference to the progress made in education, he said that fifty years ago no university in England comparing with Johns Hopkins University existed. English boys capable of high achievements were suffered to grow up in ignorance of literature. There was not an English school which had a science master. Now they all have them. We cannot do without the vast stores of learning that are accumulated in Greece and Rome, Greek and Latin must always be worth study, if only for the beauty and grandeur of the languages themselves. They enshrine magnificent literatures and cover the vastest realms of human thought. But even the most perfect Greek and Latin scholar is imperfectly educated if he knows nothing of modern sciences. In these days our civilization has sped forward with indescribable progress. Amid this great progress it would be a disgrace if education was allowed to remain stationary.

Alluding to the study of science he said that many of the great discoveries made were termed by the majority of people as accidents; he did not believe they were accidents, but the results of the observation of trained minds, and that nature held secrets that would yet be yielded to man through the study of science.

His reference to Benjamin Franklin's experiment with the kite and key, which conferred upon mankind one of the greatest blessings, was loudly applauded. The Archdeacon spoke for one hour. He is a most entertaining speaker, and during the entire time held the rapt attention of his audience.

BALTIMORE—Church of the Ascension.—In a previous issue, the number of sittings in this church (the Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair, rector,) was given as 1,800. It should have been stated that this includes the adjoining chapels connected with the church. The accommodations are divided as follows: Church, 800; upper chapel, 600; lower chapel, 400; colored chapel, 300. Occasionally services are simultaneously held in the church and chapels. In addition to the envelope systematic plan, this parish has pew rents and the weekly offerings.

WASHINGTON—Rock Creek Parish.—This parish is the owner of one hundred acres eligibly situated and increasing in value. In 1883 the estimated value of this land was reported to be only $12,000 (including parsonage). In 1884 it had considerably increased. In 1885 it is estimated to be worth not less (with rectory) than $100,000, or $1,000 per acre. The future of this parish is more encouraging than that of any of our suburban parishes, owing to its proximity to the rapidly enhancing portions of the district. It contains, even now, two villages of daily increasing wealth and population, Mount Pleasant and Brightwood.

OHIO.

BOARDMAN—St. James's Church.—This parish has an interesting history. It is the oldest, not only in the diocese, but in the State. The first service was held in 1807 by Mr. Platt, a lay reader. The first clergyman to officiate was the Rev. Jackson Kemper, afterwards Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, who at the time was doing missionary work in Western Pennsylvania. He officiated several times, and was followed by the Rev. Roger Searle, who left a record of indefatigable missionary labor, having "organized thirteen parishes in Ohio and four in Kentucky." The parish having an endowment, the church building is kept in excellent condition. The Rev. H. L. Gamble and the Rev. F. B. Avery officiate occasionally. On the afternoon of Saturday, September 19, the former held service, assisted by the Rev. A. W. Mann.

SALEM—The Church of our Saviour.—This church has been re-opened recently, after having been closed for sixteen years. The Rev. C. S. Witherspoon is in charge, and is working with great energy. Ground has been lost, which may have to be regained by very hard work. Salem has a population of five thousand and is growing rapidly. The church building has been renovated. There are thirty-three communicants.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

MANISTEE—St. Paul's Mission.—The bishop of the diocese visited this mission (the Rev. W. S. Hayward in charge) on Sunday, September 25, preached four times, and administered the rite of confirmation. He also inspected the poor-house and jail. This mission has a lot secured, and much needs a church. But the times are hard and it is difficult to raise the means.

WISCONSIN.

MILWAUKEE—Woman's Auxiliary.—The Wisconsin Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions held its annual meeting and a conference of Church women in St. Paul's church, Milwaukee, (the Rev. C. S. Lester, rector,) on Wednesday, September 23. The bishop of the diocese was present, and opened the session with prayer. Delegates were present from seven parishes. The report of work showed that ten parishes had contributed boxes to the value of $736.46, and in money $119.15. The treasurer reported a balance of $7.50. A letter was read from the Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary giving cordial greetings to this branch, expressing hope that the coming year may witness growth in every direction, but says that this can only be secured by renewed efforts on the part of every one, and suggesting ways in which this effort may be made; $100 is asked from Wisconsin during 1886.

There was a celebration of the Holy Communion after the morning meeting, at which the bishop was celebrant, assisted by the rector of the parish. The sermon was by the Rev. Dr. J. F. Conover, from Isaiah vi. 8. The topic was "Personal Service of Christ."

The sessions of the conference were held in St. Paul's chapel at 2 p. m. After a short service, the bishop announced that the call for the conference was based on the desire expressed by a few Church women in the diocese to do their work in a broader and deeper spirit, and to learn by mutual interchange of thought and expression the most excellent ways and methods of doing it.

Papers were read by Mrs. Laura Catlin on "How to Conduct a Sunday-school, as Gathered from my Experience," by Mrs. H. E. Whitney on "Sewing Schools," by Miss Mary Conover on "Mother's Meetings," by Mrs. W. H. Harding, for Mrs. W. W. Stiteler, on "The Guild Embracing all Parochial Agencies," by Mrs. Sharpe, for the Rev. E. S. Burford, on "Girl's Friendly Societies," by the Rev. C. L. Mallory, for Miss M. T. Emery, on "Children's Societies," and by Mrs. L. H. Morehouse, for Miss Helen Beach, on "The Society of the Royal Law."

In the evening a paper was read by the bishop, for Mrs. Ophelia Mark, on "How can Isolated Churchwomen Forward the Work of the Church?"

The report of woman's work in the diocese was then presented by Miss Conover.

The bishop then read letters from the Missionary Bishop of Washington Territory, and another from the Rev. Mr. Wicks about Sherman Coolidge, an Indian deacon. He suggested work to do in the diocese, and thanked those who had taken part in this meeting.

The meeting and conference are considered as highly successful.

IOWA.

MARSHALLTOWN—Central Deanery Convocation.—The ninth regular convocation of this deanery was held in St. Paul's church, Marshalltown, (the Rev. F. E. Judd, rector,) on Tuesday, September 22. There were present the rector, the dean (the Rev. J. E. Ryan), and the Rev. Messrs. W. P. Law, Allen Judd, F. D. Jaudon, and A. C. Stilson.

There was a discussion on "The Book Annexed," and most of the committee work was approved, but there was a strong expression of dissent with regard to some of the alterations.

The Rev. A. C. Stilson gave an interesting account of St. Andrew's Guild, Ottumwa, connected with St. Mary's church, which is a society for boys, the object being growth in all that is best.

Guid Hall, in which the services were held, is a beautiful hall, complete in its appointments, and owned by the Ladies' Guild of St. Paul's parish. The building is eighty by forty feet, with nineteen feet ceiling, having a chancel at one end and a raised platform at the other. The stage may be used as such for entertainments, or shut off from the main room by folding doors and used as a church parlor. There is a kitchen and refreshment-room in the basement, and a Boynton furnace warms the whole house. The chancel, at the east end of the hall, may be cut off from the hall when it is to be used for secular purposes. An elegant crimson curtain, ornamented with wreaths of water lilies in applique work, drops down over the chancel rails. The building was planned by the rector of the parish, and the property is valued at $4,500.

ARKANSAS.

BATESVILLE—St. Paul's Church.—The Rev. W. A. Tearne, dean of Trinity cathedral, Little Rock, made a three weeks' stay in this parish, from August 23 to September 15, during which time he held the Sunday and week-day services. The result of his stay was ten baptisms and eight persons presented for confirmation. The congregation feels greatly strengthened, and sets out with renewed faith and energy.

On September 15 the bishop of the diocese visited the parish, and confirmed eight persons. He pleased the congregation much by accepting the resignation of Mr. Tearne as dean of the cathedral, that he might again become rector of this parish. He will enter on his work in a few days.

PARAGRAPHIC.

The Romish Bishop of Salford says the pope requires yearly $290,000 to carry on the government of the Church for a year modestly and economically.

A LIBRARY in Germantown, Penn., of five sufficient to loan 15,000 volumes yearly, and where some 25,000 people visit in order to read, has no work of fiction upon its shelves.

OVER the graves of two of the Presidents of the United States, Harrison and Tyler, no suitable monuments have ever been erected. We spend our money and sentiment upon a magnificent funeral, to honor the living; but we leave the dead to forgetfulness a prey.

RITUALISM would seem to have invaded the African M. E. Church in Vicksburg, Miss. It makes a specialty of its Sunday night services, and advertises them as abounding "in prelude selections, Bible responses and textual interludes," the choir being led by B flat cornet.

"SOCIETY OF THE TREASURY OF GOD."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

We shall be obliged if you will print the enclosed circular, which is addressed to the whole American Church. To work well in both countries our societies must be one as our churches are one, but we must divide the executive.

C. A. B. FOCOCK,
Hou. Organizing Secretary for Canada.

SOCIETY OF THE TREASURY OF GOD.

NOTICE.

"Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open the windows of Heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."—MALACHI III. 10.

RULES.

1. To give a tithe of income, or earnings, to God.
2. To use all possible influence for the restoration of the Law of Tithes.

3. To disseminate information on the subject of the tithe by the distribution of pamphlets, etc., and by any other means possible.

4. To pray that God will bring His people to the knowledge of their duty regarding His tithe. (Once a week is suggested).

The "Society of the Treasury of God" is started for the purpose of restoring the law of tithes, and awakening the mind of the Christian Church to the fact that a tithe of all increase is due to God from every Christian man, not as a matter of gift, but as a debt.

The manner of working of the Society will be as follows:

1st. To band together in one all who now practice the law of the tithe.

2d. To form tithe associations in dioceses and parishes.

3d. To bring the subject before the Church by the publication and distribution of pamphlets, tracts and leaflets, or in any other way which may be found possible.

MEMBERSHIP.

1. Any person may become a life member by the payment of $10.

2. The annual fee for membership shall be $1.

I sympathize with the objects of the proposed "Society of the Treasury of God," and would commend it to the attention and consideration of the bishops and clergy of the Anglican Communion. The Rev. E. P. Crawford is a priest, and the Rev. C. A. B. Focock a deacon of my diocese.

J. T. ONTARIO.

Epiphany, 1885.

ASSOCIATION OF PARISHES.

RULES.

1. An associate parish to be one in which, at the least, four persons shall be tithers.

2. Which contributes annually to the Society of the Treasury of God the sum of one dollar per member for each associate tithe payer.

3. Which agrees to discourage all worldly methods of obtaining money, and uphold God's system of finance, viz.: Tithes and offerings.

4. Which agrees to distribute the publications of the society.

5. In which one sermon at least shall be preached annually, setting forth the duty and obligation of tithes and offerings.

6. In which the associate members shall agree to use occasionally (once a week is requested), the Collect of the society.

7. The associate members shall use the society's envelopes in which to place their contributions, which are paid into the offertory.

SUGGESTED DIVISION OF THE TITHE.

Where Members Pay in their Whole Tithe to the Church.

Half to parochial objects.

Half to extra parochial objects.

The parochial half may be divided as follows:

Half to the support of the Church.

One-fourth to the poor.

One-fourth to any other parochial object, such as Church debt.

The extra parochial half:

Half to Diocesan Funds.

One-fourth to Foreign Missions, i. e. extra Diocesan Missions.

One-fourth to general objects, such as the Society of the Treasury of God, and other similar worthy objects.

SUGGESTIONS TO TITHE PAYERS.

Who do not Pay in their Whole Tithe to a Common Treasury.

1. That one-half of their tithe should be given within their own parish.

2. That of the portion devoted to parochial needs, one-half should be given to the support of the minister and services of the Church.

EXAMPLE.

In Trinity church, Brockville, Ont., four persons are tithe payers. Each pays in the whole of his tithe in an envelope, in the offertory. All these tithe envelopes are locked away each Sunday, in a secure place in the church. Once a month the members are called together, to be present at the distribution, when all that is in the treasury is apportioned according to agreement.

In six months these four persons have paid tithes to the value of $20. Of this, $55 have gone to the Church, $88 to the poor, $37 to the society, and the balance to missionary and other objects.

COLLECT.

Almighty God, who alone art the author and giver of all good things, grant unto Thy people a willing mind, that of all Thou givest them, they may surely give a tenth to Thee, and may offer to Thee free-will offerings, with an holy worship: That so, proving Thee according to Thy Holy Word, Thou mayest open the windows of Heaven, and pour out the fulness of Thy blessing upon Thy Church, for His sake, who gave himself a sacrifice for the sins of the world, Jesus Christ our Lord.—AIDED.

THE CONSTITUTION AND BLACKSTONE

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Your correspondent may rest quietly under the conviction that the constitution of these United States is not of Presbyterian origin. A short time before the Constitutional Convention met at Philadelphia, Blackstone gave to the world his "Commentaries on the Laws of England." We are told that a careful reading of this work will show that the constitution is greatly indebted to this author for its form and substance. "All the eloquent praises of the constitution, which are continually on the lips of American orators and statesmen, praises of its admirable system of checks and balances, its equal distribution of powers, its blending of diverse and conflicting interests into one harmonious whole, and all the rest of it, are borrowed from Blackstone's outline on the Constitution of England." (See Nineteenth Century, August, '85. American reprint, pp. 210-11.)

ALBERT E. GEORGE.

PORTRAIT OF THE REV. HENRY VAN DYKE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The Rev. Henry Van Dyke, ordained by Bishop Seabury in 1785, was rector of St. Mary's church, Burlington, N. J., from 1793 to 1796, and then of St. James's church, Newtown, L. I., till his death, in 1811. He was buried in the family vault in Trinity churchyard, New York. His grand daughter (Mrs. Clarke, now deceased,) wrote in 1875, "Some years since a fine portrait of him hung in the library of the old Livingston mansion, New York."

Can any one inform me where that portrait now is?

NEW BOOKS.

THE JOURNALS OF MAJOR GEN. G. O. GORDON, C.B., AT KARTUM. Printed from the original MSS. in Introduction and Notes by A. Egmont Hale, author of "The Story of Chinese Gordon." With Portrait, Two Maps and Thirty Illustrations after sketches by General Gordon. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) Pp. 629. Price, $2.00.

English newspapers have said that the publication of Gordon's journals relieved the government from a great odium. The impartial American reader will hardly concur with this opinion. It is said that Gordon could have got away if he had wished, and that he misapprehended the purpose for which he was sent to the Soudan. These journals make it clear that he could have done this only at the expense of what he valued much more than life, viz. honor and principle. He puts it in the clearest possible way. The people in Kartum might have gone over to the Mahdi and saved themselves, probably would have done so, had it not been for his presence in Kartum: They could not do it any longer, but would have been sacrificed because of their prolonged resistance; consequently he felt bound to stick by them to the last, unless the governments which sent him relieved him. Even then he had no notion of personally escaping, but proposed to stay by the wreck and do what he could in an inferior place, while anything remained to be done.

The charge was made against Gordon that he was insubordinate. The fact was that England was trying to play here the game which Lord Macaulay has so well described in the account of British policy in India. The home government might find it convenient to regard Gordon as an officer of the Queen, and subject to the authorities at the Horse Guards. It might find it equally convenient to treat him as the Khedive's lieutenant in the Soudan. If he succeeded, England was to have the credit. If he failed, Egypt was to bear the loss. Of course it is understood that this anomalous position was in some degree inevitable. England had no more right to send Gordon to command Egyptian troops in Kartoum than she had to send him to command United States troops in Denver City. The only way that Gordon could go would be by the appointment of Tewfik, and the appointments of the Khedive were, in fact, the appointments of the English Government. But Gordon's acceptance of this post was purely voluntary. He went to help England out of a scrape and to help the Soudan, which he had governed, and in which he felt an interest. He went from the strong impulse that had ruled him through life: the impulse to put things right which were going wrong. He knew his immense capacity for ruling a people like the Soudanese, and he knew, too, that they would obey him and trust him as they would no other European or Christian. One can well imagine that he did not go to be a mere card to be thrown out or retained, according to the turn of the game. To men in England it was a matter to be looked at simply with regard to its effect upon Parliamentary votes. In the absence of strongly distinctive principles, the strife of parties in England has been more and more drifting into a mere contest for power. If a point was to be gained by forgetting Gordon and treating him as the volunteer servant of Egypt, the ministry was ready to make it; if a point was to be made by treating Gordon as her majesty's officer in command on the Nile, the cabinet would send an army to rescue him. The trouble lay in the impossibility of the average Englishman to see beyond the range of his immediate limitations. It is the defect that comes of his intense insularity.

It is clear from these journals that Gordon thoroughly understood his position. But it was not the first or the second time that he had been in a like situation, and he measured it with a truer eye. So long as he retained his commission in the Queen's service he was subject to her orders. He was bound to yield his own judgment to commands which he did not approve.

But he was also the Viceroy of the Khedive with plenary powers. He was acting directly for the latter. He was bound only by ordinary loyalty and the natural feeling of a subject for his sovereign's good fame to the former. In the treatment of the troops under him he was no more bound by the English rules of war, than he was by the resolutions of the United States Senate. He could at any moment lay down his commission. The mischief was in the anomalous position of the English in Egypt. They were nominally there to protect the government from overthrow. They were really trying to run the State in the interest of the British bondholders, and with reference to the empire in India. That Gordon's policy was not only true to the highest principle, but was also for the best interests of England, is well, clearly proved by these journals. But it was upon this latter point that he disagreed with the powers at home and the English officials at Cairo. He said distinctly what would save the Soudan and would at the same time be, on the whole, for the best interests of humanity. He knew that an ideal government was no more possible there than it was to bridge the Red Sea by a fleet of pontoon boats. The only choice was in a choice of despotisms.

There was a tremendous outcry at Gordon's proclamation permitting slavery and his demand for the sending of Zubair, the great slave trader, whom he had put down in his previous governorship of the Soudan. The truth was, that Gordon knew the East better, probably, than any living Englishman, and knew just what could be done and what could not be done. He could die for a principle more easily than another man could sacrifice a guinea, but he knew that the first thing to be done was to restore order to the country. Under any set of masters possible to the Soudan, slavery and the slave trade would go on, it was not necessary to superadd war and wholesale devastation. The scruples of men who had never been out of Great Britain, and whose chief idea of the East was that it produced sponges and Turkey rhubarb were on a par with those who object to ransoming the captives of pirates and banditti, because of the demoralizing influence of the practice upon the minds of the freebooters.

We suspect that the main offence of Gordon's journals in official circles will be that he was right when they were wrong, and that in the solitude of his captivity in Kartoum he relieved his mind by caricatures of the diplomats who vexed his soul with their blunders and imbecilities, and that (in his private journals) he was more apt to draw an illustration from Scripture than from parliamentary blue books.

The Gordon journals are seven in number, extending from September 10, 1884, to December 12, of the same year. There are also numerous appendices containing documents referred to in the journals, mostly the proclamations and letters of the Mahdi. The illustrations are chiefly rough maps, explaining the situation, but among them are one or two clever caricatures which were probably much more agreeable to the excited feelings of the author than to their originals in official stations. Of course, these were not intended for the public eye, and they would probably never have been seen except for the fate of General Gordon.

Two points come prominently out in this volume. One is the almost hopeless character of the population with whom Gordon had to do, and the other the great impolicy of the English rule. The people were liars and cowards to an all but incredible degree. Gordon's judgment was not likely to be severe. He had seen too much of human nature in unfavorable conditions to be uncharitable. But he backs up his conclusions with facts which permit of no mistake. Probably no European could have held his men together as he did, or have been so loved and respected by them, and yet he could hardly trust that the slightest order would be obeyed except under his eye. Whoever would raise the Egyptian character must work from the foundation up.

The other point, the English occupation of Egypt, is also strikingly brought out. It was neither one thing nor the other. It was not a conquest, it was not a friendly protectorate. It ingeniously contrived to unite the faults of both while attaining the benefits of neither. It was a vacillating interference. The only rule which could benefit Egypt would be an absolute despotism, controlled by a sense of justice which left nothing to chance, and by a feeling of mercy only limited by the sternest necessity. But English rule was constantly hampered by the need of parliamentary explanations, and by the real conflict of interests. The danger of allowing the Mahdi to triumph lay in the possible uprising of the Mohammedans everywhere, and notably in India. By the treaty of Berlin England was bound to preserve the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and that complicated matters on the side of Turkey. Again France was jealously watching every step of the English occupation. And lately the English conscience was sensitive just where it should have been callous, and dormant just where it should have been most wide-awake.

It sought to deal with men on a higher plane of intelligence and virtue than that on which they lived and moved and had their being. It was blind to the real injustice and cruelty to which this must inevitably lead. With this Gordon is justly wroth. He declaims against the "fictions" upon which England proceeds, at once costly and inoperative, and he "did well to be angry."

We do not need to commend this book to our readers, for it has been impatiently waited for from the moment its publication was promised. We do not think it will, as has been alleged, detract from the esteem in which Gordon's memory will be held. If it bears sad traces of the tremendous strain his last year of life laid upon him, it gives proofs also of his admirable wisdom and temper.

THE TEN LAWS OF HEALTH: OR, HOW DISEASES ARE PRODUCED AND PREVENTED, AND A FAMILY GUIDE TO PROTECTION AGAINST EPIDEMIC DISEASES AND OTHER DANGEROUS INFECTIONS. BY J. R. BLACK, M. D. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.) pp. 418. Price, $1.00.

Medical books as a rule are for medical people only. A lively imagination will quickly discover in one's self the symptoms of disease, and possibly end by producing them. But this criticism does in no wise apply to the admirable book whose title is given above. It seems to us to meet just the want which is felt, the knowledge of general laws which apply to the prevention of disease. This is entirely different from the study of disease when it comes. In that case the best advice we know of is to call in the most skillful medical aid attainable, to obey orders and to trust in the divine care. But to avoid the liability to disease is another matter—and the principles of this avoidance are well laid down. Pure air to breathe, exercise, temperance in eating and drinking, sufficiency of sleep, a calm mind, not overwrought in any field of labor, are among the chief requirements. Of course something more is needed than to name these rules; their application must be generally (not too minutely) pointed out. This Dr. Black has done, we think, as well as we have ever seen it done, for its pages are sufficiently generalized to leave room for the variations due to special temperaments and exceptional organizations without impairing their effect as a whole. There is more good sense on the subject than there used to be, and an advance in the duration and comfort of human life. But every step in a complicated civilization brings with it new liabilities, or at least possibilities of disease. Greater facility of travel increases the chance of the spread of infectious and contagious sicknesses. Large cities multiply at once the risk and the safeguard. Survival of the fittest makes a strong stock, because the weakest are rapidly eliminated, whereas greater care in the prolongation of sickly lives increases the area of partial ill-health. Nevertheless, the general advance is slow but sure.

Not the least useful part of this book is the second half, which treats of protection against epidemic diseases. The Middle Ages were powerless against an epidemic when once it had reached full headway. The great fire of London extinguished the plague, which had before that made constant visits to England. Now no one fears that outside of the warm limits of the Mohammedan East. Cholera is still dreaded, but medical science declares itself determined to win in the battle. Yellow fever, which once devastated New York and Philadelphia, is now barred out by an efficient quarantine. We are glad to see that Dr. Black gives full value to the influence of a healthy mental temper as a prophylactic. For that a sound religious faith is needed. The fearlessness, which is a matter of will, is the only courage which will stand a trial; a fearlessness which comes from nerve and temperament is liable to be overthrown when least expected and most needed. There is no such courage as that of Sisters of Charity, of physicians who carry a true conscience into their callings, and of the near in blood and affection, where after unselfishness obliterates all thoughts of personal peril. We think a copy of this book should be in every household, and we can recommend it for parish and public libraries.

THE SCIENCE OF BUSINESS. Questions of the Day Series. A study of the principles controlling the Laws of Exchange. By Roderick H. Smith. [New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 182. Price, $1.25.

In two very clear and well-written preliminary chapters, Mr. Smith defines and illustrates the two laws of nature, the "Law of Motion" and the "Law of Rhythm." He then goes on to show by a series of well-arranged statistical tables that these same laws govern the course of business, viz., of production and trade. One is always a little afraid of a too perfect theory, but we do not find any flaws in the reasoning, and we are bound to presume that the facts are fairly and fully stated. The conclusion is that the science of business can be calculated with the same probability as the weather, and the larger the area and the more extended the observation, the more nearly the chances of coming years can be ascertained. Mr. Smith's idea is that legislation and changes, such as foreign wars, have much less than is supposed to do with the fluctuations of trade, and the laws of exchange exhibit a regular ebb and flow, if the scale be but large enough to show their working. One inference drawn from this we are disposed to accept, and that is, that civilization and trade tend to the equalization rather than to the disparity of conditions, and that the cry of "the rich grow richer, and the poor, poorer," is only a senseless piece of demagogism. At any rate, whether the reader accepts this theory or not, Mr. Smith's book deserves a faithful study. It is entertaining reading, even for the mere outside student of social questions, and it is certainly an attempt made with great skill and fairness to solve one of the most important problems of the day. The effect of its theories will be that business men will be less depressed by business slowness and less wildly elated by business "booms." And so long as integrity and self-denial are cherished, other things are comparatively stable.

SERMONS BY THE REV. NOAH HUNT SCHRECK, D.D. Late Rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn. [New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.]

This volume of sermons is appropriately dedicated to the members of the congregation of St. Ann's church by the family of their late rector. Their publication is not only an affectionate tribute to his memory, but a valuable contribution to theological literature. The style of the author is brilliant and fascinating, and not unlike that of Guthrie, the great Scotch preacher, and evinces that remarkable gift of language for which he was so distinguished as a pulpit orator.

Another characteristic of these sermons, in addition to their eloquent diction, is their fidelity and clearness in presenting the great fundamental verities of the Gospel.

The natural depravity of man, the necessity of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, the certainty of future rewards and punishments, the evil of sin and the beauty of holiness, are proclaimed with no uncertain sound.

Above all, Jesus Christ and Him crucified is set forth in the fulness of His saving power as the only hope and refuge of a lost world. As the power of his life and example still lives in the hearts of those who knew and loved him, so, in these sermons, he "being dead, yet speaketh."

They will prolong his great usefulness in proclaiming the truths of that precious Gospel to the promotion of which he consecrated his life.

THE LAW OF THE TEN WORDS. By J. Oswald Dykes, D.D. [New York: T. Whitaker, 1883.] pp. 94.

This is a reprint of an English work, and consists of fourteen lectures upon the Decalogue, by an author who is favorably known by his "Beatitudes of the Kingdom" and "From Jerusalem to Antioch." They are plain, simple and practical, and will serve either for private reading or for the use of lay readers. With an introduction upon the Characteristics of the Decalogue, the volume takes up the Ten Commandments seriatim, and concludes with a lecture upon the Second Great Commandment and upon the Uses and Effects of the Law. It handles the most difficult parts of its subject with judgment and discretion, and can be cordially commended.

LITERATURE.

LORD TENNYSON will soon appear with a new volume containing some hitherto unpublished poems.

The programme of St. Nicholas for 1886, as announced by the Century Company, is full of delightful promise for the young people.

VICK'S Illustrated Monthly, as usual, comes with unfeigned regularity. Its colored plate presents a view of the "Calandrinia Grandiflora."

E. & J. B. YOUNG & Co. have issued a catalogue of new and second-hand books, and of new editions, which book buyers will find it of interest to examine.

The October Builder and Wood-Worker gives in one of its plates an illustration of Christ church, Fenge, England, and has a varied table of contents with illustrations.

T. S. OHLVIE & Co., of this city, are publishing the Eureka Collection of Recitations and Readings as a serial. It contains miscellaneous selections of prose and verse.

The October Unitarian Review opens with an account of "John Bellamy's Bible," which was translated from the Hebrew in 1818. The paper is by the Rev. Samuel J. Barrows.

The October Overland Monthly of San Francisco is a substantial magazine, and is furnished with a great variety of entertaining matter, furnishing good reading for those who live on the shores of both oceans.

The Cottage Hearth is published by the Cottage Hearth Company, Boston, and The Woman's Magazine by Frank Hough, Brattleboro, Vt. They are monthlies, and are filled with varied and entertaining matter.

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING for October 3 is at hand. A subscription to it, paid, would be an acceptable gift to all housekeepers, young and old. In remedies for discomfort and bad cooking, it would be a profitable investment.

The Homiletic Review, of this city, is made up of contributions by ministers of various denominations. An interesting paper in the October number is by the Rev. S. W. Dike, on "Important Features of the Divorce Question."

The Contemporary Review for September (Leonard Scott Publishing Company) contains, among other articles, two papers on "The Protection of Girls," a subject of great interest in England at this time. They are written by Millicent G. Fawcett and Ellice Hopkins.

The Sideral Messenger for this month opens with a paper on "The Comet of 1866 and the Meteors of November 14," by Daniel Kirkwood, and in the editorial notes is an account of the new star in the nebula of Andromeda. It is published at Northfield, Minn.

The seventeen articles in the October Eclectic are taken from thirteen English periodicals, and fairly represent the current literature of the day. The opening paper is on "Cholera: Its Cause and Prevention," by Professor Sanderson, and will interest many. The selections are made with judgment, and are in sufficient variety to suit all tastes.

CHRISTIAN THOUGHT for September-October gives the anniversary address of Dr. Deems before the Institute of Christian Philosophy, in which he considers the case of "Galileo and the Use of Scientific Studies to the Preacher," Dr. Armstrong on "Primeval Man," "Ethics and Religion," by the President of Bowdoin College, and "The Summer Schools of 1885," by the Secretary, besides miscellaneous matter.

"POE NOT to be Apotheosized" is the title of a communication that fills the first column of last week's Critic. It is a protest, supported by new testimony, against Prof. Minto's eulogy of the poet in the new volume of "The Encyclopaedia Britannica." Edmund Gosse's verses dedicating his new book of poems to Austin Dobson are printed in the same paper, several weeks before the publication of the book itself.

The October English Illustrated Magazine comes promptly and acceptably. Its frontispiece is a representation of Rye, and there are four fully illustrated articles, besides ornamental frises, headings and initial letters. The illustrations are by well known artists, and will bear examination. Two of the papers are on "London Commons and Decayed Sea-ports," and the "Incomplete Angler," if not a classic like Walton's work, is full of interest for those who love the fisher's art.

The first paper of the Church Eclectic for October is by the Rev. J. H. Burn, and is on "The Athanasian Creed." The Rev. Mr. Betts follows with "The Ideal Liturgy," Dr. Shattuck with a "Sketch of Bishop Griswold," the Rev. Ed. Ransford with a paper on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," and the Rev. Cameron Mann on the "Anglican Type of Sanctity." Dr. Dix opens the miscellany with an account of Sewanee. The number is an excellent one, and, as usual, the summaries are by no means the least important part of it.

One of the most interesting papers of the Art Amateur for October is the account of the Morgan Collection of Paintings, with a catalogue of them. The frontispiece of the number is "Mother and Child," a crayon study by Lobrichon, and there are seven plates of supplement designs, one of which is devoted to centres for altar frontals. Every department of the magazine is filled with information serviceable to amateurs, and it would not come amiss to many premature artists. Besides the frontispiece, there are two other full-page illustrations.

The October number of the Andover Review opens with a paper, the first of a series, by Professor Torrey, on "The Theodice of Leibnitz." H. A. Hill has an article on "The New England Company," a corporation organized in 1649 for the promotion and propagation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ in New England, Dr. W. Barrows treats of "The Mutual Relations of Commerce, Civilization, and Christianity," and Dr. Stuckenborg, of "The Religious Condition of Germany." The editorials are, "Progressive Orthodoxy: VI.—The Christian," "The American Board of Commissioners," and "Is 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' a Novel?" The number is vigorous and able.

THE PENTATEUCH: Its Origin and Structure. An examination of Recent Theories. By EDWIN C. BISSALL, D. D. 1 vol., 8vo, $5.00.

This contribution to the discussion of the character and import of the Hebrew Pentateuch is broader in its scope and scholarship than any book that has hitherto appeared on the conservative side of the question, and will be welcomed by all who adhere to the orthodox theory of the inspiration of the Scriptures. Every theory that has been presented by the newer school of criticism has been brought under consideration and treated with candor and learning.

THE BLOOD COVENANT: A Primitive Rite and its Bearings on Scripture. By H. CLAY TRUMBULL, D. D., author of "Kadiab Barnes." 1 vol., 12mo, $2.00.

Dr. Trumbull's book will be a revelation to many readers. He traces this "blood covenant" to the most ancient races, and the great significance it has always held is now thoroughly set forth for the first time. It is in every way a remarkable and original work.

MOVEMENTS OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN BRITAIN DURING THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By JOHN TULLOCH, D. D. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.

Principal Tulloch's book is one of surpassing interest, and one that was clearly needed. It gives an account of the great movements in religious thought by a concise narrative of the work accomplished by the leaders of the chief schools—Cotteridge, Mill, Newman, Maurice, Carlyle, Kingsley, and Robertson. It is a record, also, of important movements in modern English literature. The style is exceptionally readable.

THE LAST MEETING. By BRADNER MATTHEW, 1 vol., 12mo, $1.

A novel which combines successfully the old style of story, full of plot, and the modern, more subtle, analytical methods. The motif is most original and clever, and at the same time the author shows an uncommon literary dexterity. The scene is laid in New York, and the book gives an interesting picture of the semi-literary society of the metropolis.

TURKISTAN. Notes of a Journey in Russian Turkestan, Khokand, Bokhara, and Kuldja. Illustrated. By GEORGE SCUVLEER, Ph.D. 5 vols., 8vo, $5.00.

LOVING TRUST.

BY JENNY WALLIS.

Within his snowy crib, my boy,
Whose music now is hushed,
Lies low with fever in his veins,
His precious face deep flushed.

My heart is faint with sympathy,
As in my hand I bring
The nauseous draught that is prescribed
To soothe his suffering.

He sees the cup, but looks above,
Where smiles his mother's face,
Lighted with love that ne'er deceives,
And trusts, and yields with grace.

I smooth his pillow, kiss his cheek,
Then haste to hide my tears;
For childhood's loving trust again
Has shamed my riper years.

Father, forgive the heart that shrinks
From any cup Thy love
Sees need to prepare my soul
To serve the One above.

O give to me this perfect faith,
And let this joy be mine,
Wholly to trust Thy tender love,
And keep my hand in Thine.

CHAPTER II.

A Brilliant Prospect.

Mr. Shelley was an archaeologist. Mr. Shelley was very happy in Rome. He was always ready to expound his theories to those who wanted to listen, and also to those who did not. With hands see-sawing and eyebrows working in a fashion caught from his foreign friends Mr. Shelley was forever breaking out into monologue. It was very difficult for acquaintances who conceived themselves bound to listen to avoid subjects on which his overflowing fund of information would not sweep them, puzzled and bewildered, quite out of their depth. I have watched those who knew Mr. Shelley nervously arranging their conversation so as to keep off his hobbies as one steals across a sickroom, or comes upstairs when everything will break, after others have gone to bed. But Mr. Shelley had so many electric wires running across his mind, to touch any one of which set him off like the bell at a foreign railway station, that you could not help exciting him to lecture. His own family however, found this convenient. They never listened to him, and were quite sure that he was never aware whether they did so or not. Even Stella, I am afraid, had learned the trick of smiling and nodding without paying attention to what was said. Still, among the subjects which were certain to excite him, Greek artistic archæology held the most prominent place—especially the branch—Terra-cottas. As the three came in from their drive they found Mr. Shelley in a state of the utmost excitement.

"Quite worth the money—dirt cheap—only three thousand lire—the loveliest thing you ever saw; my dear, it is a bargain! I couldn't believe my eyes or ears when the man showed it to me. The two in the British Museum can't hold a candle to this; it is superb! I said to Roccato, who was with me, in English, 'I'll have that, cost what it may!' and then I said to the man: 'Now you know very well that this can't be genuine. I'll give you three hundred lire as it's such a good imitation.' And he asked me four thousand and showed me its pedigree, and Roccato and I can't find a flaw in it, and I agreed to give him three thousand and he took it. Dearest costs dearest, usually, but, bless me! never knew such a thing. After I'd secured it I went all round Rome and turned every one green with envy."

"But what is it Herbert? Three thousand lire is more than a hundred pounds, a hundred and twenty—and what have you been wasting your money on now?"

"Wasting money! Fiddlesticks! what's worth a price is worth a price. Just look at it."

Very delicately, Uncle Herbert lifted a piece of old silk from a wooden box about twelve by eight inches wide and ten deep, very carefully he pulled out single pieces of dried grass or straw therefrom, very slowly he lifted out the valuable contents and laid it on a small dark red velvet cushion.

"Isn't that perfect? Now, Clara, Stella, what do you think? isn't that magnificent? couldn't have believed it," etc., etc.

"That" appeared to the uninitiated eye, a rather cleverly moulded bull's head, in terra-cotta picked out in black. It managed to stand sideways. Stella supposed that, as in the case of a pug-dog, "its beauty was its ugliness," and was wise enough to say nothing.

"What is it?" gasped Mrs. Shelley. "Really, Edward, you are too bad, spending all your money on one thing uglier than another."

There are few things, I have observed, more satisfactory to the artist and to the antiquarian than to be condemned by the "Philistine." Mr. Shelley considered his wife a "Philistine." Mr. Shelley chuckled. "And you, Edward? What do you think of it? Can you tell her what it is?"

"A fine specimen of a rhyton, if it be genuine," Edward replied. "Can you trace it?"

"You don't take me in with your Brummagem antiquities," answered his uncle. "I didn't begin to collect yesterday, my boy!"

"But what is a rhyton?" said Mrs. Shelley.

This unloosed the floodgates. Rhytons, past and present, that is to say, the history of all known specimens and their present locales, with digressions as to the respective merits of the British, the German, and the Greek archaeologists as custodians and as critics, occupied Mr. Shelley for ten minutes. Mrs. Shelley and Stella quietly slipped away to take their things off, after having grasped the fact that a rhyton was an antique drinking-vessel, which, as the former observed, "couldn't stand properly on a table, and cost a sinful amount of money."

Mr. Shelley at length exhausted himself. He was very fond of his antiquities, but his excitable temperament was also accompanied by a kind heart. He was forever making plans for other people. He looked round as he prepared to wrap his treasure up again, and finding that his audience was diminished by two-thirds, stopped short suddenly.

"I wanted to speak to you, Edward, about your future."

"Much obliged to you," replied Edward. "As far as I am concerned, I don't see my way at all clearly."

"My dear fellow, that's just it. I didn't see it. You didn't see it. We all didn't see it. But I see it now."

"I hope that I may then," said Edward, as he smiled sadly, thinking that life was much more simple than he had thought it if his uncle could see his nephew's duty clearly, or rather if his uncle could make it clear to him.

"It's the very nicest thing in all the world. Parish close to us, but not so near that we old folks would bother you young ones—large vicarage house, good living, any amount of work in new town, sprung up on railway; bank, if you want that, yet nice neighborhood, and good society for you and Stella."

"For me and Stella? For Stella? I don't understand," replied Edward. Mr. Shelley chuckled. "You sly dog! You Jesuit, my boy! I thought you'd left that behind you! I'm watching you and Miss Stella, my boy! as if you two weren't just wrapped up in each other. She's a great deal too good for you, Ned; but as she's set her little heart on you. Why, I love her as my own daughter. So while you have been philandering, and you thought I saw nothing and cared for nothing but terra-cotta, I've been making a little plan. Old Smith of Boreton is dying, and I've got the promise of the living, one of the real old worth-while sort, you know—not what they call one, and I call a just-above-gentlemanly-starvation-point-but-you-must-stick-to-it-and-pretend-it's-enough-for-you-sort of business, you know. And I've had a letter from our bishop, and he's a really very good fellow, and has heard all about your version from some one of those learned theological fellows he knows, and so it's all right there. Now, then, sir, what do you think of your old dry-as-dust uncle now? Can't he see what young folks want and give it to 'em, eh?"

"But, but—" said Edward, utterly taken aback.

"But what, sir? Why, I expected you to jump out of your skin with delight. You told me that you wanted to be an English parson. I should have thought that you'd have been glad to see an end to this unsatisfactory neither flesh, fowl, nor good-red-herring sort of business. Smith isn't dead, but you don't want him to die for another six weeks or so. You'll get your law business finished here, and enjoy your holidays, and we'll all get home together to find Smith just dead, and the course clear for you. And Stella can get her clothes in Paris, and you know I'll work upon her as my daughter in every way, you lucky young dog! for it isn't every step-daughter that a man makes his heiress, you know. Ah! you see, I've planned it all. I don't spend all my thoughts and money on rhymos."

Mr. Shelley paused. His nephew had been very grave, his face working with emotion, his hands trembling, his voice falling him as he attempted to speak. He turned livid and staggered against the little round table beside him.

"Take care, Edward, that's a priceless terra-cotta, numbered and photographed by Castellani—an admirable specimen, fifth century, B. C., of course."

Mr. Shelley added this out of habit. He had found that "fifth century" did not mean "B. C. of course," to the general public.

Edward grasped his uncle's hand, and wrung it fervently without speaking.

"My good fellow, I know your gratitude," exclaimed his uncle, drawing in his lips in pain. "But don't squeeze my hand like that. That ring's a veritable antique, found in a tomb at Paestum, but it isn't adapted for shaking hands with a gratified lover."

"But, Stella—"

"You needn't be afraid. Still, it is the proper thing, of course. Blessings on her sweet face, she put me up to this. Not that she knew it, though. For, says I myself when I saw you together this winter, 'Here's my brother's son. I never spoke to poor Alfred after he went over to Rome. Well, his son's come back to us, and a nice young fellow he is, who's a conscience of his own. And here's my little girl, whom we've had such trouble to rear, she's been as delicate as an early lamb till the last two years. The doctors all say she will always be strong now with love and care, so far as they see; but I'm getting older than I was, now, and I should like to leave her with a man who'd give her both. And so, it wasn't for your sake, my good fellow, that I had you with us and let you see so much of Stella. But I didn't tell either of you. For, as sure as you want young people to take a fancy to each other, they won't. But it's all right now. And there's the wife you want and the life you want, all ready for you. Now, don't squeeze my hand again! It's all right—nothing to thank me for. Settle with Stella as soon as you like."

"I wish you'd give me that ring, Uncle Herbert."

"Why? It wouldn't do for her."

"No; I'd throw it away. I can't believe in my own happiness."

And yet, a few seconds before he had told himself that the life before him, the life he had begun to dream of, the life that would make Stella happy was not for him. But were not "councils of perfection" part of the dead past he had left behind him? "Dearest costs dearest!" Did the love for Stella clash with the work to which he had been distinctly called? As he left the Romish branch of the Church had he not vowed to himself that he would never relax his zeal for true Catholicism? Coast-guard work is important, is a duty, but if the orders had been given that he should sail with the advanced squadron?

The motto of the order with which he had for so long been in sympathy—though as priest unconnected with it—flashed through his mind. A. M. D. G., ad majorem Dei gloriam.

He shook off the thought, which had pressed upon him in the Coliseum, and, for a little time, took up to the full his sweet happiness. And yet, sometimes I think, during the next sunny fortnight, full of love and pleasure, Edward Shelley knew at times something of the pathos of that text: "He went away very sorrowful for he had great possessions."

CHAPTER III.

Lurid Light.

It seemed a pity to choose such a lovely day to go to the Catacombs. Spring was touching the hitherto monotonous Campagna with beauty.

Cæsar's Palace was glorious with golden wall-flowers growing over the ancient stones. Giant wild mignonette bloomed beside fennel and anemones, and the tiny grape hyacinths, little compact, matter-of-fact flowers as they looked, peered up among the grass and refused to be stirred by any poetical breezes, such as made the more delicate vegetation seem to dance with delight. Four or five carriage-loads—a motley crew, indeed, had one been gifted with clairvoyance, or even with keen observation, rolled along the dusty way leading to the Catacombs of St. Calixtus. Stella Grey had no wish to join such a party; but it is the drawback of foreign life that, if you go with people to one place which you wish to go to, you must go with them where they wish to go afterward. The people that are very amusing for a day at Tivoli are not those whom one likes as companions in seeing any place of which thoughtful association is the chief charm.

However Edward and Stella, at Mrs. Shelley's request, finding that "we couldn't all get out of it, you know," had joined this very modern party. By some chance Edward and Stella were in different carriages, and Stella found herself not with her own chaperon, but with a woman who, she afterward saw, was noted for her unfortunate habit of saying the wrong thing.

Miss Toblett's ill-luck followed her. There were two things in the carriage: First, an inane young man who had been sent out to Rome with a "bearleader" to see it, and dutifully "did" everything—his whole attention fixed on Murray when in a picture-gallery, and his intellect seeming to be devoted to recovering from that effort during the rest of the day. Then, an older man, Dr. Lorton, an abbot, whom every one just then expected to be called higher on account of his piety and learning and a vacancy among the cardinals, completed this quartette. In Rome "Catholics" and "Protestants," "verts" and "heretics," the "devout" and the "liberal" mix and jostle each other with all good temper. It is only the ambassadors to the Quirinale and the Vatican who "never mix"—as well as the elders of the "black" and "white" parties. The younger people and the strangers, while constantly reminded, and asked in the matter-of-fact way, as one says: "Tea or coffee?" of what "religion" they are? find themselves in the most heterogeneous company. A little tact is required.

And Miss Toblett, with the inane youth and the learned abbot before her, and the girl engaged to a ci-devant Romish priest beside her, of course blundered on the very subject that she had much better have left untouched in company with persons whom she did not know at all.

But she was very anxious to make the most of Dr. Lorton, and like all persons with little judgment and no tact, ignored the fact that clever men object to handle burning questions, not to speak of sacred subjects, in mixed company, or on frivolous occasions and before a questioner who they can "see with half an eye," talks for the sake of talking, and makes as many blunders from conceit as from ignorance.

So it was not till Dr. Lorton had been bullied and baited, and interrupted and worried by the "Protestant" lady of uncertain age and more uncertain knowledge of what she was talking about, that he—forgetting, if he knew of, Stella's engagement—tried to close the question under discussion by the words: "Well, all I can say is this, that when I see a priest who leaves our Communion without marrying directly afterwards, I shall begin to believe in your reformers. Talking of reform, Miss Grey," he went on lightly, without noticing her quick start and sudden thought of dismay: "You know Rome isn't what it was. Men aren't made cardinals for keeping a good table now. I was talking the other day to a distinguished stranger who has been here on and off these fifty years. He told me an amusing story. Scene: Cardinal's entertainment, everything on the good old scale, regardless of expense. Magnificent sturgeon borne on its dish on the shoulders of six men brought in with flourish of trumpets. Foremost servant stumbles. Sturgeon thrown to the ground. Cardinal looks round. Steward making a great fuss. 'Bring another,' he commands with a princely wave of his ringed hand. Other door thrown open. Another flourish of trumpets. Enter, amidst general admiration at the cardinal's resources and wealth, another sturgeon, larger than the first, carried in the same manner."

The narrative fell flat. Stella tried to smile, but was pre-occupied by her suddenly aroused reflections; the inane youth did not see the point of the story; and Miss Toblett would not take a hint. She thought this digression was to evade her cogent reasoning. So she began:—"The Vatican decrees—"

Dr. Lorton could stand this no longer: "Miss Toblett, I am very sorry to seem rude, but there are Vatican decrees and there are laws of society, and I think the latter are the most important on a sight-seeing expedition. We elders should remember that young people like to hear interesting conversation." The double-barrelled shot told, by which Dr. Lorton conveyed his opinion that Miss Toblett was an elderly bore, instead of merely having the "advantage of a few more years of training than an unformed girl." Miss Toblett at length subsided. All four were very glad when the Catacomb gates were reached, and they passed into the field-like garden, where they met the others, and there was some chance of a less unfortunate mixture of jarring elements. But I never yet saw the being, male or female, upon whom Miss Toblett did not jar.

The guide came out of his house and bestowed on each of the members of the party string-like tapers,—the inane youth woke up then and produced a carriage lamp which he had got out while the others were waiting. Without any wish to be unseizable, Stella felt that really in her present mood she could not stand these people around her, and, when another party came up, and the guide proposed to take all through together, and the second party was a veritable band of utter "vulgarians"—then her wish to go down quite left her.

Edward came to her. "We'll linger a little behind. I can tell you as much as the guide will, and Dr. Lorton will attract the attention of our party," he said, while giggles and shrieks came from the front, and even then one party of better-bred people were laughing at tapers guttering over clothes, and at the suggestion of the insane youth that the Catacombs were "exactly like an empty wine cellar."

"There is no danger of being lost, is there, Edward?" asked Stella, as she descended the steep stairs together into the chilly atmosphere.

"Plenty, but you needn't be afraid. We are going on the second story as you may say—there are four, you know. Here the path is so trodden that I don't think that we can miss our way. There are now about forty people in front of us, one before the other. We shan't be missed if we linger judiciously, and I think those voices will be a sufficient guide. You aren't afraid?"

"With you? afraid?" said Stella, simply.

For a little time they followed the others down the swept and garnished passages. In this tourist-trodden path there seemed to be much monotony. And Stella's mind was troubled. She was very quick to see and very conscientious in doing the right. Somehow without Edward telling her of his scruples, except by hints which he did not mean her to understand, but which were a small relief to himself, Stella had very nearly grasped the idea of the work Edward thought he was called to do. Half flickeringly, half undefinedly, with shoots of keen pain, which seemed half physical, half mental, she began to see in what way his love for her might be opposed to their favorite motto. She did not quite define it, she only felt it, she felt the "first low flap of the tempest's wing." Nearer and nearer came this shadowing presence—it was "coming, coming, direct, straight," to her and to the man she loved. Dr. Lorton's words, quite accidentally spoken, not addressed to her, made it more definite; in a moment the crisis would be upon them.

Sometimes it seems as if brilliant days of happiness are sent to men and women just to give them strength for coming trouble. How many have found that, and how many have suddenly known just before hand that trouble was coming, though where it was to come from they knew not! There is superstitious looking out for omens, and there is want of sensibility to what may be divine warning. Many have been thankful for the nervous presentiment which puts them on their guard.

And so Stella, feeling intensely nervous, and faintly seeing the struggle before them gradually defining itself, clung to Edward in the half-lit passages with a new terror which grew greater and greater every moment.

The galleries are often very narrow. If two could walk abreast, it was with the greatest difficulty sometimes, and Stella, in her vague yet pressing fear, drew very close to Edward, and he held her trembling hand within his arm, and, taking her taper, let one light serve for both. It was very strange, just those two in the long passages, with the memories of by-gone days of worship and of martyrdom, troubled by the presentiment which afterward both acknowledged that they had felt upon them, and always just out of sight the people, just within hearing the laughter and conversation of the gayer sight-seers.

Suddenly and strangely—yet they both felt it was coming, or that something was coming—from a cross-way another light flickered across their path, and in the intersection of the feeble, smoky rays an old man in the dress of a priest of the Dominican order stood facing them. He barred their way, lifting his hand to stop them from proceeding.

Stella, in her strange mood, felt as if in a dream. She had stepped back into mediæval times. This was not modern Roman life. This was a scene from a romance. Her head was aching, her heart was beating, her mind seemed strangely sensitive to impression, and yet all the time, through shoots of pain and fear, she seemed to herself to be playing a part, living in the life of somebody else.

Edward had been trying to interest her. He suddenly stopped short, facing the Dominican priest, and a look of pleasure came into his face before, in a moment, Stella saw it change. It was an accidental meeting with one who had been an old friend of his boyhood, and from whom he was separated by an act which he knew to be right for himself, but of which, as now, the consequences seemed to be very hard.

For in a minute it became clear that the old priest knew Edward, and recognized the promising young pupil of the English Oratory, who had been for some time in Rome before, and now came back with changed "belief," if, as the old man could not know, with yet deeper earnestness and devotion in his soul.

The priest was French, and knew little English. However, both Stella and Edward understood his burning, rapid words of scorn and rebuke which, without preface, were directed at them both. Yes, at both. Coarse, cruel words—words which Edward would have undergone anything to prevent Stella even hearing—words which were meant to cut and lash her as him—words which there were no means of stopping; for Edward, least of all men on earth, and under the circumstances, could have used physical force to the old man, the priest, and the distinguished Dominican confessor. There was nothing to be done. Nothing! With Stella clinging to him half sobbing from terror and anger, as if she had indeed been a culprit who deserved the monk's strictures; with those accusations ringing in his ears of having cast off the holiest vows in order to marry, Edward, with flashing eyes and passionate gesture, could do nothing but herd the flood of stern rebuke which did not seem to touch him in his sensation of angry despair at the insults heaped upon Stella. It flashed across him that he had been guilty of bad taste in letting his engagement be even tacitly announced at Rome, though he, as an Englishman, were a comparative stranger there. But in the Catacombs how could he have expected to have met the man who knew about his secession, and had jumped at Stella as the cause. More words, coarse words, more cruel words going on—he tried to interrupt, it was of no use. A few bones lay on a rock shelf close by, and just on one side Edward saw a skull protruding. He counted every bone in it in agony, while he tried to draw Stella closer to him, and to put his free hand over her ear as if to show her how she might shut out that torrent of abuse. Would nothing stop it? Why did not somebody miss them, and come back to see what had delayed two of the party? There was not a sound now but the rapid angry French of the old priest, who had seized what he considered had been a divinely sent opportunity to deliver a rebuke which he had been intending to give whenever he might meet Edward Shelley. On seeing the two together he had transferred his anger to Stella. He really was in earnest. He really was cut to the soul by the apostasy of Edward. And while blaming them, he had no idea how unfit was his language to be heard by any woman, least of all by such a girl as Stella. But her purity saved her from understanding all that Edward feared that she did. Yet as another might not have at once done, for Stella had read and thought—she recognized, through her shame and personal disgust, that the priest was laying a charge to Edward which was horrible in the extreme.

The priest thought that Edward had left the Romish Communion, not for God's glory, but for woman's love.

Suddenly strength seemed to be given her, and she raised herself up. She could, she would clear Edward's name from this stain. She would show that his motives had been pure.

"You mistake, mon père," she said in French in a tone which seemed that of a grave, dignified woman, no longer the sometimes grave and sometimes playful, but always clinging girl. "You mistake our relations, as much else."

The priest stopped.

"This, my cousin, had renounced connection with you months before he ever thought that I or any other woman would be anything to him. He left it——" Stella stopped. Angry as she was, she would not repay railing with railing. "He left it for the pure love of God and of His Church."

"That seems probable," replied the priest, ironically. "And I know little of your English customs. It is probable, also, that you would be here alone with your—cousin, if you were not married or fiancés. Do not lie, my daughter. You add sin to sin."

"I do not lie," replied Stella, proudly. "We were fiancés, but, since it is necessary——" She paused for a moment, and the damp, clammy air seemed to surround her and choke her and the passage in the rocks to grow narrower and narrower. "Since so it must be, for the honor of him whom I love, and for the greater glory of God, I——"

"Stella!" cried Edward, in anguish, "it is not necessary. I have thought of it."

She turned a white, still face to him.

"I am saying nothing rash. I, too, have thought. For the present, father, be our witness that we two give up our happiness. I am taking my share in this, the last of the many sacrifices which Edward has made."

"And as you witness that," added Edward, suddenly catching her spirit, "remember this also: we make our sacrifice of present happiness, not for my good name, but for the work to which I have been called. You know what it is! You know why you are so bitter against me! And you know, too, what you have done to your own cause in turning what was my weakness into my strength. Come, Stella!"

The priest let them pass, then he turned to go.

The two former friends were now bitter foes. The Dominican would never forgive Edward. Edward would find it hard to forgive the Dominican. And so they parted in angry silence.

(To be continued.)

BY SHAKESPEARE WOOD.

"Thick as autumnal leaves in Vallombrosa"—they are falling now from the beech and the chestnut, and the minute pine leaves showering down with every sigh of the wind, until the ground is covered with a velvet carpet, and even the interstices of the paved carriage way filled with them. There is no fairer, healthier, more peaceful retreat from the summer heats of Florence than this "shady valley," as the name signifies, lying in the Tuscan Apennines, and chosen some eight hundred years ago for the cradle of a renowned branch of the Benedictine order, by the founder, John Gualberto, whose romantic history certainly furnished with one dramatic episode, the author of the most remarkable philosophical novel of our day, "John Inglesant." I am writing from the Hotel Croce di Savoia, right opposite the fine old monastery. This house was once the foresteria, or lodging for lay strangers, built by the hospitable monks, who, Ariosto says, were "courteous to whoever came here." The arms of the Vallombrosa Abbey are on the corner of the house front carved in dark grey stone: "from the left of the shield an arm in a monastic sleeve issues, holding a pastoral crozier with two lions' heads." Perhaps John Milton lodged in this very house. Strange to say, no record of his visit was ever found in the abbey archives; although "visitors' books" were invariably kept in the libraries of monasteries all throughout Italy. Well! the foresteria of Vallombrosa is now an hotel, and the proprietor, Signor Giovanni Bartolucci, deserves every praise for his efforts to make it comfortable to the numbers of visitors who throng thither from June until October, for rest and coolness, and recovery from sickness.

From the station of Pontassieve, the first south of Florence on the Arezzo-Rome line, it is a slow three hours' drive up the wooded mountains, across deep glens divided by tumbling streams, through solitary pine-woods, to this enchanted valley, with its fresh meadows encircled with trees, embroidered in spring with flowers and even now blushing with the autumn crocus; while up the hills, among the young pine plantations the ground is starred with the large silver thistle, which is part of everyone's busy idleness at Vallombrosa to gather and dry in the sun at the open windows; after which process the flower is preserved for years.

The abbey church is a very fine building. A few monks are left to take care of it. There is daily mass at 7 A.M., and on Sundays high mass at 9 A.M. The twenty or thirty pupils of the Istituto Forestale, a kind of land-surveying school now established in the monastery, attend the Sunday mass; some peasants and work-people, and Italian sojourners at the hotel form the rest of the scanty congregation. The Istituto Forestale is small and shrunken for its locality. Three tables in the fine old refectory and a few shelves in the spacious library, half filled with modern books and pamphlets, scantily replace the industrious Benedictines, who numbered in very modern times the distinguished botanist, Don Buono Faggi, and Henry Hugford, the restorer of the art of scagliola, and others. One of the present sojourners at Vallombrosa, having occasion for some meteorological information, was referred by the professor in the library to one of the monks in the court of the church who kept the observatory. There was not even a thermometer in the secularized monastery.

High up above the abbey, on a vast rock projecting from the fir-clothed mountain, stands an ancient hermitage called the Paradisino (little Paradise). It is now the accusante of the hotel, and a more delightful nook for summer rest and study cannot be imagined. From the terrace front the whole Valdarno can be seen as far as Florence. The echoes from the outer world scarce reach this spot. Only a chance shot in the woods, or the wood-cutter's axe at rare intervals, or a distant owl hooting across the glen. Close by is the mountain torrent of the Acqua Bella, leaping down its rugged led of primeval stones. The perfume of the pines scents the air at midday, breathing balm. How the monks of the West knew how to choose the sites of their retreats!

Giovanni Gualberto, who founded the Order of Vallombrosa in this place, A.D. 1023, seven years after he had retired from the world for the cloister, was the son of a rich and powerful Florentine knight, Gualberto di Bis-domini di Petrojo in Val di Pesa. This family, descended from that of the Roman Catiine, of which, fleeing from Rome after the discovery of the famous conspiracy, two cousins settled respectively in Umbria and Florence, taking the surname of Bis-domini (twice-lords), from their masterful and proud characters. The saints' mother was Camilla of the ducal Tuscan house, and grand-daughter of Ugo, King of Italy.

Gualberto and Camilla had two sons, Ugo and Giovanni. Ugo having been murdered by one of their relations, Gualberto, the father, being prevented by his great age from revenging his death with his own hands, solemnly and under his curse committed the execution of feudal vengeance to his only surviving son, Giovanni Gualberto. This young man, although by nature averse to shedding blood, felt himself obliged by filial obedience and knightly honor to accept the mandate. Therefore he armed himself and accompanied by his esquires, rode for many days in search of the murderer. At last finding him, as it happened, on a Good Friday, in a mountain pass so narrow and steep that the guilty man had no chance of escape, Giovanni drew his sword to slay the destroyer of his only brother. But the murderer fell on his knees, and stretching out his arms like the cross, besought his adversary to spare his life for the love of Jesus Christ crucified and dead for them both on that day. Giovanni struck with emotion at such a remembrance, sheathed his sword, forgave his enemy and embracing him, said: "I cannot refuse what you ask me in the name of Jesus Christ. I grant you not only your life, but I will be your friend. Pray God to forgive my sins."

But Giovanni returned no more to his father's house. He betook himself to the next church he came to on his way, San Miniato al Monte. There, prostrate before the crucifix he wept and repented of his evil purpose, and returned thanks that he had been saved from shedding human blood. Then, resolving to abandon the world and all its fallacious grandeur and pleasures, and to devote himself wholly to the service of God, he threw himself at the feet of the Abbot of San Miniato and prayed to be admitted to the order which was that of Cluny. Much and fierce was the opposition of his father and friends to his purpose; but he at last assumed the monastic habit, and distinguished himself by his piety and humility. At the death of the abbot, the monks elected Giovanni to that dignity, but he steadfastly refused it, and made the monks choose another head. Soon after, longing for solitude and a more perfect life, he and another religious went to Camaldoli, where they sojourned long. Here they had the advantage of the spiritual counsels of San Romaldo, patriarch of the Camaldolesi; and finally Giovanni proceeded to Vallombrosa, to found a hermitage under the first rule of St. Benedict. He was soon joined by others from the world, and from monasteries, where relaxed rule made the "perfect life" almost as difficult as in the world itself with its turmoils. The Abbey of Vallombrosa soon grew famous for the sanctity of its inmates, and the lords of the surrounding lands bestowed them upon the monks to reclaim and to cultivate. I do not find the extensive donations of landed property to the Church by the great feudal barons so very magnificent a generosity, for the monastic foundations were principally in desert places, or impenetrable forests, which, with patient intelligent labor, all the branches of the Monks of the West made to "blossom like the rose."

Giovanni Gualberto founded three monasteries in the Apennines, reformed four near Florence, Arezzo, Siena, and Pistoja, and had three monasteries given to him in other parts of Tuscany. The houses he founded were built according to the rule of poverty, and had nothing superfluous. One day, having gone to visit that of Moscheto, he found the building too spacious and commodious, and calling the abbot, Rodolfo, he said, smiling: "You have built a palace for your pleasure, and you have spent sums upon it which would have served to relieve the needs of many poor." Then turning to a little stream flowing by, he said: "Almighty God, let this stream quickly avenge me of this enormous building." Soon after he left tempests swelled the stream, which speedily became a torrent, carrying along with it huge stones and uprooting trees, so that the new monastery was quite destroyed. The abbot, in a fright, thought of choosing another site, but the saint dissuaded him, assuring him the like would never happen again. Another time, having heard that a nobleman had been accepted in one of his monasteries, who had bestowed all his fortune upon it, to the prejudice of his heirs, Giovanni Gualberto hastened thither, asked for the act of donation, which he tore into fragments, and prayed God to punish this monastery. Scarcely had he left when it took fire, and was more than half burned, the saint being so full of holy indignation that he never even turned to look at it. One of the rules of the order being abstinence from animal food, on an occasion of great penury, when only three loaves remained in his monastery, Giovanni Gualberto caused a sheep to be killed and cooked; but his monks refused to eat flesh, contenting themselves with each a mouthful of bread. Next day a train of oxen arrived at the monastery, laden with sacks of corn and flour. Other interesting traditions tell of more instances of patient trust for "daily bread" in like manner rewarded.

Giovanni Gualberto put those who desired to join his order to a rude proof. Before admission to the noviciate at Vallombrosa, each candidate had to act as swine-herd for some days, and clean the pig-styes daily with his own hands. Those who persevered entered the noviciate under the strict rule of St. Benedict, and at the end of the year had to lie prostrate for three days, in continual silence, meditating upon the Passion of Christ; after which they took the vows for life. Our saint's example made a great reformation in the lives of the regular clergy, and he stoutly opposed the sin of simony, so common then in the Church. Pietro da Pavia, Bishop of Florence, having purchased his mitre for six thousand crowns, all the Vallombrosan monks in the diocese refused to acknowledge him for bishop. More than this, they stirred up many of the people and clergy against him. The bishop, to frighten the insurgents, ordered the monks who had protested against him to be executed. Having heard that Giovanni Gualberto was at the monastery of S. Salvo, he sent his emissaries there. The saint had left the preceding day, but, rushing into the church where the monks were reciting Nocturns, they cut and wounded them, overturned the altars, took whatever they could find, and set fire to the monastery. Such violence only rendered the bishop more odious, and increased the party who sided with the monks. They were regarded as martyrs, and people hastened to S. Salvo bearing necessities for them. Giovanni Gualberto came and congratulated the abbot for their sufferings in the cause of justice. He then, with some of the monks, went to Rome to Pope Alexander II., and at the Lateran Council of 1063, they accused the Bishop of Florence of simony and heresy, offering to prove the charge by undergoing the trial by fire. Nevertheless the pope would neither depose the bishop nor grant the monks the fiery ordeal. One hundred bishops sided with the Florentine, but the great Archbishop Hildebrand, afterward Gregory VII., took part with the Vallombrosan monks.

The wicked Bishop of Florence, seeing that Rome had not condemned him, increased in pride and violence. Protected also by Godfrey the Hunchback, Duke of Florence, he persecuted all the clergy, secular as well as regular, who refused to acknowledge him. Pope Alexander II. went to Florence, and saw the wood prepared for the ordeal by fire, into which the monks were ready to throw themselves to prove the simony of the bishop, but he refused to examine into the controversy. The disorder increased, however, until the clergy and people, weary of bearing such anarchy, assembled, and requested the bishop to clear himself of the accusation against him. His own partisans among the clergy offered to bear the ordeal for him if he was innocent, and to accord with the monks in order to effect it. The bishop refused, and obtained an order from the civil authority to imprison all who refused to acknowledge him, to confiscate the property of those who escaped, and that the recusant clergy, who had taken refuge in the suburban church of San Pietro, should be driven from Florence. In execution of this order, on the first Saturday in Lent, 1067, the clergy being assembled in the said church to recite the divine offices, they were expelled without regard to the sanctity of the place. The people gathered in crowds, the women especially lamenting loudly and invoking St. Peter against the new Simon Magus. The men even threatened to set fire to the city. The bishop's clergy, in great alarm, closed all the churches. They then assembled together, and sent to entreat the monks to let them know the truth, promising to follow it. First, however, they had asked the bishop, if he was innocent, to join with them in inviting the monks to the ordeal. But he remained obstinate in refusing. The clergy and people then hastened to the monastery of Settimo—in number, about 8,000 persons, men, women and children—summoning the monks to go through the ordeal by fire, in proof of what they asserted against the bishop. The people then heaped up two great piles of wood about five feet high, with a narrow path between them on which they spread dry pieces of wood. Amid psalms and litanies, the abbot chose the monk Pietro, afterward called Igneo, (of fire,) to undergo the ordeal. He first celebrated Mass, every one of his brethren in tears and sobs the while. At the Agnus Dei, four monks went to light the fire; one carrying the crucifix, another the holy water, a third two lighted wax torches, and the fourth the thurible with the incense. At sight of them the people cried Kyrie Eleison with lamenting tones, prayed Christ to defend His own cause, and the women invoked the Blessed Virgin to intercede with her Son. Peter, having ended the Mass, came carrying a cross and singing the litany with the other monks, full of confidence in God. One of the abbots present then read aloud a declaration in which they called God to witness that they undertook the ordeal for the salvation of souls, endangered by the abominable sin of simony. Peter, praying with a loud voice that if the Bishop of Florence had bought the see with money, Christ would save him from the flames as He had saved the children in the Fiery Furnace, boldly entered the path of red-hot coals between the now flaming piles. His eyes fixed on the cross which he held in his hands, he walked slowly through the fire, disappearing for some moments until he issued forth unhurt at the other side.

The enthusiasm of the people was indescribable, and they nearly crushed him to death in trying to tear or cut off morsels of his clothes, or kiss his feet, or the hem of his robe.

When Pope Alexander II. heard this, he gave ear to the entreaties of the people of Florence, and deposed the bishop, who submitted, repented, joined the Vallombrosan order in this very monastery of Settimo, and devoted his property to the hospital of the place.

Giovanni Gualberto lived until past eighty years of age. He died at one of his foundations, Passignano, and was mourned by all Tuscany. His remains were brought to his beloved Vallombrosa, and he was canonized by Pope Celestine III. in 1193.

Vallombrosa preserved a good report even in after ages of monastic corruption. The monastery was sacked by the French in 1810, and the inmates dispersed. They were reinstated again in 1819, to be again expelled in 1860. If truth may be told, liberal Tuscans are regretting the monks, and bitterly complaining of the reckless way the present Italian government is selling the magnificent forests, which are doomed to the axe.

Vallombrosa claims Gregory VII. as a monk of their order, of whom Napoleon I. said: "If I were not Napoleon, I should like to be Gregory VII." This great pope has been generally called a monk of Cluny, but Giovanni Gualberto, to whom he was kin, was also first a monk of Cluny before he sought the more "perfect life" in this shady and peaceful valley.

THE REV. MR. BLACKMAN OF THE WEST INDIES PREACHES A TEMPERANCE SERMON ON BOARD THE STEAMER.

BY J. D.

My fellow-passengers, I 'tank our kind captain for axin' me to 'dress a few words to you, for dis seem to be just de place to 'peak on de 'ings I hab been t'inkin' about: an' I t'ink when a minister is sowin' de seed he should t'ink a little 'bout how de seed will fit de soil him is sowin' it 'pon. No use to plant coffee in de sand; you must plant it up in de mountain. No use to plant sweet potatoes up in de mountain, 'cause dey b'longs to de sand. An' so, my brederin, I tek my sermon out ob de whale, an' we will see if we can get any'ting out ob him, besides Jonah. Well, my brederin, we all know dat de whale swallow Jonah. An' I want you to tek 'pecial notice ob dat word "swallow," for it is de nall 'pon which my discourse is to hang himself 'pon. Well, my brederin, we hab a great feelin' for Jonah. Fust, dey wake him up out ob him sleep, an' den t'row him into de sea, an' den a great fish swallow him up. An' we t'ink ob him lock up in dat dark jail, when him did not 'leak nor cuss nor kark, an' we wonder how him lib widout a breath ob air for t'ree days, an' all our feelin' go out 'pon Jonah, an' we neber 'member to sorry for dat poor whale, wid dat big live load in him 'tomach. But before I get t'rou, my brederin, I will show you dat neider Jonah nor de whale was wantin' de sympat'y. I t'ink t'ings is neber so bad when we know de ins an' outs ob dem, as when dey lay dere bare ob dere meanin's. Now, my comrades, dat whale was prepare to entertain Jonah for dat t'ree days an' t'ree nights. Jonah write it wid him own hand in de book dat is call after himself. Furdernore, he say, "De Lord prepare de whale." Well, now, my brederin, when we prepare to receive a guest, we get him t'ings dat will mek him comfortable: an' do you t'ink dat de Lord pre-pure dat whalin' ship for Jonah widout de comforts ob life, not only for Jonah, but for de whale? Yes, my comrades, I know Jonah had plenty ob room in dat ship, for he tell us dat he prayed; an' we know he was a Jew, an' we know a Jew always 'tand up to pray; an' den we know dat he could see out, for he say, "Aldo I am cast out ob sight, yet can I look towards de holy temple." So I say, my comrades, just trust de Lord. Even when de great whales ob trouble swallow you up, 'member He hab prepared de trouble, an' you will come out, like Jonah, a better man, if you only pray. Now, as I look 'pon de sailors dat is settin' down here before me, it bring to my mind de nail dat I is hangin' my discourse 'pon, which is de word "swallow," an' I want to mek you know dat dis fish, weder he was a whale, or weder he was a alligator, or weder he was a great leviathan himself, couldn't hab swallow Jonah an' 'ib. Jonah would hab choke him, an' dey both would hab gone to de bottom ob de sea, an' you will come out, like Jonah, an' dey both would hab gone to de bottom ob de sea, an' 'taird dere to dis day. So you see it tek a 'pecial miracle to prepare de fish so dat both he an' Jonah could lib, for you see, my brederin, de Lord wanted to save Jonah; but yet you must not mek a mistake and t'ink, because de whale was prepare to tek somethin' in him 'tomach dat hab no business dere, an' get no hurt from it, dat you an' me can put in all de grog we put in our 'tomach widout it hurtin' us. I tell you, if any one say so, dey is tellin' a big lie, for de Lord will never prepare a man's 'tomach for him to get drunk. De Lord will go out ob Him way to mek a miracle to save a man, but Him neber go out ob Him way to mek a miracle to dam' a man.

I tell you, my comrades, St. Paul know what he was bout when him put a limit to de quantity ob wine dat our 'tomach was prepared for. If we was to pay more 'tention to dat word "little," we would neber mek boasts ob ourselves, by ober drinkin' or ober eatin', for de Lord hab write de word moderation pon our mounts an' troats, as well as pon our tongues, an if we would only write it pon ebery plate an' glass we eat an drink out ob, de hospitals and jails would hab 'pare rooms, an' de doctors would hab time for de healin ob dere own souls, an' de lawyers would hab Sunday to plead dere own cause wid de Judge ob all de eart. De "roarin' lion" would be beginn de mouse to let him out ob de net, an' de minister ob de gospel would hab to use caution when dey is giben out dat 'trong doctrine ob eberlasting punishment, an' gibe de Lord de credit ob usin de moderation in de next world, dat he hab giben to us to use in "all tings" here. An I beg you my sailor comrades an all dat bear me dis day, when you hab to tek somethin' 'tronger dan coffee for yore "tomach sake," 'member de word "little" hab to go 'long side ob it—and hab caution write pon de bottle just de same as you hab it write pon de laudneum bottle, for dey are both pisin, if dey are not swallow wid moderation. An my comrades if you will use dis prescription you will never be kep out ob de Kingdom ob Heaben, for de want ob neber habin any senses left to find you soul wid. I hab write moderation pon de plate I eat out ob, an pon de glass I drink out ob, an pon de pipe I smoke out ob, an I find dey all do me good; an I trust dat dis sermon which is prepar' wid "caution" an "moderation" will be swallow by you.

An I hope dat your hearts bein "prepared" by de Lord will find de prayers dat are wrapped up in et, will act as a rudder to 'teer you 'trait to Canaans shore. An now I will say "so be et," which in de original translation mean, Amen.

THE DYING PRIEST.

I am failing very fast, and my friends do not know how fast. Their love will not let them see it, but it is so, for all that, for all their undeserved love. My book lies open, and I hardly read it. All I can do is to think and pray. I am glad to be alone. I look up at my books, old companions, faithful friends. I shall not see them much longer. Perhaps my friends will carry me from my study, as they did Leigh Richmond, to my dying bed.

I wish I had used my books better. How ignorant I am! I know almost nothing. Well, I need know nothing now but Jesus Christ and Him crucified. O Si Jesus crucifixus in cor nostrum veniret quam cito et sufficienter docti essemus.

My books! There are very few among them but the writers have long ago gone before me. They are at rest. I entered into their labors. Would I had labored as they did. I am afraid that much of my activity was self-seeking. I followed my own fancies, and where I found no pleasure I did nothing. O lost hours, days, years, which never can return! Lord have mercy on me. I used to dislike being disturbed when I was reading. It should have been a pleasure to me, as to Mary, "The Master is come and calleth for thee."

I have had many little troubles and many little triumphs which I thought over in this room. Little, indeed! How little do they seem now! Thank God, I have had many consolations here, and many an answer to prayer. I have gained more wisdom when kneeling there than reading here, little as I did gain; but that was my fault.

From this window I see the churchyard where I have laid so many parishioners, and where others will soon lay me. What a history there is in each grave, in each lane and cottage of my parish; a history which greatly concerns the dead and myself. We shall have both to give an account, I, alas! a double account, one of my people, and one of myself. O blessed Jesus, they were Thy people, Thy sheep, for whom Thou didst shed Thy precious blood.

And there stands the old church amongst the trees, where my predecessors served in long succession. I thought too little of them. Soon I shall be forgotten as they are, "the place thereof shall know me no more." What does the "Imitatio" say? "In vita sua aliquid esse videbantur, et modo de illis tacetur."

That church reminds me of much presumption and neglect. O that I had been more reverent, more recollected. What a blessing I have enjoyed not only in being kept in the Communion of the Holy Catholic Church, but by serving in her ministry! What an honor, what a responsibility it was to speak in God's name, and to offer the holy sacrifice at His altar! And who was I that any should open their hearts to me, and that I, who needed pardon so greatly, should absolve the true penitent? I was long a teacher, now I am a learner in the school of suffering, weakness and helplessness. I am called upon to put my own advice into practice, and to show resignation and patience. O Lord, help me, I can do nothing alone. I have told others how to die. Did I know how myself? Will the grounds of faith and hope which I suggested to others suffice me in my last struggle? I shall soon prove this. "In the hour of death, good Lord deliver me." Me also, even me.

Alas! it was so easy to stand outside a man, and tell him what to do and say. I wish I had known myself more and my flock more. I was impatient with the dull and ignorant and wayward, although God was not impatient with me, but waited for me year after year. I was wanting in sympathy, and what is that but want of love? Very different would have been the effect of my sermons, reproofs, consolations, advice, if I had been full of sympathy, if it had been heart to heart. I am afraid my people love me more than I loved them, and much more than I deserve. Ah! they do not know me, and God does!

Why were my visits and sermons unspiritual? Would not God have made me spiritual if I had prayed earnestly? He made St. Paul sufficient, and he would have made me sufficient for my humble cure. What can I do now? I will send for A. and B. to-morrow—if I am spared—or, at any rate, send a loving message. It might do D. good to take leave of his poor old pastor.

I have witnessed a wonderful revival, and have enjoyed great privileges. The Church is hardly the same Church as she was, and will, I trust, advance still more when I am gone. I wonder what changes my successor will make. I have made many changes myself, and not all of them wise or wisely brought in. Perhaps he will make greater and better, and will carry them out with more prudence, patience, and benefit. I daresay I have fallen behind, as my predecessors seemed to me to have done. Most likely, therefore, things ought not to stand as they are. I thought they should not stand as they were when I came here.

I used to live by a tidal river, and at flood-tide the stream ran strong up in the middle and ebbed along the banks; then at the ebb all this was reversed. Just so my power and usefulness are all flowing away, and only the weaker and weaker remains of my work are to be seen here and there. It is time for a new flood-tide, for new zeal and vigor to show themselves in the parish.

O Good Shepherd, send, I beseech Thee, a worthier pastor to tend Thy poor sheep, one wiser and better in all ways than me, the poor sinner. May he never fall into my mistakes and neglects. May he make amends for my many and grievous deficiencies.

"O to me grant the meaneat place,
There under the feet;
Under the feet of Thine elect."

I wish I had made more allowance for the faults of my dear people. What should I have done if I had been in their place, and exposed to their temptations? I am glad that I was not promoted, I have been very happy dwelling among my people. What could such an one as I do with preferment? If I have been such a failure here, what should I not have been in a larger sphere, with greater difficulties and responsibilities? If St. Ansbrose died penitentially, stretching out his arms crosswise; if St. Augustine died weeping over the penitential psalms written upon the wall, what should not be my condition in my last hours?

But first I will say those prayers from the Paradise:

"O good Jesu, I beseech Thee by the love of the Eternal Father, and the last words on the Cross, wherewith Thou didst commend Thy Spirit to the Father, receive Thou my spirit at the close of my life."

"O God the Holy Ghost, have mercy upon me; and by Thy holy inspiration strengthen me at all times, and chiefly in the hour of my death."

"O most Holy Trinity, One God, have mercy upon me, now and in the hour of death."

"I can no more. I feel as if I were going very soon. They will come directly and move me. God bless them for all their care and love. Glory to God, as St. Chrysostom always said, and when he was dying, Glory be to God. "I will lay me down in peace and take my rest." "I know that my Redeemer liveth. . . . Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another." "Amen. Come Lord Jesus."

WORDS OF COMFORT.

BY THE REV. R. W. LOWRIE.

Yes, you may be sure that your "sin will find you out." Sooner or later the rebound of overstrained law will come. Be not disturbed about your wicked and prosperous neighbors, my friend. God will take care of them! Let us be concerned chiefly about ourselves. Your thoughts, in the main, are correct, yet here and there need bringing back to a straight line.

That heaven is a condition there can be no doubt; it may, of course, be a place, also. As a state, it is one of supreme happiness; that it is a locality, too, I do not understand that it is necessary to believe. "Where it is," if it be a place as well as a condition, since no one can tell, so is it unnecessary that any one should conjecture. One thing we may not dispute, and that is, that if we wish to enjoy it fully, we must make ourselves able to do so by the cultivation of a heavenly spirit and the formation of a capacity for doing so.

You may take to these "views" or not. They are not "articles of religion."

Faith is not consent to some merely intellectual proposition, acceptance of some dogmatic definition. We do not "believe in" Christ, as we "believe" the Creed. Our acceptance of a doctrine is an act of the mind. Our trust in a Saviour is the repose of the soul on Him. The latter is a natural act of the religious man; the former is an effort, a constrained act of the will. Credulity is an excess—simple trust in God that He will do for us what His Son has revealed and promised us that His Father will do. This is faith.

You cannot sow seed, lie down to sleep, put one foot before another, without faith—some sort or quality of trust in God, the unseen Giver, of the ability to do these things. Faith is thus natural, infidelity abnormal. It is far easier, and far more natural, too, to be trustful, than to be suspicious, just as to be born able to see is the rule, to be born blind exceptional and irregular. Only, our spiritual consent is an earnest and fervent thing, and where it is so, then a living, saving faith.

Some one illustrates it thus: On the Atlantic lies the Chesapeake. Taste its waters; they are salt. It is only the old ocean which has at last cut its way into the land those hundreds of miles. And so with faith—trust Godward. It is only an arm of a broad sea. The universal laws of mind and the perpetual nature of God, these are the great ocean, only a bay of which has worn its channel, for the ages past, in toward Calvary and the Cross. Disbelief is the shutting up of a natural sense—faith, the regular and eternal channel of salvation. If you like this writer's illustration I am glad. You see that God has made no severe and arbitrary decree. Jehovah is not the Calligula your . . . depicts him. Faith is a condition universal to mind and soul. Of what does it not lie at the basis? It underlies the confidence and mutual love of friends, even of husband and wife. Obedience to law, on the part of the bad citizen, even, rests much on his belief, his belief that the State is strong enough to enforce that law, and even on the part of the good citizen that it is wise, well-meant, and for the common weal.

Faith again? Yes, in one form or another, faith always! Though it be a weak faith, it is faith. Our human hearts crave the Infinite. We are so made that nothing that has bounds satisfies, or can satisfy us. I rejoice that this is so. I see in every such thought the feathers of the wings of the souls' immortality. Was ever artist satisfied with his brush-work or sculptor with the handwork of his chisel? I am not now defending dissatisfaction, but unsatisfaction. The truly ambitious soul never did in its life an act but the moment it was done we felt we had within us the power to have done it better. And as in lower things we thirst for higher excellence, so in spiritual things we do for the very highest excellence—God Himself. I am, thus, not surprised at your self-depreciation. It is common; it is natural. But temporary religious depression should not discourage. If hunger and thirst on for the supreme and illimitable goodness. Trust; hope. And, as two given colors, mixed, give a third, let your hope and your trust give you faith as the resultant. And pray on: "Help thou mine unbelief"—not my no-faith, but my poor and weak faith.

Yes; intellect enters into faith as well as heart. Some one makes a beautiful use of Chamouni and Mount Blanc. Standing, says he, in the vale, you look off and up, and behold the mount. From a vast sea of pines it rises, and its brow pierces the blue like a wedge driven into the sky. It is the king of the mountains. It is draped with ermine, and turbaned with clouds. There it has stood for centuries. It is older than Moses. It typifies eternity. Sinai is a child beside it. And so he goes on; on the broad palms of the thoughts with which it fills the beholder, the soul is captured and lifted up from nature to the God of nature. You who have stood in that lonely vale can realize the description. And so, when looking upon the phenomena of Christ's life, example and death. In them, the eye beholds the image of the Divine, and from merely intellectual consent, which may be only cold, becomes a spiritual consent, which, to be at all, can be only glowing and enthusiastic.

No, you may not expect a perfect state of faith, or of life, though there is the injunction—"be ye perfect even as your Father is perfect." Be perfect in intent; but how, in act and fact? "Unprofitable servants," you remember—even when we shall have done all! When anything is perfect on earth, then this world must need cease to be earth—it will be heaven, or heaven begun. Suspect your "perfectionist" friends of Boanergian (possibly, more correctly, Bar-macbean) zeal; yet fault him not to his face: if it, Salvation Army, and all, be not of God, it will come to naught. God will take care of such things! Let us let Him. But, above all things, grieve not that you are not yet perfect, for that were to grieve that you have not yet been gathered to your fathers.

The religion of Christ has never been tested. No one has even yet lived it! Its ideal none have reached. Only He, Himself. I cannot agree with you that "Christ, too, had a soul to save, as well as other men." But I will not here go into the matter with you. Read Robertson, Phillips Brooks; let Maurice go where Shakespeare says physic be thrown.

I think it is the first of these writers who refers to the seeming doubt of the Master even. Doubts are not in themselves sins. God may not love the soul to doubt; but He is willing that it should—"hesitate and discriminate." I quite liked the thought (as you did) and here bring you back to it. I think you do St. Thomas injustice, however. He was not "void of faith." The others had all done the same. They all doubted. The story of Mary seemed an idle tale to everyone of them. He had only a weak faith. I love him and honor him. I am afraid I should have done the same thing. And, you, too.

Now, the "seeming doubt" of the Master, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me." And mounts, and crosses on them, you (and all) have had; losses, sufferings, afflictions, disappointments, bedsores, aches and pains of heart, and deaths. Yea, verily, my friend. St. Paul had. David had. All the saints and saintly. Men are crucified hourly; they "die daily." A feeling of forsakenness, not natural? Why, it is as common as the air we breathe. It is the first cry of the bleeding heart. It comes as naturally as the infant's mysterious instinct for food. And if it be not pardonable, too, then the Master was not, for, as He hung upon His cross, He cried the cry! You, from yours, can hardly be less vulnerable; and are assuredly as pardonable. Only add "help Thou mine unbelief." The weakness of my trust.

Your state of heart is no proof either of God's forsaking you, or of your evil heart, or of a lost trust. Feelings are seas, and every wave is change. Hearts are one eternal ebb and flow. We are often as unreasonably lifted up on them, as we are irresistibly "cast down." Be not cast down, oh, thy soul. All these things are, for the most part, as much beyond our control as the flow of the tides. If we cannot judge impartially of ourselves in other moments, how can we do so dispassionately in moments such as you describe? Neither of acts, nor of feelings, nor of motives.

A preacher of "comfortable words" illustrates this thus: A mother leaves her child. It bewails her, and wonders why it is left thus. Is not mourning after the mother, absent, as great and as beautiful an evidence of love, as rejoicing in the mother present?

The child when the mother is present, gazes into her face; when she is absent, it gazes after her face, although, it may be through a window all dimmed and blotched by its own tears. I like the thought.

Behold, now, "how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand." More "crumbs of comfort," I hope, though you do contradict me and call them "loaves of comfort." I am glad you find them so; and, that others may eat of the same, I keep copies of my letters; and excuse if I mix my metaphors just here. 'You did yours, for you spoke of "loaves," and then reminded me to be sure and send "a full ounce" under the new postal laws, whereas a loaf must weigh—a pound.

OUR WORRIES.

BY DORA HOPE.

Perhaps one of the greatest misfortunes incident to poor human nature is to have been born with a "worry" disposition.

To other eyes these afflicted ones may appear to have everything that heart can wish for, not a single cause for anxiety, nothing to do but be happy and enjoy life to the full; still—they will find something to be uneasy about, and to fidget themselves and every one else with. And when this stumbling-block in their way is once found, how they dwell on it, hover round it, and magnify it, looking at it on all sides, and bemoaning afresh each new aspect of it; till it assumes in their eyes appalling dimensions, though to others it appears the merest mole-hill.

It is surprising how many of the ordinary occurrences of life may be looked upon as trials should one give the mind carefully to the search for them; and if the quest be pursued we shall probably find before long that we are much more ill-used than our neighbors. For no man ever yet devoted himself with energy to bewailing his own woes without discovering that he had more to bear than anybody else. Surely no one in the world before ever made so many bad debts, or was so badly served by tradesmen, or had such unappreciative friends. But at any rate there is this little drop of consolation for such a one—it is at least a distinction from the ordinary run of mortals, to be the very most unfortunate person in the world.

A lady who had sorely tried the patience of her clergyman, by her constant complaints of troubles which were purely imaginary, and calamities which might possibly happen in the future, once met the very unexpected rebuff: "Madam, pray to God that you may have a real trouble, it would save you from a world of anxieties."

Strangely enough a terrible grief came upon her soon after in the loss of her only child, but she rose to meet this affliction with uncomplaining heroism, and, having once tasted real trouble, was content to wait for it in the future till it was sent her from God's hand, without creating unnecessary griefs for herself, and going to meet real sorrows half way.

It is a common expression that some one "enjoys very bad health." Very often the remark is more literally true than the speaker is aware of. Some people do enjoy it, and are never so perfectly happy as when talking about their sufferings, and the quantities of medicine they are obliged to take. They do not suffer pain but agony, and they have been told by their doctors again and again that no such sufferer ever lived before. Still they are able to detail minutely their sensations and symptoms, and no matter what turn you may give the conversation, it always trends round again to the subject of their health. If they expect to get pitied, it is to be feared they will be disappointed, for silent suffering is generally the most acute, and the patient bearing of it is even more deserving of sympathy than noisy garrulous talk. Too often these "wois" complainings grow like the cry of "wolf" in the fable, and when a time of true anguish comes, no sympathizing helpful friend is to be found.

"You are looking in low spirits this morning," I said to a neighbor, who was very proud of his daughter, a bright, lively girl of eighteen. "Oh, yes," he said, dismally, "I can't shake it off, it is my Lucy, your know, she is sure to be getting married before long; I cannot expect to keep her at home many years longer, and I cannot think what I shall do without her."

Foolish short-sightedness, or rather long-sightedness! which was so anxious to deny sorrow in the distance as to blight all the good and happiness of the present, although the thing he feared might never happen, or coming, might prove a life-long blessing.

We do not know to-morrow's needs, nor can we find them out by much thinking; but God knows, and has even now provided for them. All is arranged, and we have only to keep steadily on our journey. "Give us this day our daily bread," was the divinely taught prayer, no permission is given us to demand to see what is provided for to-morrow. The children of Israel had manna only for one day, and human nature seems to have been much the same then as it is now, for they persisted in trying to take thought for the morrow, laying by the food which turned to corruption.

Let us, then, be thankful for to-day's good, sure that strength for to-morrow's troubles, and wisdom to guide us through to-morrow's difficulties, will be awaiting us when we awake to-morrow morning.

The misery people cause themselves by fruitless worrying about money is untold. A careful forethought is a very different thing from a foolish anxiety. A due exercise of the former and a wise precaution is highly to be commended, but the eager, restless "making haste to be rich," or anxious, unreasonable fear of losing that which we love, is like a fever, which, unless checked and allayed, will burn out a life.

Strange as it may appear, some most excellent Christian people fall into this habit of worry; people who fret and fume, and make themselves miserable over trifles, which a moment's calm thought might remove, or a quiet reflection show to be not worthy to cause annoyance. They take fright at the first suspicion of danger, and rush at once to the extremest conclusions. A person in a neighboring street is said to be ill with some infectious complaint. The whole family is certain to take it, they always do take everything. One of the children runs in rosy from play; oh! she is flushed, she has begun with it already. It is sure to be the worst time of the year to take it, and particularly dangerous just at all the children's ages. The poor soul frightens herself and everybody else, till it is probable she will induce the sickness she is so anxious to avoid.

There are real troubles to be faced, real anxieties to be borne, irritating circumstances that give occasion to irritating moods, but these are all best met by those who see things in their true proportions, and do not magnify every little vexation. The greatest charm in a high Christian life, and the greatest privilege pertaining to a perfect trust in God is that calm of the spirit which nothing short of falling faith can disturb. The Christian, happy in this state, may be torn by sorrows, buffeted by misfortunes, trials, persecutions, or tried by perpetual trifling annoyances and petty vexations, which like a cloud of gnats irritate and harass, but he does not lose his self-possession. Deep within the soul lies hope, and faith remains unshaken. Sorrows are keenly felt if the heart is tender, but their sting is gone; cares press heavily, and little worries annoy, but a Hand stronger than ours is lightening the load, and there is a gleam of light even through the blackest cloud. In the dark day we may yet see our Father's sympathizing smile. Oh what do not they lose who have never known this inward peace! Would that each face wore the reflection of this inner light!

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

It has been said that "Dust by its own nature can rise only a little above the road, and birds which fly high never have it on their wings. So the heart that soars high enough escapes those little cares and vexations which brood upon the earth, but cannot rise above it into that purer air."

There is a well-worn anecdote of an old woman going along a road with a heavy basket on her arm, when she was overtaken by a gentleman in a gig, who told her to get up behind him, and he would take her home. Presently, on looking round, he saw her still sitting there, holding her load in her arms. "Why, my good woman," he cried, "why do you not put down your basket, when you have a chance of a rest?" "Oh, sir," she replied, "it was so kind of you to carry me, I could not trouble you to carry my basket as well."

A good many of us are very much like this old woman. We accept Christ's offer of salvation, but think that if He will get our souls safely to heaven, it is too much to ask Him to take any thought for our temporal affairs as well; so we go on worrying ourselves about all possible troubles, and insist upon bearing all the burden ourselves of those we already have. Some of us are not even content with our own affairs, but we must needs go about with the cares of the world upon our shoulders.

There are some people who find a vast number of worries in the world, and yet do not enjoy them, nor gloat over them more than they can help. People who wake in the morning feeling irritable with everybody and vexed with themselves for being so. And just when they are most cross and worried, the cares of the household are unusually heavy; all the ordinary, everyday duties seem to grow and magnify themselves; everything wants attending to at once; the day's work will not fit into the day, and the grasshopper becomes a burden. I would remind such that physical ill-health is sometimes the cause of our mental troubles, and that many of our most serious worries are traceable to the liver. A good walk, a little change, or medical prescription; and lo! the mind recovers its tone, the burden is lifted, the anxiety is gone; there are smiles and laughter instead of worries and complaining.

If the mind is trained to dwell on the mercies and blessings of daily life, they will be found to outweigh the crosses; and in proportion as we accustom ourselves to think of the good things we have, so will the contemplation of the evil become distasteful, the crosses will fade, if not vanish entirely, before our renewed cheerfulness, for we cannot be sad or irritable if our mind is kept persistently full of thankfulness for our many mercies.

But there are others of us who never trouble ourselves with unnecessary fears for the future, and whose digestion and nervous system are all that could be wished, yet who still suffer constant anxiety, and a perpetual depression of spirits, and have the poor consolation of knowing that it is all our own fault.

Who does not know the dejection induced by having risen in the morning full of energy, and plans for all sorts of impossibilities to be performed during the day, and night coming with only half the work done? Then follow vexation and self-reproachings, and we get up the next day and do exactly the same thing again, with yesterday's unfinished work weighing on our minds as well. And so we go on fretting and worrying ourselves from day to day, and happy is he who can go through a course of this without at least occasional fits of irritability and bad temper.

Let every one remember there is a limit to the strength of the strongest, and an end to the capabilities of the most active. To plan out and undertake more than we can accomplish is depressing, bad for ourselves, and certainly bad for things to be done. The duties are performed hastily and carelessly, and whilst carrying out one portion of our programme, we are wondering and puzzling how we are to get through the rest. Far better in every way is it to undertake no more than we can do, and do thoroughly well; aiding ourselves in our work by habits of punctuality and system. Where regular daily duties are to be performed, however trifling they may be, it is an incalculable relief to have regular hours for doing them, and without being the slave of system, to be master of our hours.

Love to God and love to man will comprise the whole of human duty in all the varied walks of life. Love to God and man would make this world a paradise.

A BIRTHDAY HYMN.

BY ELLOKENNA.

Now, on the threshold of another year,
Low at Thy feet,
I gladly lay it down, O Saviour dear,
An offering meet.

Take it, my Master. Make it all Thine own,
So shall each hour
Be dewed with blessings, falling from Thy throne
In gracious shower!

This year is but a step in Time's swift river.
Thy Lord, make it bright,
To mirror forth the face of Thee, the giver
Of life and light!

Fresh from Thy love be all its hopes and fears,
Its joys and pain!
Resting in Thee to smiles shall change its tears,
Its loss to gain!

All shall be well—if sorrow we enshroud,
Or mirth elate—
If but to Thee the sunshine and the cloud
Be consecrate!

A CONSECRATED LIFE.

A life of consecration to the service of God will dignify your being. But what does consecration mean? We sometimes hear of places of worship, ground, and persons being consecrated. But what does it imply? It simply means to set apart or reserve for a special purpose. In like manner David calls upon every man, woman, and child to set themselves apart, with all their powers, for the service of the living and true God. Not a partial devotion, but an entire consecration of body, soul, and spirit, to do all that He requires, to go where He sends, to undertake all He commands, to be all He asks—yea, even to suffer if needful in the carrying out of His divine will. There must be no compromise in the matter, inasmuch as all attempts of that character will be sure to end in failure and disappointment. Compromising people are always weak; yea, even worse—wicked. "Running with the hare and going with the hounds" is an acknowledged mark of disgrace to all who attempt it; no one even respects such people, and certainly never confides in them. But men of conscience, principle, and devotion will always in the long run be sure to command respect, just as Havelock and his men were recognized in a time of special emergency by the commanding officer, who said, "Call out Havelock, he is always ready, and his men are always sober, and can be depended on." Yes, there is a wide difference between a consecrated life and a desecrated life. The one is a life well spent, the other is a wasted life, or something even worse. Nor is this an accident. It is in perfect harmony with those laws which the Divine Being has provided so as to secure the best possible results to each of His children who obey them. This will be seen if we notice how He has arranged for this to take place. It is only in connection with a consecrated life that the highest and noblest powers of man can be fully developed. Apart from this it is impossible to become fully matured, and therefore a portion of our manhood must remain in abeyance. This may, perhaps, at first sight appear to be a strong way of putting the case; but it is, nevertheless, strictly correct. A Christian is the highest style of man, because he alone has utilized all his powers in the best direction. Apart from this, a man is but a fragment—a partial development, a one-sided being. Sneer at it as the worldling, the scoffer, or the scorner may, it is, nevertheless, perfectly true that in no other way can there be discovered any method by which the loftiness of man's being and the dignity of his nature can be so promoted as by thus living in harmony with the will of his Maker and Redeemer. Nor is it hard to comprehend if we remember, in the second place, that such a life of consecration commits a man entirely to the cultivation and development alone of that which is good, by calling into exercise the highest powers of his nature. Here, again, we see how it harmonizes with his best powers. Goodness is needful to true greatness, just as it is necessary for true greatness to be allied to goodness. Hence, by committing man only to that which is good, and by restraining him from whatever is evil, everything calculated to exalt or dignify his being has its fullest influence and noblest results. True goodness refines and exalts wherever it secures obedience, influences the mind, or controls the life.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

MISS PHOEBE'S SCHOLARS

BY MRS. E. B. SANFORD.

I.

Ernest Mathews was eight years old when he began to go to Miss Phoebe Glover's school.

Miss Phoebe had only a few scholars: she taught them in a back room off the kitchen, in her brother's house: two of the scholars were her brother's children. It was a plain, rough room, but it made just the dearest little school-room in the world; so the boys and girls said who were Miss Phoebe's scholars.

What made it so pleasant? Well, it was bright, and sunny, and sweet, and clean; and the bare walls were covered with pretty pictures. In winter there was a stand of flowering plants at the sunniest window, and in summer there were plenty of flowers always. There were no regular desks, but the children sat around some old-fashioned tables, which they liked very much. And then Miss Phoebe herself was kind and cheerful, and she had a way of making little folks feel just in the mood for study.

Ernest loved dearly to go to school; and he was the happiest of all Miss Phoebe's children until Walter Gregg began to come to school.

All the children, yes, and some of their parents, felt sorry that Miss Phoebe had let Walter be one of her scholars, for he seemed a very disagreeable boy. None of the children liked him; but to Ernest his coming was like a dark cloud over the pleasant school-room.

Ernest was an only child, and a great pet at home. The other scholars had never seemed to mind his little spoiled ways, especially as Ernest never meant to be babyish or selfish; but Walter laughed at everything he said or did, and called him "Ring Baby," and "Darling Petkin."

He loved to tease him, too, in other ways. Ernest was sweet-tempered and not easily provoked, but it was hard to have this new boy reach under the table and pinch him to make him jump; or shake the table on purpose to make him spoil his copy; or hide his books, or his hat. These things were all done on the sly, too; Miss Phoebe never seemed to notice, and Ernest did not like to complain.

Walter would not have wanted Miss Phoebe to see these teasing ways of his, for he evidently tried to please her, and to have her think well of him. The scholars all noticed this and wondered at it. They did not know that Walter's mother was Miss Phoebe's dear friend, and that Miss Phoebe had stood by her and comforted and helped her when her heart was almost breaking under heavy griefs. Very few grown people guessed this; and Walter was too young to understand all about it; but he knew that Miss Phoebe helped his mother very much, and he liked her for it.

Miss Phoebe's scholars all liked Wednesday afternoon. Then they called themselves a missionary circle: each of the little girls had some sewing or pretty fancy work to do, and Miss Phoebe often found something for the boys to do also. Then, while they were all working, she read aloud to them.

Ernest had learned to knit at home; and with Miss Phoebe's help, he had begun to knit a pretty afghan for the missionary basket. He was on the second stripe now, and was very much interested in his work. But when Walter saw him knitting he began at once to make fun of him, in his teasing way.

Walter himself, when he knew of the Wednesday afternoon plan, had proposed whittling out some little boats to be sold in the basket: he was very ingenious with his knife, and Miss Phoebe was pleased to have him do this. But two or three times when he caught Ernest's eye, he seized a couple of sticks and pretended to be knitting with them very meekly, while poor Ernest grew red with mortification.

Whether Miss Phoebe observed this or not I cannot say; but if not, it was singular that she chose a story to read to if Ella had allowed the evil to overcome her, and given up the good—the faith and love which she had been taught!"

Walter did not seem to heed the story much, for he was sitting a little behind Miss Phoebe, and was busy mimicking Ernest just as she asked these questions. But Ernest had been listening; and he understood it.

"I won't give up my work, then," he said to himself,

"if Walter does laugh at it;—Miss Phoebe said this was my good thing to do for the missionaries, and I mean to do it! And I won't—no, I won't get angry with Walter, if I can help it. Maybe I can be kind to him, some time!"

So little Ernest tried hard to treat Walter pleasantly, and not to mind his teasing.

It was only a day or two after the reading of the story that Walter had some puzzling sums to work out, for his arithmetic lesson. He was ahead of most of the scholars in arithmetic, and was usually so bright at this work that Miss Phoebe told him she was quite sure he could do the lesson if he would try faithfully.

Walter did try; but he was really not very well that day, and his head was not as clear as usual. He plodded on, and even stayed in at recess,

"HE STAYED IN AT RECESS, TRYING OVER ONE EXAMPLE."

her scholars that afternoon about overcoming evil with good. The story was of a dear little girl who was very unkindly treated by the young people of the family with whom she lived, chiefly because she was trying to live like a Christian child; and it went on to tell how she won them all over, by her patient, forgiving, loving ways, to be her friends, and to love the Master whom she followed. Miss Phoebe talked a little about the story when she had finished:—"Was not little Ella's way the best way of conquering her enemies, children?" she asked. "And would it not have been very sad trying over one example for the sixth time; for he was determined not to give up. He laid down his slate for a moment to go and get a drink of water, just as Ernest chanced to cross the room. Ernest had noticed Walter's troubled face, and glanced at the sum.

It was a long one, involving several processes, and the entire operation would have been quite beyond Ernest's comprehension. But the first process was simple multiplication; Ernest did know his multiplication table, and he at once saw a mistake.

"Here baby," cried Walter roughly, catching up his slate, "what are you looking at my sum for? Go along to your knitting!"

"But, Walter, see!" said Ernest, quietly. "Nine times seven are sixty-three; you've got a four—won't that spoil your great long sum?"

Walter muttered something not very gratefully, and Ernest ran off. But the figure was quickly altered; and this time the right answer was obtained.

"Clever of 'Petkin,' to see that blunder!" he admitted to himself. "Don't know why he should tell me, though!"

This sum proved to be the hardest, and very soon after recess Walter carried his completed work to his teacher. As she praised his perseverance Walter glanced at Ernest, and wondered to see the little fellow listening with as much satisfaction as if he himself had received the praise.

Doing one kind act for any person always makes us feel more kindly towards him, and so makes it easier to treat him lovingly afterward. So Ernest found; he just watched out, as he would have said, to do some friendly act towards Walter, and when the latter teased him, after his old fashion, he only laughed, as if he thought it was all in fun.

The other children began to think it was; and somehow, Walter himself began to think so, which was the funniest part of it all. And then, after a little, he dropped his unkind trick of teasing altogether, and began to be quite a favorite with the other scholars.

One day Miss Phoebe called to see Ernest's mother. Ernest stood beside her, holding her hand affectionately for a little while, then, as the ladies were talking together, he slipped away into a little room adjoining, where his playthings were. He could hear their voices but did not notice what Miss Phoebe and his mother were saying, until he heard Walter's name; then he could not help hearing what followed.

"Yes," said Miss Phoebe, "the poor boy had had many disadvantages, and I felt that it was a doubtful experiment to bring him in among my children. But I hoped and believed they would do him good instead of being harmed by him; and so it has proved.

"And your little Ernest——" here Ernest stopped his ears with his fingers, for he knew that Miss Phoebe could not know he was there. But whatever she said must have pleased his mother, for she gave him a very loving kiss after Miss Phoebe was gone.

God is always ready to listen to our prayers whenever we offer them; but we may rest assured that they are never more acceptable to Him than when, in obedience to His Beloved Son's command, we "Pray one for another."

COOKING GARDEN.

Cooking is nothing new, but Cooking Garden is. At least it is but three years old. The first year was one of experiment and discouragement; the second, the child began to understand and creep; the third, it walks erect and straight to the goal, and is ready for introduction to those who are interested in the successful teaching of cooking to old and young, to rich and poor.

The readers of THE CHURCHMAN have heard of the Kitchen Garden, where classes of little girls are trained to set tables, wash dishes, sweep and dust and attend the door. In the same way, only with an actual fire and real pots and kettles, Cooking Garden teaches the actual making of the ordinary dishes used in a family. To lively music the little girls march into the class-room and take their seats before the long cooking tables. The bill of fare and receipts for the lesson are in full sight, and with definite instructions the class begins its work, and in an hour and a half from the time they assemble, if the draughts draw well, and no contretemps occurs, four well cooked dishes are placed before the teacher for criticism. And after the ten lessons given in the Cooking Garden Manual have been well taught, twelve pupils have learned and made forty nice dishes for food, and received instruction that will aid them in the use of the same materials in other receipts.

Is it not a subject of congratulation that there is at last a way in which people can learn what is so necessary for wife, daughter and mother to know; that children who cannot be allowed to be in the cook's way in the kitchen, and who have long been anxious to see into culinary mysteries, may be gathered in a nursery or school room, where some kind auntie or friend can teach by this system very easily, and learn as they teach?

A Sunday-school teacher in a mission might use it as a weekly entertainment for her class, and thus pass pleasantly and profitably, many a long winter evening.

ART.

A PICTURE by Montegna has been discovered at the Brera at Milan. It represents the Madonna and Child surrounded by heads of singing angels.

M. MAISONIER was elected president of the jury of fine arts at the Antwerp exhibition, and the great medal of honor was awarded Alfred Stevens, a French artist.

THE notable Bosch collection of pictures in Vienna has been sold for $120,000. It is especially rich in specimens of the Dutch school. A portrait by Rembrandt brought $17,000.

A CARVED wood frieze in the dining-room of Mr. George Slater, at Norwich, Conn., will illustrate the poem of Hiawatha. The sketching upon the wood is by H. W. Pierce, a Boston artist.

The Worcester Festival derives an additional interest from the fact that it has during the twenty-eight years of its existence, furnished an annual demonstration for other cities—a superb object lesson—showing the practicability and social enrichment of a thoroughly organized undertaking for musical culture. What Worcester has accomplished might he accomplished in Hartford, New Haven, Albany—in the beautiful cities threaded along the Central and Erie Railroads—in Pittsburgh, and in the enterprising cities that lie within easy reach of Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis. In all Northern cities, east or west, where the soil is of New England emigration, may be found Teutonic and Scandinavian populations who keep alive the musical traditions and enthusiasm of Fatherland. Such festival organizations would provide the best possible centers for a fine assimilation of these strongly contrasted and invaluable elements of our great future. Were the choral associations of New York City reduced to native elements by the elimination of Teutonic, Hebrew and other alien members, the Oratorio and Chorus Societies would instantly die of collapse. These possible art associations would be efficient instruments of an invaluable social unification.

The Worcester association, as one may see in running over its list of membership, is pretty much New England—homogeneous, and represents the old conventional Massachusetts civilization, with as little of foreign infiltration as we are likely to find. But few names, sprinkled very sparing through the register, suggest trans-Atlantic origin—all together a handful of Irish, German and Scandinavians.

The race element has much to do with the tonal character of a chorus. In New York we feel the tremendous, unwarmed gusto of the Germans, with their vibrous basses, robust tenors and trebles, all more noticeable for volume and vehemence than for spirituality, and withal, the ready, clamorous, incisive edge of the Hebrew element. An ear sensitively adjusted to tonal significances unconsciously recognizes these subtle blendings of aesthetic qualities and values, not unlike a tonal idiosyncrasy which eludes analysis. At Worcester there was a wide difference. There was a curious limpidity, simplicity of tone, colorless as the pure spring water of the native hill streams, yet not insipid nor unrefreshing.

There was an absence of impulse, impetuosity, passion, and in the lighter cantatas, of gladness and buoyancy, so that frolicsome music was not frolicsome, and dramatic music, the rather didactic and sometimes prosaic. On the other hand the religious numbers were penetrated with a reverential habit of feeling, a spontaneous sobriety and solemnity of utterance which no conductor's tact can develop.

So that the severer, nobler, grander works were exceptionally impressive, not infrequently retaking the undisguised flippancy and irreligiousness of a professional soloist here and there, as in the "Messiah," where the great chorus delivered their sublime parts on an exalted plane of spiritual conception, while Mr. Whitney was sporting himself, half-profanely, with an art deceitful and soulless, very far beneath, almost out of spiritual range. I have taken care to bring this line of criticism into the boldest relief because it is pivotal, and constitutes a great water-shed of musical differentiation.

The Worcester chorus delivered their serious works less artistically and with less technical brilliancy than we are accustomed to in the metropolitan choruses; but there was an irresistible imprompiveness, a spiritual ingenuousness, full of unvoiced delight. The "Utretch Jubilate" rang with all the concentrated fervor of a great Moody and Sankey multitude. Its huge proportions and structural solemnity were brought out in more forceful lines than ever before. So of the Rossini "Stabat Mater." The religious enthusiasm of the chorus, especially in that tremendous reiteration of the in die iudicii, with the almost appalling climacteric of crashing orchestra and organ, was well-nigh insupportable. This is a touchstone of musical effectiveness in religious music which conventional criticism is sure to lose sight of or altogether misunderstand. In the "Messiah" choruses this serious quality of temperamental religiousness prevailed, and so deeply did it penetrate these familiar numbers that, for the time being, the great hall grew into a veritable sanctuary, with its holy places and inspirations. And this was inexpensively more precious than the extreme niceties of technical drill, in which the chorus was somewhat deficient. That is, the readings of involved and highly-wrought passages were somewhat blurred, and wanting in luminous delivery, as if prolonged and searching rehearsals had suffered neglect. Yet there were no lapses, nor failures, nor misconceptions in rhythm, intonation, or conception.

The English cantatas were the least effective. The mystic and highly dramatic figures which abound in the "Bride of Dunkerton" (by Henry Smart), and the roistering, bucolic mirth of Mr. Macfarren's "May Queen," which reproduces the moods and coloring of the "Robin Hood" period with striking verisimilitude, through the neglect or unsympathy of the director, were barely hinted at.

The soloists were numerous, and in the main wisely selected. The sopranos and mezzo sopranos, or contraltos, were specially admirable. Mr. Whitney Mockridge, the new tenor of St. John's chapel choir, was incomparably premier of the tenors, although Messrs. Want and Parker were admirable in their selections. The basses were Mr. Whitney, whose great reputation is nothing better today than a far spent echo of earlier years; Mr. Stoddard, whose resonant, flexible voice and winsome delivery irresistibly suggest the footlights in some obscure way, and Mr. James Metcalf, already mentioned in this column in connection with an organ recital at St. Augustine's chapel last spring, whose admirable singing confirmed an impression then formed that he might become the foremost oratorio soloist by an exclusive devotion to his art.

The great points of interest were clearly Madame Fursch-Madi in the grand scena and aria, "Ah, Ferride," from Fidelio, a splendid glimpse of the school and spirit of Pappas; the great recitative and aria from Oberon, "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," one of the few operatic numbers that can stand artistically by itself in the concert room, delivered with exhilarating mastery and splendid volume of voice by Mrs. Belle Cole, who also was listened to with great delight in the old Handelian recitative and song from Semele, "Awake Surtania," and "Iris, Hence Away;" Miss Emma Juch's exquisite singing of "Sweet Bird," with Mr. Heindl's flute obligato from Handel's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, and Mr. Mockridge's "Salve Dimora," from Faust (Gounod), with the Cujus Animam of the "Stabat Mater."

These were, each and all, most admirable and instructive examples of the highest vocal art. Miss Clapper, a rising contralto of great merit and promise, also gained enthusiastic recognition. Perhaps the surprise of the festival was Mr. Mockridge's beautiful voice, with its soaring range, his perfect phrasing, and his profoundly religious delivery of the Messiah solos.

Here Madame Stone-Barton shared the soprano solos and artistic honors with Fursch-Madi, whose defective knowledge of English slightly embarrassed her splendid interpretations. Several other ladies with valuable art reputations were heard with pleasure.

The new Franz edition of the "Messiah" was presented for the first time in America. The supplemented instrumentation gave the bare, bald score unprecedented freshness and color; but the cutting down of the fugal introductions of the choruses, "And He Shall Purify," "For Unto Us," and "His Yoke is Easy" to quartettes, is an inufferable and unwarrantable violation and degradation of the text.

The conductor, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, is a most scholarly German with an Italian susceptibility, immaculate in his knowledge of both score and choral work—an admirable blending of Theodore Thomas in his inflexibility with the passionate idealism of Dr. Damrosch, able to get the utmost out of both chorus and orchestra, and for fifteen consecutive rehearsals and concerts of the five days, never finching or falling below a high excellence (save in his reading of the English cantatas), while the fifty soloists of the orchestra sustained their splendid reputation unswerving until the final chord of the great Amen at the close of the "Messiah."

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

THE J. B. WATKINS LAND MORTGAGE COMPANY.

"The J. B. Watkins Land Mortgage Company of Lawrence, Kansas, and Dallas, Texas, is believed to be the largest concern engaged in this line of business. It began operations in 1870, and has in the fifteen years of its existence been remarkably successful. Mr. Watkins, the President, and his able corps of assistants are thoroughly competent judges of land and its value, and give to each transaction their personal supervision. Their rate of interest is 7 per cent per annum. The company's capital is $750,000, and the undivided profits are over $100,000, and prior to May 1 they had negotiated 10,400 mortgages, aggregating nearly $8,000,000. The prompt payment of the semi-annual interest at the National Bank of Commerce in New York is secured by the indorsement by the company of each coupon. The fact of the mortgages being made payable in New York, and their being guaranteed by the company makes them practically Eastern securities."—New York Times.

The American Investment Company of Emmetsburg, Iowa, has been organized by the officers of the First National Bank of that city, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, to take the mortgage, loan, and real estate business of Ormsby Brox & Co., a very old and well-known house in that line. Their advertisement of attractive investments will be found in another column. Colonel Ormsby, the President of the Company, has opened a New York office at 150 Nassau Street.

MESSRS. J. ROEGESTER & SONS, bell and brass founders, Baltimore, have received from the officers of "The World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition," held in New Orleans in 1884-'85, four certificates of award, awarding them the highest merits over all competitors for the several classes of goods they have had on exhibition.

Mason & Hamlin Pianos.

Mason & Hamlin had long become so famous for their upright pianos as they have long been for their world-renowned cabinet organs. The driving shaft feature about the "Mason & Hamlin Organ" is an important improvement in the method of holding the strings of the piano, which originated in their own factory. The strings are secured by metallic fasteners, instead of by the friction of pins set in wood, as has been the case, and the advantage resulting are numerous and highly important. Among them are the following: Wonderful beauty and musical quality of tone; far less liability of getting out of tune; greater reliability in trying climates; and greater solidity of construction and durability. Mason & Hamlin have made 15,000 organs. They can hardly expect to make as many pianos, but they will doubtless be called upon for a very large number. Indeed, their piano department is now running to its utmost capacity, and the Company is behind orders. So great is the demand that the Company is now arranging for a large additional factory building.

SCIENCE.

The crops receive their carbon mainly from the atmosphere, and their nitrogen chiefly, if not wholly, from the soil.

The mimusops globosa or dried milk of the bullet tree is likely to become a valuable substitute for India rubber and gutta percha. It is as elastic as the first without its intractability, and ductile as the second without its friability. It is strong, and is recommended for machine belting. It possesses electric qualities like gutta percha, and does not deteriorate on exposure to sun or air. It is a native of Guiana.

SOME recent facts show that in houses constructed of iron in whole or in part or with metallic roofs, or where iron is stored, conductors to guard against dangers from lightning are especially important. If the metal did not render the building more liable to be struck in the first instance, it would increase the danger of combustion; for the lightning when it did strike would seek the metal, and set fire to anything combustible in its way.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1885.

A painful story reaches us through the daily press of the killing and wounding of convict laborers who recently made a desperate break for liberty, while working on a railroad in Texas. The reported details of the ghastly tragedy are very meagre; but enough is told to bring the whole system of hiring out convict labor to private contractors once more before the tribunal of public opinion. In this particular case it seems that some sixty convicts, acting on a preconceived plan, made a rush for the neighboring woods; and that the guards opened fire upon them as they fled, with deadly effect. The prisoners, it is said, "ran in one large body, and the guards simply emptied their repeating rifles and small arms into the moving mass." The result was the killing and wounding of twenty-five, and the escape of the remaining thirty-five, who, at last accounts, had not been recaptured. No doubt there is something to be said not only from an economical but from a humanitarian point of view, in favor of employing prisoners in open air labor. But it is becoming more and more evident that the letting out of them in gangs to private contractors for extramural employment in mines, in the construction of railways and the like, involves abuses that cannot be prevented and ought not to be tolerated. The National Prison Association is soon to hold its annual convention. Among the topics to be discussed by the eminent men who are to take part in its deliberations, are many questions of prison discipline and reform. We commend to their consideration the grave questions raised by this pitiful massacre in Texas.

The General Assembly of the Knights of Labor is in session at Hamilton, Canada. From the statements made by the head of the organization, or Master Workman, as he is styled, the General Assembly represents four thousand local assemblies of divisions of the order, having a membership of about two hundred thousand, and constitutes the most powerful organization of workmen in the world. It is our intention to point out, at some future time, the distinction between this body and other organizations having a purpose more or less similar. We call attention now to the very grave problems which are raised by the power and pretensions of this formidable and widely established order. In the course of a very able address, the General Master Workman, Mr. Powderly, discusses, with a moderation which deserves all praise, such questions as the management of strikes, the treatment of strikers, the proper use of force in the resistance of tyranny and for the maintenance of order, the need of protection for citizen laborers against cheap foreign labor as well as convict labor, and the evil of allowing aliens, who live in foreign countries, to own and control large tracts of American land. Indeed, it is quite evident from this remarkable address that organized labor is aspiring to nothing less than commanding influence in national and international affairs, and that it has an intelligent word to say on most of the living issues of the day. So far as the movement itself, and the methods which it proposes, are socialistic, they must be regarded as questionable and even dangerous in their tendency. Apart from the objection which many would urge against the fundamental principle of the association, the past history of all such attempts to vindicate or defend the rights of man has taught us to look upon all class combinations with much distrust. It is pleasant, therefore, to note the moderation as well as the large-minded ability of Mr. Powderly's address, and to discern, as we think we do, in his utterances, a genuine public spirit that has not always been present in the councils of organized labor.

As an instance of the barbarous lack of public spirit which this same organization is quite capable of exhibiting, the strike of street car conductors and drivers which the Knights of Labor have just ordered and carried into effect in St. Louis may be mentioned. The time chosen was the week of the annual fair or exposition in that city. Many thousands of strangers from other cities and from the country were put to the greatest inconvenience by the lack of street car facilities; and for the greater part of them the object of their visit to St. Louis was altogether defeated. Such visitors would not have been at the trouble and expense of going to St. Louis at all if they could have foreseen such an untimely interruption; and the arbitrary decree of a strike at that particular time simply because of the greater pressure that would be brought to bear upon the railway companies, was not only an act of tyranny, but it was an offense against the public weal, to say nothing of the loss or injury inflicted upon individuals, that can in no wise be defended.

There has been a rather notable gathering of philanthropic people at Lake Mohonk, New York, at which some aspects of the Indian question have been considered and discussed. As was to be expected, perhaps, there was a good deal of that kind of optimism that is usually met with at meetings east of the Alleghenies which are held in the interest of the red man, for it is not less true of Indians than of some other people that they are most highly esteemed in the regions where they are most absent. Nevertheless, there is much to interest us in the fact that such men as General Whittlesey, Dr. Lyman Abbott and the Hon. Erastus Brooks, agreed in recommending the immediate admission of the Indians to citizenship, and the allotment of lands to them in severalty, with the discontinuance of all annuities, and the enforcement of compulsory education.

Though the issue of disestablishment has been formally disowned in the pending contest between the great English parties, it looms before all English minds as the great question of the near future. It is true that Mr. Gladstone in his remarkable "manifestos" has sought to postpone the consideration of it till "it shall have grown familiar to the public mind by thorough discussion;" and Mr. Chamberlain has followed this dilatory plea of his chief by a still more explicit declaration that disestablishment in England is not within the range of practical politics. It is perfectly evident, nevertheless, that Liberal success in the approaching English elections will bring this question at once to the front, and will demand for it an early determination. In a late number of the Guardian an editorial appeal is made to "Liberal Churchmen" that discloses the extreme gravity of the situation, and also gives to an American reader a painful sense of the uncertainty, not to say despair, that is paralyzing the councils of those who would defend the present relation between the Church and the English State. The editor warns Liberal Churchmen not to desert their party simply because they think that Liberalism is identified with disestablishment, because in that case the success of the Liberal party would make disestablishment inevitable and immediate. On the contrary, what they should do, he insists, is to remain in the party and simply threaten to leave it, in effect, either by not voting for an obnoxious Liberal candidate, or by voting for the candidate of the opposite party. Then the editor goes on to advise Liberal Churchmen that they should not require the candidate of their own party to be too outspoken in his tolerance of the establishment. Even though he may have already declared himself in favor of disestablishment, yet the Liberal Churchman should not despair of modifying his action, and should make it as easy as possible for him to retain the support of Churchmen. Such a candidate is not to be called upon to "eat any past words, or to say that he thinks disestablishment a wrong or a mischievous thing in itself. On the contrary, upon the abstract merits of the controversy he may hold any opinion he likes. All that he is asked to do is to put aside the consideration of it as a practical question for the term—some six years at most, and probably a much shorter period—of the Parliament about to be elected." We forbear to discuss the coherency or the consistency of the plan which is thus suggested. It is enough to point out the deplorable lack of confidence which is indicated by the serious proposal of such a temporizing policy.

In the leading article of a later number the same influential newspaper takes somewhat bolder ground, and points out very clearly what disestablishment must mean when it shall be seriously proposed to the English people. After saying that Mr. Gladstone's address to the electors of Midlothian has the effect of making disestablishment more certain, though, perhaps, more distant, inasmuch as in it "the one Liberal who of all others might have been thought likely, whether by history or disposition, to oppose disestablishment, virtually gives up the battle," the editor goes on to urge that nothing less than the complete spoliation of the Church can be looked for as the result of Radical success in the approaching elections. And, indeed, "The Radical Programme," which is largely quoted in the article referred to, leaves no room to doubt that one of the most attractive features of the Radical scheme will be the confiscation of the whole property of the Church and the sequestration of all her revenues to secular uses. And it is significant to observe that the ground upon which this is urged is the same as that which has so long been insisted upon by the defenders of the establishment, to wit: that the Church and the nation being one, the property of the Church is the property of the nation; and that, therefore, "the State is perfectly within its rights, if the Legislature shall think fit, in devoting every shilling of Church property to secular uses, from the lands with which Edward the Confessor endowed the Abbey of St. Peter's at Westminster down to the last sovereign subscribed to build a church in a destitute district." In view of such arguments as these, English Churchmen may well feel the need of a restatement of the proper relations between Church and State. Meantime, the most that The Guardian ventures to say is that: "if after reading 'The Radical Programme,' there be any Liberal Churchmen ready to vote for a candidate who will not forego disestablishment, even for the term of a single Parliament, they will be more consistent if they describe themselves as Liberals and leave the word 'Churchmen' out."

On the other hand, the Conservative leaders have at last responded to the demand for a definition of their policy. At a special cabinet council held in Downing street on the 6th, every member of the Ministry was present; and the ministerial deliberations are understood to have been concerned not only with the Eastern and Irish questions, but also with the Tory platform for the coming elections. Accordingly, Lord Salisbury spoke on the next day at the National Conservative Conference at Newport, and proceeded to enunciate the policy of the Conservative party. In reading the summary of his speech which has reached us, we are struck by the marked difference between the present attitude of a "Jingo" English administration, in regard to the Eastern Question, and the attitude of the Earl of Beaconsfield when he dictated terms to Russia, and saved the Ottoman Porte from utter ruin, at the treaty of Berlin. But by far the most significant feature of the Conservative programme as laid down by Lord Salisbury, is the evident purpose of the ministerial party to "dish the Radicals," as the phrase is, by proposing a liberal scheme of local self-government both for England and Ireland, a sweeping reform of the land laws, and an imperial federation of England and her colonies such as would make the real strength of the nation apparent and available in European councils. It is not the first time in English politics that a Tory leader has undertaken to conduct his party to victory along the lines laid down by the opposition. It may be doubted, however, whether any Conservative English statesman has ever more completely stoied the thunder of his opponents, or meditated a more clever move to save his party by conceding a little more to liberal progress than the Liberals themselves venture to promise to the country.

Meantime Mr. Parnell, "the uncrowned king," as he is called, has been making a remarkable speech at Wicklow in Ireland. The description which is telegraphed of the scene as he addressed the people of his native county and of the impression made upon his hearers, is full of interest. The chief interest, however, belongs to the measured and deliberate utterances of the Irish leader as he laid down in clear and well-considered terms precisely what is demanded by the Irish Parliamentary party. Two things are to be required without abatement or modification. The first is legislative independence; the second is the power and the right of the Irish parliament to protect Irish manufactures and other industries. In his contention for these he will abate nothing and postpone nothing. To Mr. Gladstone's plea that legislative independence might be considered with favor, provided it did not imply or lead to separation, Mr. Parnell replies that while there are reasons to expect that separation from England would not necessarily follow, yet "it is not possible for the human intelligence to forecast the future in such matters." To Mr. Chamberlain's caveat that legislative independence shall not carry with it power to enact protective measures, the Irish leader replies with something like derision, that it is for nothing less than this that legislative independence is demanded. Certainly it cannot be doubted that the Irish national party is now united under a bold and skillful leadership, and that it is moving steadily and intelligently forward to the accomplishment of its purposes. It is one of the curious illustrations of the super-sensitiveness of the financial nerve in English politics that the part of Mr. Parnell's programme that is most bitterly denounced by the English papers, is his contention for the right of an Irish parliament to protect Irish manufacturers against English competition.

In the recent elections in France a great victory has been scored by the Conservatives. The gains already made by them can hardly be neutralized in those districts where a second ballot is necessary; and it is now certain that a reconstruction of the Cabinet will be required on the assembling of the new Chamber of Deputies. Indeed, two of the members of the existing government have lost their seats already, and, in other respects, the power of the Cabinet has been so broken that the control of affairs must be handed over to a new Ministry. The causes that have led to this downfall of the Opportunists are various, but quite easily understood. The policy of colonial expansion in which the existing government has persisted, and which has issued in the two costly and not altogether glorious wars in Tonquin and Madagascar, has become more and more unpopular with the thrifty Frenchmen who have stayed at home and paid the bills. The contemptuous and persecuting course, moreover, which the Ministry has pursued in all its dealings with the Roman Church has antagonized the Ultramontane clergy and alienated many of the more moderate friends of religion. It is not to be wondered at that a reaction has at last set in, and that the clericalism and monarchism should be able to win from the masses of the people enough strength to hurl their enemies from power.

It is too soon, however, to predict what the outcome may be. The Conservatives of various names are too much divided among themselves to be able to form a government. The time has not yet come when Legitimists, Orleansists, and Bonapartists can unite upon a common policy. The Radicals are likely to be encouraged by the existing situation to persist in their contention for the wildest and most revolutionary measures, and in this way they will soon discover that the order-loving country folk will not trust them. On the whole, and in spite of the many mistakes of the Opportunists, it has been amply demonstrated that republicanism is the form of government best suited to the genius of the French people, and most likely to serve the manifest destiny of France. The time is past when any reactionary movement can create such an eddy in French affairs as to make possible the setting up of a throne and the masquerading of a king or emperor at Paris.

There is a curious contrast, however, between the present impatience of the French people at the cost and loss of the Tonquin and Tamatave expeditionary wars, and the enthusiasm with which the first Republic counted all loss as gain as its armies followed the tri-color to glory and victory in Italy, in Egypt, and on the Rhine. Whether the cause of this is to be found in the fact that the fighting of the present day is too distant to dazzle the eyes and fire the hearts of that large majority of Frenchmen who have not gone to the wars, it is difficult to say. Another reason is suggested by the fact that a great change has taken place in the ethical character of the French people. It is said that in the wars of the first Napoleon all the tallest men, who constituted the Frankish or Teutonic element of the population, were either killed or excluded from domestic life by their service in the army. The result was not only a reduction of the average stature of the next generation by several inches, but the elimination, it is said, of the more stalwart and warlike Germanic element, and the leaving of the French to be an almost purely Celtic people. If this last result is verifiable, it accounts, no doubt, for much in recent French history.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

New England will enjoy this year for the third time a session of the Church Congress, and could nowhere in this jurisdiction obtain a heartier welcome than undoubtedly awaits its approaching session in the delightful university town of New Haven.

The list of topics to be discussed covers questions that are generally before the religious public, not those which interest Churchmen alone. They are on the Christian doctrine of the atonement, the grounds of Church unity, the ethics of the tariff question, aestheticism in worship, free churches, deaconesses and sisterhoods, and the place and methods of Bible study in the Christian life. These are broad and solid subjects, and depend for their interest very much upon the treatment which they receive at the hands of those who are invited to discuss them.

Usually the English Congress announces a better programme than the American; it throws more variety into its plans; but the American Congress, under general headings, is apt to strike far and near into the burning questions of the day. It has also been rather shy of those points in which the mind of the Church is feeling its way to new issues. In England the Church is national and has authority behind it; here it has the position of one among many kinds of religion, and cannot speak with the same degree of assurance in matters which affect the positive side of the national life. But this has never made the Church Congress apologetic in its tone. Its fearlessness in discussing burning questions has always been one of its virtues, and if it takes up this year nothing that burns in the minds of men, it is only because there is nothing there to burn. The Church has never, as a whole, been so much at peace in this country as it is now; nor has there ever been such a general widening of view, such largeness of thinking, such a collective way of seeing things.

The Guardian remarks that the chief value of the English Congress is educational. Year by year it reaches two sorts of people—those who are within the body and need to feel the thought of leading men on subjects of present interest, and those who are without the Church and need to be taught that it is working wisely for the salvation of men. That same audience is reached here, and the large publicity that is given to the papers presented through the daily press in England and makes the impression unique upon the public mind, should be greatly increased here if the work of the Congress is to be felt deeply and widely through the nation. Simultaneous publication is worth everything in an educational point of view, while the subsequent report is mainly valuable as a historical record of what was said in literature.

Noticeable features in the programme for New Haven are the large number of laymen who are to take a part in the exercises, and the aptness of the choice of both clergymen and laymen for the parts which have been assigned to them. The Providence and Boston meetings of the Congress were remarkable for the local interest taken in them. Some of the discussions rose to the white heat of enthusiasm and left a lasting impression. If the grounds of Church unity or the ethics of the tariff question are taken up in their true significance and the truth is spoken freely, the enthusiasm of the public is likely to be awakened. The entire list of subjects shows that the managers of the congress have a good idea of what is in the minds of men and what ought to be discussed.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

BY THE BISHOP OF LONG ISLAND.

The Work Assigned to the American Church, and the Conditions Under Which it had to be Done.

I.

In Philadelphia, on November 18 and 19, the Board of Missions will celebrate its semi-centennial. The occasion cannot fail to be one of great interest. The arrangements for its suitable observance have already been made, and, no doubt, they will prove to be every way worthy of the event. It may not be a useless task to endeavor to outline in advance the leading features of the home side of the record which many thoughtful minds and eloquent tongues will then reproduce for the Church's joy and edification. Just this and no more is what is proposed to be done in the following papers, and if they serve no other purpose, they will at least help to call attention to the closing days of the first half century of our missionary work and to some of the lessons which it teaches.

Broadly defined, the work of the Church, in this land has been that of the Catholic Church from the beginning. Therefore, it has been both internal and external. The life within the Church has been built up in the knowledge and grace of Christ, while, at the same time, the life without has been taught the message of salvation and so recruited into the organized discipleship of the Church's head. And yet this work has been so far modified by circumstances peculiar to our time and country that it cannot be historically treated without due regard for aspects of it which distinguish it in a remarkable way from all similar work in other ages and other lands.

The American Church seems to have been chosen of God to leaven the teeming life of this newly peopled continent with evangelic truth and apostolic order. She was called to enter the arena of conflict and aggression, not as a sect among rival sects, not as a new school of Christian theology and life among other schools already in the field, but as a duly equipped and validly commissioned branch of the one historic Church appealing for the truth of her message and the authority of her order to Holy Scripture, as interpreted by primitive antiquity, and as reaffirmed at the Reformation by the national Church of England, from which she is lineally descended.

But this vocation of the American Church in itself so unspeakably important and far-reaching, had to be performed under conditions never before seen in the history of the world. The race among whom and for whom this work was undertaken is diversified in origin and characteristics beyond all precedent. The many sided life of Europe has reappeared among the vast spaces of a new world and crystallized around a new national centre; while even Africa and Asia and the islands of the sea have contributed to swell the migratory masses. Never was there such a gathering together of the tribes and kindreds of the earth, each bringing with it its own language, its own customs and traditions, its own type of character, religious, political and intellectual. Out of this confused, huge amalgam emerged new forces, new passions, new temptations, new ambitions, new wants—all of them stimulated into unparalleled activity by a larger liberty of thought and action than had ever before been offered to mankind; and all of them, too, crowded, as never before, into freshly opened channels of material development by the boundless opportunities of private wealth and prosperity. The prodigious excitements of the new life radically modified or swept away utterly the previous training and habits of the old life. The eyes of men were turned from ancient traditions and customs to what an unformed future might bring forth. Hereditary beliefs of all sorts were shaken up and partially shorn of their wonted influence. Fascinated by the chances for hitherto unknown ventures, lifted even to enthusiasm by the magnificent possibilities of fortune, comfort, independence, honor, all to be quickly won, and by a comparatively small outlay of personal toil, the incoming multitudes soon learned to estimate the past by the future, and not, as in older civilizations, the future by the past. Experience with its conservatism gave way to dreams of progress and an ever shifting novelty of achievement; and these working themselves out in practical life, profoundly affected not only the individual, but as well the spirit of social order and of civil government.

But, besides the composite, heterogeneous character of the life with which the Church was called to deal, there must be taken into account the astonishing rapidity of its development. In this regard there was seen an absolutely new thing under the sun—empires born almost literally in a day, vast territories peopled in a decade, civilization planted in the wilderness, agriculture and commerce established, wealth realizing the tales of a fairy-land created in measures of time once considered too short for the infancy and youth of nations. But so wonderful is all this that, in a paper of this sort, I may not stop with statements that may seem exaggerated because of their generality. The last Federal census brings us face to face with facts that startle even American ears. Within a single century this country has advanced from three to more than fifty millions of people, from thirteen to thirty-eight States, from the poverty of colonial days to a wealth equal to that of the ripest and strongest nations of the earth. A half century ago, what are now the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, was an almost untrudged wilderness, while still beyond lay the vast region out of which, in still less time, have grown the States of Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Colorado, and in the yet farther distance, along the Pacific slope, those of California, Nevada, and Oregon. Within the memory of men not yet old the furthest wave of population had not broken upon their borders. Chicago, now a city of nearly half a million, was only an Indian name for a small river, and St. Louis, now a city of scarcely less importance, was an insignificant trading post on the distant frontier. Omitting the Pacific States, the ten constituting the great West contain 18,260,000 inhabitants, have some two hundred thriving cities, are netted with a great system of railways, and, spreading far away from and about their teeming towns, are vast areas of cultivated lands capable of feeding a famishing world. Their aggregate wealth is figured at over $11,000,000,000, and the annual produce of their farms alone reaches the astounding value of $1,500,000,000. In other industries it has made remarkable progress, while its commerce must needs be great in the mere exchange of its own surplus products of the soil for the manufactured articles of other parts of the world. Its railway enterprises and its internal navigation are on a scale commensurate with the vast needs of these enormous exchanges. And all this stupendous political and industrial empire has grown from nothing within less than the limits of a single human life. This growth, moreover, has been normal and healthy, not forced or spasmodic, as though it were the result of some great invasion led on by military conquest, or caused by the compulsory migration of some subjugated race. Year by year the steady tide of life has rolled on and quietly taken up its task of peopling and fruitifying the ground. And, what is still more noteworthy, it is all distinctively American, though its elements have come largely from Great Britain, Ireland, Germany, and from the Northern and Southern nations of Europe, as well as from the old Atlantic States. All are now grouped and compacted under one language, one law, one dominant type of civil and social life, and that language, that law, that life, have their common root in the history of the English-speaking race.

But to these conditions as affecting the missionary work there must be added at least two more. (1.) The genius of our political institutions inclines the masses to accept in religion what promises the most freedom in belief and conduct, rather than what promises the purest, best settled forms of truth and the most stable ecclesiastical order. The democratic idea elevates the individual more and more above the sway of organic life and corporate discipline as well in the Church as in the State. By necessary consequence it leads the individual first to depreciate more and more, and finally to forsake, as the foe of his liberty, all that is traditional, and, by Catholic consent, authoritative in the faith, worship and order of the historic Church. On the moral and religious side of American life no tendency has been more general or more intense than this, and none can know its power save those who have confronted it in the open field of missionary work. As has often been the case in the past with great communities, this prolific, gigantic life, made up of such diverse materials, is least inclined to accept in religion what its vices, disorders, temptations most urgently need, and what only the ancient faith and worship and discipline of the Church Catholic can supply.

(2.) There must also be noted in this connection the tone of thought pervading the deeper, more abstract drifts of our educated mind, whether taking the shape of speculative philosophy, and so dealing with the profoundest problems of morality, religion, and history, or issuing in the form of social and political inquiry, and so, in its practical results, touching the rights and duties of men as members of society and of the body politic. Here beyond all question the tendency has been to rate lower and lower the divine origin and authority of all institutions in Church and State whose avowed purpose is to restrain the license of the individual will, and to rate higher and higher whatever in life, literature and practical politics promises to lift the rights and franchises of the individual into supremacy over his civil or ecclesiastical environments. Manifestly this, in the main, has been the effect, if not the aim, of most of our higher as well as our more popular education; while as manifestly most of our deepest thinking, whether among scholars or statesmen, or divines of the more pronounced Protestant type, has been in harmony with this drift. I state simply a fact, and the causes of it are not more obvious than the results. I confine myself to the latter, as with them only am I called to deal. One of these results is that the American people, as a rule, have inclined strongly toward systems of religious faith and order that have seemed to be most congenial to this tendency, and have as strongly turned away from a system which, while recognizing and providing for the growing importance of the individual in modern life, has aimed to keep him in due subordination to the divinely instituted authority of the Family, the State and the Church, and so in harmony with the continuous and universal traditions of the one Catholic and Apologetic kingdom of Christ. Our missionary work could not ignore this habitual leaning of the American mind, and the most remarkable thing in the remarkable progress of that work is that it has gone on in spite of it. By those who gauge the worth of Christianity by its service to favorite or dominant ideas of society and civil government, this doubtless will be regarded as an admission fatal to the future growth, if not to the claims of this branch of the Church. But it must be remembered that the Church has, not seldom, done most to advance the real progress of mankind when her spirit has been least coincident with the governing ideas in civil and social life. Undenially this was the case during the first three or four centuries of the Roman Empire, and subsequently during the dark and stormy times of Feudal Europe. Without meddling with the things that belong unto Caesar, and even in the midst of tendencies threatening the foundations of her authority, she has gone quietly on her way, doing the Master's business, dropping into the open furrows of the world's life the incorruptible seed, and calmly awaiting the harvest. So without noise or friction has she often supplanted what she could not approve; and what she has done, she may, in like manner do again. And so, too, it may turn out in a couple of generations that the sympathy with the extreme development of the democratic principle which certain popular religious systems of the day account an element of strength may prove an element of weakness. Now that the seas are smooth and the sun is bright, some imagine that for this people they will always be so. The delusion will perish only in the storms that will cast it out among the wrecked hopes of the over sanguine dreams of the past. Our civilization, happy and confident as it is, has not trampled out the old fires of lust, strife, and anarchy, fed now, as they have always been, by the sensuality and luxury born of wealth and ease. When these begin to burn, as they surely will, then will be tried the work now being done for this nation respectively by the historic Church and by that inorganic, half creedless combination known as "the common Christianity" of the day. The record writ, it may be, in ashes, will tell who are the wise and who are the foolish.

Such in general has been the mission of the American Church; and such specifically the aim of her strictly missionary work, and the conditions under which that work had to be done.

ENGLAND.

ELECTION OF THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY.—The election of the Rev. John Wordsworth as Bishop of Salisbury, took place in Salisbury Cathedral during the morning service on Saturday, September 19. After the first lesson, the dean, the canons, residentiary and non-residentiary, a large number of whom were present, proceeded to the chapter house, where the citation was read by the chapter clerk, as also the queen's congé d'elire, and the votes being unanimously in favor of the Rev. John Wordsworth, he was declared duly elected. The clergy then returned to the choir, where the Te Deum was sung, and the service proceeded as usual to the end, when proclamation of the election was made and affixed to the choir gate. The consecration of the bishop-designate is expected to take place on St. Simon and St. Jude's Day, October 28.

BURIAL OF THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.—The burial of the late Earl of Shaftesbury took place at Westminster Abbey, on Thursday, October 8. Hundreds of poor people stood outside the abbey in a drenching rain during the entire service, being unable to get into the edifice, so dense was the crowd which had gathered to pay their last mark of respect to the philanthropist. A large number of shoe-blacks, with crape bands on their arms, and many other boys who had benefited by the charitable acts of the late Earl, stood in line with the high-born in the abbey.

IRELAND.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP-ELECT OF MEATH.—The Bishop-elect of Meath, the Very Rev. Dr. Reichel, Dean of Clonsilla, was consecrated in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, on the feast of St. Michael and All Angels, by the Archbishop of Dublin and the Bishops of Down and Kilmore. The bishop was enthroned on Monday, October 7, in St. Patrick's church, Trim, of which he was rector at the time of his election.

GERMANY.

ENGLISH CHURCH MISSION IN BADEN BADEN.—A ten days' mission was conducted at Baden Baden, by the Rev. Sir J. E. Phillips and the Rev. F. A. Ormsby, both prominent English clergymen. It was very successful, and was attended by an increasing congregation to the close. The German Empress attended a week day service for women, and also the morning service on the concluding Sunday.

PRUSSIA AND THE VATICAN.—The Prussian government has again rejected the proposals made by the Vatican, both as regards the choice of the successor in the Vatican see of Posen, and the question of ecclesiastical education in seminaries. Dr. von Schleier, the Prussian minister at the Vatican, has returned, bringing counter proposals from his government, which, according to the Berlin correspondent of the Standard, are very conciliatory.

TURKEY.

THE EASTERN CHURCH DIGNITARIES AND THE ENGLISH MINISTER.—The Catholic Armenian patriarchs, the Occumenical patriarchal vicar, and several other ecclesiastical and lay notabilities connected with the Eastern Church, have successively paid visits to Sir H. Drummond Wolff, who is at present in Constantinople on a mission connected with Egypt, in order to represent to him the present state of Church affairs. In ecclesiastical circles it is reported that the British special envoy regretted that his mission had no connection with this matter, and showed great reserve in regard to the subject. Sir H. Wolff is further stated to have expressed regret at the want of union among the different Churches, and to have recommended them to act together as the only means of preventing the intrigues of the Fanatics, who profited by disunion.—Church Bell.

VERMONT.

VERGENNES.—Woman's Auxiliary.—The Woman's Auxiliary of this diocese held its annual meeting in St. Paul's church, Vergennes.

nes, on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 6 and 7. On Tuesday evening after the service there was a social reunion at the residence of Mr. C. A. Booth. On Wednesday morning there was an early celebration by the bishop of the diocese, assisted by the Bishop of Maine. At 9 A. M. there was a business meeting at which reports were read and officers elected. The president, most of the vice-presidents, secretary, corresponding secretary and treasurer, were re-elected.

Mrs. T. H. Canfield made a report on diocesan work. Mrs. H. F. Hill read a paper on Indian Missions, and Mrs. Dr. Wyman of Manchester on Colored Missions. Other papers also were read.

At 11 A. M. Morning Prayer and the Litany were said, and the Bishop of Maine preached in I. Cor. iii. 8.

In the afternoon delegates were elected to the general meeting in Chicago next year. The subject of the best modes of securing efficiency and combined effort between parochial branches was discussed, and a committee appointed to report on the subject at the next meeting. An address was made by Mrs. A. T. Tving, and a communication read from Miss J. C. Emery.

In the evening there was a missionary meeting at which addresses were made by the Bishops of Vermont and Maine, and by the Rev. Messrs. E. H. Randall, and G. H. Bailey.

ENOSBURGH FALLS—Ordination in St. Matthew's Church.—The Rev. William F. Weeks, D.D., in charge of St. Matthew's church, Enosburgh Falls, and Christ church, Enosburgh, was advanced to the priesthood in the former church by the bishop of the diocese, on the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. Morning Prayer was said at an early hour, and the ordination service began at 10:30 A. M. with a sermon by the Rev. Dr. J. I. Bliss. The candidate was presented by the Rev. T. W. Nickerson, Jr., a classmate at the General Theological Seminary, who joined in the imposition of hands with the other clergy.—The Rev. Drs. J. I. Bliss and A. H. Bailey, and the Rev. Messrs. G. H. Bailey, Thomas Burgess, and G. Myers. The church was crowded with a very attentive congregation. After the service the clergy were entertained at the Quincy House.

In the evening the newly-ordained priest presented seventeen persons to the bishop for confirmation.

MASSACHUSETTS.

FALL RIVER—St. James's Church.—Some years ago a Sunday-school was started in the northern part of this city for the special care of the children of English operatives in the mills, who could not come to the parish church, two miles or more away. When the Rev. Dr. A. St. J. Chambré took charge of the parish, he and his assistant, the Rev. E. Marriett, organized a mission which has since grown into a vigorous parish, now under the charge of Mr. Marriett.

In November, 1884, the corner-stone of a new building was laid, and on October 1 of the present year it was ready for use. It is a two-story structure, built from plans by Mr. W. P. Wentworth of Boston. The first story is of stone with brick trimmings, and is fitted up for guild, Sunday-school, and choir uses.

The second floor includes a nave, chancel and short transepts. The walls are of wood, partly shingled outside. The roof timbers of the interior are exposed. One special feature of the interior is the convenient and handsome chancel, with arrangements for a large vested choir. The whole cost, including land, has been over $10,000. A debt remains upon the building.

At the Morning Services, Oct. 1, the Rev. Dr. A. St. J. Chambré, reviewed the circumstances attending the organization of the mission, and congratulated the people on the success of their self-denying efforts. In the evening, after Evening Prayer, the Rev. Dr. G. W. Shinn preached on "The Hallowed Associations which Cluster around a Church." The evening services were peculiarly interesting, because of the large number of people present and the beautiful music rendered by the united choirs of St. James's and Ascension churches.

ROSLINDALE—Mission Services.—Service is held here on Sunday evenings in Association Hall by the Rev. J. C. Hewlett. On October 18 a Sunday-school will be opened in the afternoon.

ASHFIELD—Convocation.—The Western Convocation met in St. John's church, Ashfield, (the Rev. G. F. Huntington, in charge), on Monday, September 21, St. Matthew's Day. An interesting report was read of work done under the direction of the convocation in Eastern Berkshire, by Messrs. P. S. Grant and D. D. Addison, of the Cambridge Theological School. They spent three weeks traveling on foot some three hundred miles, conversing with individuals and groups of people, and holding services. Everywhere their offer of Prayer Books was gratefully accepted.

The rectory of this parish has recently been put in thorough repair, with the help and encouragement of the bishop, and through the beneficence of friends of the parish and minister in Boston and New York. The sum of $1,200 has been expended, and no debt incurred.

RHODE ISLAND.

NEWPORT—Emmanuel Church.—On Sunday, September 27, the Rev. Dr. E. F. Miles was advanced to the priesthood in this church (the Rev. R. B. Peet, rector), by the Assistant Bishop of New York. The sermon was preached by the assistant bishop. In the afternoon the newly-ordained presbyter preached. Dr. Miles is in charge of the Church of the Reformation, New York.

CONNECTICUT.

WESTPORT—Christ Church.—This church (the Rev. J. R. Williams, rector), was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese on Tuesday, September 29, the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. There were present, besides the bishop and rector, the Rev. Drs. E. E. Beardsley and H. N. Powers, and the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Hall, Elisha Whittelsey, Sylvester Clarke, H. L. Myrick, Benjamin Yarrington, C. M. Selleck, Millidge Walker, C. I. Potter, E. L. Whitcomb, J. K. Lombard, W. F. Nichols, and others. The request to consecrate was read by the rector, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Dr. E. E. Beardsley. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. Hall, Whittelsey, Myrick, and Clarke. In the Communion Office the bishop was assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Yarrington and Selleck. The bishop preached from Hebrews xii. 22, 23, 24.

After the service, the bishop, clergy, and visitors were entertained by the ladies of the parish.

The church is built of brick, on a massive foundation of blue granite; is 75 feet long and 48 feet wide, exclusive of the tower and chancel, which are each 19 feet square, and has a seating capacity of over 500. The walls are 14 feet high; the peak, 38 feet from the floor; and the only gallery is the organ loft in the tower. The side and tower-end windows, as also those in the vestibule and robing room, are filled with rolled cathedral glass. The chancel window of stained glass is in three sections; the middle one representing "The Good Shepherd," and the two side ones respectively the font with the dove hovering over it, and the paten and cup surmounted by the cross and crown. Over the chancel window proper is another large round one in which the emblem of the Blessed Trinity appears in beautiful and striking colors. The tower and spire are 148 feet high from the floor of the church, and the former contains a 2,000-pound bell from the Clinton H. Meneely Foundry, presented by Mr. E. H. Nash.

The altar, made by Geisler, a noble and beautiful structure, is the generous and loving gift of Mrs. Richard Smith Penoyer, in memory of her husband, whose early life, as well as her own, was passed in this place and parish; and who was for many years before his decease, a faithful and honored member of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, New York. The altar cross, also of Geisler's make, was presented by Mrs. E. H. Nash, in memory of her father, the late Lewis Partrie, for a long while an esteemed and exemplary vestryman of the parish. The carpet and chancel chairs were provided by the "Parish Aid Society," at a cost of $400. "The Young People's Guild," besides contributing $100 to the chancel window, purchased and made the very beautiful and appropriate hangings for the lectern and the pulpit.

The church throughout is lighted by gas and heated by steam. The entire cost of the building itself and all it contains was $34,500, nine-tenths of which was paid by the two wardens, Messrs. Edward H. and Andrew C. Nash. "Think upon them, my God, for good, according to all that they have done for this people."

The bishop visited the parish again on Sunday, A. M., October 4, preached, confirmed nine persons, and assisted by the rector, celebrated and administered the Holy Communion.

WETHERSFIELD—Trinity Church.—This parish, (the Rev. B. S. Sanderson, rector,) began in January, 1868, in a village strongly Congregational, and in the midst of much prejudice, has had a remarkable history. The work was first started by the Rev. H. W. Nelson, then rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Hartford, and it was so successful that a beautiful stone church was built, which was consecrated on October 1, 1874. The parish has had but two rectors besides the present incumbent—the Rev. Messrs. H. S. Clapp and H. A. Adams, the first from 1875 to 1883, the second from 1883 to 1885. The present rector entered upon his duties in July last. The parish has never been in debt. There are now one hundred families, and about one hundred and fifty communicants connected with the parish, and in 1882 a Parish House was built.

Thursday, October 1, was kept as Parish Day, being the eleventh anniversary of the consecration of the church. There was a solemn celebration of the Holy Communion, the Rev. J. W. Hyde of West Hartford being celebrant, assisted by the Rev. H. A. Adams as deacon, and the rector of the parish as sub-deacon. The sermon was by the rector, and was an historical discourse from Ps. cxvii. 4.

In the evening the church was crowded. The clergy entered the main door in procession, and advanced to the chancel. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. P. H. Whaley, W. E. Johnson, and J. W. Hyde. The sermon was by the Rev. H. A. Adams. After the sermon the Te Deum was sung. A letter was read at the taking of the offerings, by the rector, from the Rev. H. W. Nelson.

The exercises were closed by a social gathering in the Parish House, at which the Rev. H. S. Clapp, who had arrived too late to take part in the services in the church, made a very happy address.

On Tuesday, October 6, the bishop of the diocese made a visitation of the parish, and at the morning service instituted the rector-elect into the rectorship. The bishop was received by the wardens, and, with the clergy, entered the church, the rector-elect, in all and chasuble, being seated in front of the chancel. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. J. W. Hyde and H. A. Adams. The sermon was by the Rev. T. B. Foster, from Acts xx. 28. The instituted rector then proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Hyde and Foster.

After the service, the bishop and clergy were entertained at the Parish House.

In the afternoon the bishop preached, and confirmed eleven persons presented by the rector.

ALBANY.

ALBANY—St. Peter's Church.—The new building of the Orphans' Home of this parish (the Rev. Dr. W. W. Battershall, rector,) was dedicated to charitable uses on Tuesday, October 6, by the bishop of the diocese, assisted by the rector. Both the bishop and rector made addresses, and the service marked a significant day in the history of this fruitful and interesting work of charity. The Albany Argus gives the following account of the building:

"The front basement is devoted to the uses of a dining-room, and will comfortably seat twenty-five, and, with its cheerful coloring, is very attractive. Opening from this is a very large, finely-lighted kitchen, with all the necessary appliances for making it complete in every particular. This opens into a very large and solidly-constructed area, which is to be covered in winter with glass. From the area the garden is reached by a half-dozen stone steps. The principal floor has a handsome reception-room, opening from a large hall and into the school-room. This last is seventeen feet wide and twenty-seven feet long, and the height is lofty, thus providing most ample space for the twenty or twenty-five pupils it is intended to accommodate. The floor is of hard woods, inlaid and polished. The seats are of the very best and most improved make, and are graded to the size of the pupils. The entire west end is devoted to light, arranged to fall on the desks from the proper direction. In summer this room will open onto a piazza, from which the garden is reached.

"Ascending to the second story, we find the matron's rooms and the nursery, with easy access between, enabling the little ones to be under the careful and constant eye of the matron. The third story has a large room in the front, fitted to be used as a sick-room or hospital. This room is to be entirely furnished by a lady of St. Peter's, and the rear arranged for a lavatory, etc., in the most complete manner. Ascending a wide and easy flight of hardwood steps, one reaches the dormitory, which occupies the whole floor surface. This is particularly pleasant to see. The polished hardwood floor, the softly tinted walls, and the warmly-toned wood ceiling, together with the large gabled windows, filled with quarry-shaped panes of quietly-colored glass, form a fitting receptacle for the snowy bedlens. Everything within and all without, on the premises, has been most carefully and thoroughly done.

"The sanitary arrangements are complete, the plumbing being of the very best quality in every particular, and arranged in the most scientific manner. Especial flues have been constructed to ventilate every apartment and fixture, and these, in conjunction with five fireplaces and the heating apparatus in the basement, will prove a source of great value to a house cheerfully furnished, well lighted, and scrupulously neat in every particular. The improvements cost $3,700, beside carpets, range, and various articles of furnishing contributed by the ladies of St. Peter's congregation. This Orphans' Home takes destitute and uncared-for children, without regard to religious denomination, and gives them shelter and training till they are sixteen years of age, when they are recommended for service in a suitable home."

ALBANY.

STAMFORD—Consecration of Grace Chapel.—This chapel, which is a chapel of St. Peter's parish, Hobart, (the Rev. R. H. Barnes, rector,) and is the outgrowth of four summer's voluntary services of the rector, was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese on the feast of St. Michael and All Angels. There were present and assisting, the rector, and the Rev. Messrs. T. B. Felcher, Reeve Hobbie, and R. J. Adler. The instrument of donation was read by the rector, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Reeve Hobbie, who laid the corner-stone. The bishop preached, and confirmed seven persons. There was a large congregation, and the music, rendered by the chorus choir of St. Peter's church, was excellent.

Grace chapel was built principally through the offerings of summer visitors, stimulated by the zeal and energy of the late H. V. W. Tucker, who passed away a year ago, and to whose memory a handsome brass tablet has been erected. The chapel is of wood, pointed gothic, open roof, interior finished in yellow pine with oil finish. The windows are stained glass from the factory of E. Colegate, New York, and the chancel memorial window reflects great credit on the maker. Most of the church furniture, the Communion service, Bible, Prayer Books, etc., are gifts; the altar linen is the gift of the ladies of St. Clements, Philadelphia, the oak font a memorial of the Ingraham family.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Corporation for the Relief of Widows and Children.—The corporation for the Relief of Widows and Children of Clergymen in the State of New York held its annual meeting in St. Augustine's chapel, on the afternoon of Thursday, October 1. This meeting was an interesting one, this being the first year of the second century of the existence of the corporation since the Revolution. The Bishop of Western New York was present, and presided, and a large number of members was in attendance. The treasurer's report showed the finances of the corporation to be in a prosperous condition. The capital now exceeds $225,000, and the special relief fund, about $30,000, proves of great service and comfort in the aid extended in cases of need among the annuitants.

Although the benefits of the fund held in trust by this corporation are open to all the clergy of the State of New York, the number of contributors continues to be small, being only about one sixth of the clergy in the State. To the younger clergy particularly, the inducements offered are unusually great. The annual dues are only $8, and the returns to the widows and children of clergymen are far beyond what can be obtained for so small a sum in any life insurance company.

The officers of the corporation are: The Bishop of New York, president, ex-officio; the Bishops of Western New York, Long Island, Albany, and Central New York, respectively first, second, third and fourth vice-presidents, ex-officio; the Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Price, vice-president (annually elected); the Rev. Dr. J. A. Spencer, secretary; Mr. Richard M. Harrison, treasurer. The Standing Committee is Messrs. Cadwalader Ogden, Henry Drisler, Charles C. Haight, the Rev. Dr. T. M. Peters, the Rev. W. N. Dunsell, together with the president, secretary and treasurer.

NEW YORK—St. Ann's Church.—The thirty-third anniversary of St. Ann's church for Deaf Mutes and their Friends (the Rev. Dr. Thomas Gallaudet, rector), was observed on Sunday, October 4. The rector presented the following statistics in his sermon. The receipts for the year ending September 30, were: For current expenses ($1,000 from Trinity church) $5,546.11; specials for music, $540.50; toward the debt, $1,218; charitable parochial objects, $794.83; diocesan objects, $125.85; general objects, $754.05. Total, $9,923.81. Baptisms, adults, 9 (3 deaf mutes); infants, 14 (1 of deaf mutes). Total, 63. Confirmations, 47 (10 deaf mutes); marriages, 39 (5 deaf mutes); burials, 50 (2 deaf mutes). Communicants last year, 538; admitted, 47 (10 deaf mutes); received, 40; died, 21 (2 deaf mutes); removed, 64; present number, 540 (about 100 deaf mutes).

NEW YORK—Ascension Chapel.—A company of the Knights of Temperance has been formed in connection with this chapel (the Rev. J. F. Steen, in charge). It now numbers about one hundred lads, and the number is increasing each week. They meet weekly in a hall which, though large, is not sufficiently so for their marching and drilling. The rent of this hall, about $20 per month, is paid by the boys themselves.

On the evening of Monday, October 5, by invitation of the minister in charge, the Rev. Drs. W. R. Huntington and H. Y. Satterlee, the Rev. G. F. Nelson, Mr. Robert Graham and others attended a meeting of the company. They found about seventy-five of the young knights in attendance, with their officers. The preliminary exercises consisted of hymns, the reading of the Bible by the warden, and a few collects. Some new members were admitted, after having been duly examined. These exercises were followed by a drill by some of the older members, which was very good. Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Huntington and Satterlee, who expressed themselves gratified at what they had seen.

NEW YORK—The Advent Mission.—Missioners have been engaged for the Advent Mission in the various parishes, as follows: St. George's church, the Rev. W. Hay Alden; Church of the Holy Communion, the Rev. Dr. F. Courtney; St. Michael's church, the Rev. G. R. Van de Water; Church of the Heavenly Rest, the Rev. Dr. Francis Pigon; Zion and Incarnation churches, the Rev. R. B. Randall; St. Ann's church, the Bishop of Western New York; St. Ignatius's church, the Rev. A. C. A. Hall; Church of the Redeemer, the Rev. Dr. C. C. Grafton; Church of the Resurrection, the Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair; Church of the Epiphany, the Rev. O. A. Glanbeck; Holy Trinity church, Harlem, the Rev. F. H. De Verne; Church of St. Mary the Virgin, the Rev. George C. Betts; Calvary church, the Very Rev. H. Martyn Hart.

During the continuance of the mission there will be held a mission for children, in St. Mark's chapel, Avenue A. (the Rev. J. E. Johnson in charge). It will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton, assisted, probably, by his son, the Rev. W. W. Newton.

NEW YORK—Correction.—In our report of the assistant-bishop's address, in the list of episcopal acts, the words "sermons and addresses 35" should have read "sermons and addresses 539."

NEW YORK—The New York Bible and Common Prayer Book Society.—The annual meeting of this venerable society (established in 1809) was held on the evening of Thursday, October 8. The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Dr. C. R. Duffie. Mr. A. L. Clarkson presided, and the agent and treasurer, Mr. James Pott, read the annual report, which was ordered to be printed and circulated. It shows a distribution of thirty-six thousand Bibles and Prayer Books, through the bishops and clergy, to all parts of the country, proving how general is the work of this long-established society. Since the last annual meeting the Board of Managers has lost one of its members by the death of the Rev. Dr. G. J. Geer. This vacancy was filled by the election of the Rev. T. H. Sills. With this exception, the officers and the board remain the same.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Ann's Church.—This church, which has been closed for alterations during the summer, was reopened for divine service on Sunday, October 4. The music was rendered for the first time by a surpliced choir, which the organist, Mr. Archibald Arthur, has had in training for some weeks.

BROOKLYN—St. Peter's Church.—The rector of this church (the Rev. Charles A. Tibbals) inaugurated a series of people's services on the evening of Sunday, October 4. They will be continued during the winter. His plan is to have a shortened service, which will be printed on a card for the use of strangers. The music is to be hearty and plain so that all may join in it. The sermons will be short talks on subjects of interest.

FLATBUSH—St. Paul's Church.—Extensive alterations having been in progress in this church (the Rev. Dr. Summerfield E. Snively, rector), services have been suspended since August 1, but were resumed on Sunday, September 27, when the enlarged church edifice was completely filled.

The first church building for this parish was erected nearly fifty years ago, and gave way about twelve years since to the present church, a small but well constructed edifice, designed by Mr. Charles Haught. As it had only one hundred and twenty sittings, its size has long been insufficient; but it was feared that its symmetry and beautiful proportion would be marred by enlargement. Under the direction of Mr. Thomas Howe, Jr., however, the enlargement has not injured but greatly improved the churchly appearance of the building. The north wall has been removed, and an extension carried the full length of the church, with a lower roof, and an additional entrance on the northeast angle. Eighty additional sittings are thus secured. The new pews correspond with the old ones, and an additional aisle extends along the north wall. An organ and choir chamber has been constructed on the northeast of the chancel, an important and much needed improvement. The additions are constructed in the same substantial and tasteful manner as in the original building. The interior effect is very fine, giving the impression of great breadth and spaciousness.

The cost of the alterations was $2,000, which has all been provided for by voluntary contributions. During the past year, a handsome window in memory of Mrs. Hincken, a beloved parishioner, was placed in the centre of the south side, the design representing the Angel of the Resurrection.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

WILLOWDALE—Grace Church.—The eleventh anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone of this church (the Rev. W. E. Allen, rector,) was held on Saturday, September 26. A procession of clergy and laity moved from a neighboring house to the church, singing "Onward Christian Soldiers." Service was said by the rector and the Rev. C. W. McNish, and the rector made an appropriate address. After the service the ladies of the parish served a collation on the lawn for all present; and the ladies of St. Faith's Guild provided refreshment and games for the children of the Sunday school.

CARTHAGE—Grace Church.—The cornerstone of the new church of this parish was laid by the Rev. R. A. Olin, on Thursday, October 1. There were present besides Mr. Olin, the Rev. Dr. Albert Danker and the Rev. Messrs. J. Winslow and G. Moyses. An address was made by the Rev. Mr. Winslow, the founder of the parish, in which he reviewed the history of the Church in Jefferson County, and the history of the parish. Of one of the clergy in charge he said: "Many of you remember that earnest and devout young man, but not at that time possessing just the requisite qualifications and experience for that kind of work, but who has since grown into a strong and grand missionary. So matters went on between hope and fear, success and failure, storm and sunshine, till he [Bishop Brewer] of whom you are all thinking at this moment, came directly from the seminary full of zeal according to knowledge, having health and courage, grace and bravery, and who is to-day planting the Church up to the base and on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains—a noble bishop in whose work we are all interested, and for whose success our prayers are daily being poured by you into the listening ears of our Father in Heaven. From his entrance among you the success of the parish was no longer a peradventure."

He spoke of the struggles through which the parish had gone, and congratulated the congregation on the spirit they had manifested. He referred to the destruction of the former church by fire in October last, and said: "You have been brave; you have been purified by fire. Whosoever the Lord loveth He chasteneth. Go on, then, from this date in the zeal and courage of the past, building yourselves up in the holy faith which has cheered your friends who have fallen asleep. Build upon this foundation your church, which in its interest and beauty shall exceed the one that the flames used as incensed ashes rising toward Heaven."

A letter was read from the Rev. T. G. Jackson, a previous rector, and an address made by the Rev. R. A. Olin.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

GENEVA—Hobart College.—This institution has opened this year with one of the largest Freshmen classes that has ever entered, while the other classes have been slightly augmented by students from other institutions. Seven members of the new class are from South Carolina, one from Cuba, and one from Texas.

ELIZABETH—Death of the Rev. Dr. Forbes.—The Rev. Dr. John Murray Forbes died at his residence, in Elizabeth, N. J., on Sunday, October 11, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

Though Dr. Forbes has lived for some years past in retirement, he was at different periods prominent in the history of the Church. He was rector of St. Luke's church in this city during the exciting times consequent on the Oxford Movement in England, and in that church were first introduced what were then regarded as extreme practices, but are now considered harmless. The principles of Drs. Newman, Pusey, and Kohle were making themselves felt, and many were disposed to push them to an unwarrantable extreme. Among those were the late Dr. Ives, some time Bishop of North Carolina, and Mr. Preston, subsequently a monsignore in the Roman ministry. Dr. Forbes had great friendship for, and sympathy with these gentlemen, and in carrying out their ideas of Church doctrine and principles, he was borne by his convictions into the Church of Rome, in 1849. Whether he influenced Bishop Ives, or Bishop Ives influenced him, has been a matter of dispute; the influence probably was mutual. At any rate Dr. Forbes's action preceded that of Dr. Ives. Unlike Dr. Ives and Mr. Preston, however, Dr. Forbes could not conform himself completely to his new surroundings. He found that he had been pursuing an unseasonable shadow, and that what he sought was not to be found in the Church of Rome. After some years service in the Roman ministry this fact was made so evident to his mind and conscience, that he could stand it no longer, and he abandoned the Church of Rome, publicly acknowledging his error in a letter to the then Roman Archbishop of New York, the late Dr. Hughes. After a brief period of lay communion, his deposition was reversed, and he was re-admitted to the practice of the ministry by the Provisional Bishop of New York. After his return to the Church, Dr. Forbes acted as assistant to the late Rev. Dr. F. L. Hawks, in the Church of the Holy Saviour; but was made Dean of the General Theological Seminary in 1869, a position which he held until 1873, when he resigned, and retired to reside in New Jersey.

Dr. Forbes had suffered for some time from great bodily weakness, having lost the use of his limbs and to some extent of his sight, but his mental powers remained unimpaired, and his general health remained good until very recently, when it began to break. Dr. Forbes was twice married. He leaves a son by his first marriage, and his second wife and several children survive him.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

NEWARK—Trinity Church.—The rector of this church (the Rev. J. S. Reed,) has made arrangements for a ten days' mission in the parish. It will be held in the latter part of November, and all the clergy of the city will co-operate. The mission will be conducted by the Rev. Messrs. Aitken and Stevens.

NEWARK—St. John's Church, Woodside.—On Sunday, October 4, the Rev. A. L. Wood was instituted into the rectorship of this church, by the Bishop of Tennessee, the bishop of the diocese preaching the sermon. The celebration of the Holy Eucharist followed, the bishop of the diocese being the celebrant, assisted by the Bishop of Tennessee and the newly-installed rector. The service was choral, the music being rendered by a surpliced choir and a chorus of female voices. In the evening the Bishop of Tennessee preached on Reality in Religion.

This parish is in better financial condition than ever before, and being situated in the midst of a rapidly increasing population, seems destined to grow.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Redemption.—The rector of this church (the Rev. Thomas R. List,) preached his tenth anniversary sermon on Sunday, October 4. During his rectorship he has baptized 592 adults and infants, presented 193 persons for confirmation, has married 392 couples, officiated at 334 burials, held 1,651 services and delivered 1,382 sermons and addresses. Many improvements have been made in the church property, which is valued at $50,000, and which is free from all indebtedness. There are 347 officers, teachers and scholars, connected with the Sunday-schools and Bible-classes, and 276 communicants are registered in the parish.

PHILADELPHIA—Episcopal Hospital Mission. The twentieth anniversary of the Bishop Alozo Potter Bible Class of this mission was held in the mission building on Sunday evening, October 4. The service was said by the Rev. Thomas R. McClintock, minister in charge of the mission, assisted by the Rev. Henry A. F. Hoyt, chaplain of the hospital. The Rev. Samuel E. Appleton, D.D., preached the sermon in which he pointed out the manly character of Daniel as that after which they would do well to fashion their lives.

Dr. Ashurst read the annual report of the Bible class which showed that there was a total membership of 131, with an average attendance of 70. Miss C. C. Biddle has been the faithful teacher of this class during all these years, going from her home to the hospital every Sunday, and spending several afternoons during the week visiting the homes of the men. Her influence over them has been great and productive of much good in the neighborhood of the hospital. She has had, during this period, 1,000 men under her care, not counting those who have attended the class for two or three Sundays.

PHILADELPHIA—Federate Council.—The Bishop of Pennsylvania has issued a call for a meeting of the Federate council of the dioceses in this State, to meet at the Episcopal rooms, 1102 Walnut street, Philadelphia, on Tuesday, November 17, at 11 o'clock, A. M.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Michael's Church, Germantown.—The congregation of this church, (the Rev. J. K. Murphy, rector,) celebrated its festival day on the feast of St. Michael and All Angels, when the church was handsomely decorated. Morning Prayer was said by the rector, assisted by the Rev. S. F. Hotchkiss. The rector then proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. William Ely. The sermon was preached by the Rev. G. W. Hodge, from Revelation iv. 8. A second service was held in the evening, when Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. J. B. Falkner, and the Rev. Messrs. C. H. Hibbard, S. C. Hill, and T. W. Davidson. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. W. N. McVicker, on the encouragements and discouragements of work. There were also present the Rev. Messrs. Joseph Wood, W. Ely, T. P. Egé, and E. Cope.

This was the twenty-sixth anniversary of the first use of the church, and the ninth of its consecration. There were large congregations present at both services.

PHILADELPHIA—Clerical Brotherhood.—The discussion of the new Marriage License Law was the subject which engaged the attention of the Clerical Brotherhood at its meeting, on Monday, September 28. About fifty clergy were present, and the Rev. Drs. R. C. Matlack, C. D. Cooper, and Benjamin Watson, and the Rev. Messrs. H. L. Duhning, W. M. Jefferis, J. Karcher, C. W. Dnane, S. B. Simes, C. J. Mason, S. D. McConnell, R. C. Booth, J. R. Moses, and I. Gibson, participated in the discussion.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Transfiguration.—As Sunday, October 4, completed the first year of the Rev. Dr. Sidney Corbett's administration of this parish, he preached an anniversary sermon, and among the statistics that he mentioned were the following. Alluding to the Sunday-school he said that it had experienced a healthy growth during the year, and that he had attended all but three of the sessions. He officiated at 113 services; baptized 27, of whom 9 were adults; presented 22 for confirmation, some of whom were heads of families; married 2, buried 7, and ninety were added to the communicant list. He made nearly 600 calls and received a corresponding number of visits.

The rector will be assisted during the balance of the year by Mr. W. L. Kolb, who has been a Baptist minister, but who is now a candidate for orders, and will study at the Philadelphia Divinity school during the six months canonically required.

PHILADELPHIA—Sunday-School Lessons.—The Sunday-school association has arranged with a number of the clergy to teach the Sunday-school lessons to teachers, on Saturdays at 4 P. M., in one of the class rooms of the Church of the Epiphany.

PRUCA—St. John's Church.—The bishop visited this parish on Sunday, September 27, and confirmed fifteen persons, the largest number that has been presented for confirmation in many years. Among them were some of the oldest and most prominent men in this section of the country.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM—Lehigh University.—“Founders Day” at the Lehigh University was observed on Thursday, October 8. There was a very large attendance, attracted both by the observance of the day, and by the laying of the cornerstone of the Packer Memorial church. There were present the Bishop and Assistant-bishop of Central Pennsylvania, and the Bishop of Pittsburgh, and a large number of distinguished clergy and laymen from this and other dioceses.

At the hour appointed a procession of the clergy, trustees of the university, members of the faculty, instructors and students, followed by the members of the Masonic fraternity, marched to the site of the church. Here the president of the university made a brief address, presenting the stone to the Grand Master of the Masons, who, when prayer had been offered by the Bishop of Pittsburgh, the Grand Chaplain, proceeded to put in place the cornerstone of the Packer Memorial church, in accordance with the usages of the order.

The bishop of the diocese then proceeded with the service of the laying of the cornerstone of the church. Addresses were made by the bishop, the assistant-bishop, and the Bishop of Pittsburgh.

The exercises of “Founders Day” then followed, with the annual university sports.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—House of Mercy.—In 1838, at a meeting of a committee appointed by the District of Columbia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, held in St. John's church, it was determined to undertake this class of mission work. There was about $800 pledged at once, and the Misses Talcott, two of the Clewer Sisters, were obtained to take immediate charge of the work. In January, 1884, an association was organized, a board of ladies elected, and a number of gentlemen chosen as trustees. A charter was secured, and the society entered at once on what has proved to be an active career. A house, well adapted to the purpose, containing sixteen rooms, was purchased for $15,500, and in April, 1884, the work of the Institution practically began. In May the house was formally dedicated with public service and benediction. The House of Mercy receives penitent women from all parts of the country. It is dependent for maintenance on voluntary contributions. The cost of maintenance is about $125 per month. During the first year twenty-nine women, of ages varying from fifteen to forty, with some fifteen infants, were received and cared for. At the end of the first year twelve adults and six children remained in the house. At first but twelve could be cared for at one time, but the accommodations have since been doubled. Of these inmates, six were sent to a hospital, four returned to their friends, seven were transient or otherwise discharged. Some come merely as to a place of temporary refuge others moved by a desire to reform. Every effort is made to induce a change of life, and every encouragement thereto extended by the sisters in charge. A work-room is provided, and instruction in sewing and other things given, it having been found that many have fallen into vice from sheer ignorance of how to procure a livelihood.

The house is not under the charge of any particular parish, but is the care of all the parishes in the District. A small fee entitles any one to membership of the society, and liberal sums have been given, amounting to about $4,000, while the disbursements to the present time amount to nearly $6,000. The work has been helped by some four hundred friends, though further aid is, of course, required. It will be continued as long as means are forthcoming to sustain it. The treasurer's address is 2101 G street, N. W. The rector of St. Paul's parish, within which the house is situated, is the chaplain. Services are held morning and evening, and the Holy Communion celebrated weekly and on festivals. Once a week an address is made by one of the clergy. During Lent services are more frequent. Orders for sewing and washing are received, these are filled by the inmates, and thus some of the house expenses are met, and the women encouraged thus to lessen their sense of obligation to the institution.

The nursery department is now distinct from the reformatory. Here the mothers act as helpers. At three years of age the infants will be sent to orphanages, and the mothers, if then able, will be expected to contribute to their children's support.

Homes are found for such as prove worthy of confidence after sufficient trial. Thus far thirty-five have so been cared for. There are nine or ten still in the house, and two infants.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—Christ Church, Georgetown.—The cornerstone of the new church building for this parish (the Rev. A. R. Stuart, rector,) was laid by the bishop of the diocese on Thursday, October 1, on the corner of Thirty-first and O streets, in the presence of a large congregation. The musical portions of the service were rendered by a choir of fifty voices, with organ and orchestral accompaniment. The cornerstone of the old church, laid in 1818, was found to contain a copper-plate, bearing the name of James Monroe (then President of the United States), and silver and other coins of 1817. These, with the contents of the cornerstone of the enlargement in 1867, consisting of a list of the rectors of the parish, convention journals, photographs, etc., were added to memorial and other sermons, current coins, etc., and, with a copper-plate inscribed October 1, 1885, were deposited in the new stone.

The bishop made the address, and related many interesting facts in connection with the history of the parish.

INDIANA.

DIOCESAN ITEM.—The bishop returned to his work in the diocese, after a six-weeks' vacation, early in September. He has moved into the episcopal residence. This house was built by Bishop Talbot in 1873, at a cost of $18,000, and is a commodious and comfortable residence.

Miss Sybil Carter, in the interest of the General Board of Missions, visited the parishes in the central and southern portion of the diocese recently, and did much by her visit to create an interest in the work of the board, besides receiving generous offerings in its behalf. The bishop is desirous that every parish and mission-station should make an annual offering in behalf of the General Board.

The Rev. L. F. Cole of All Saints', Minneapolis, has been elected to the rectorship of Holy Innocents', Evansville, and has accepted. This beautiful church and its rectory were erected some years ago by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Viele, as a memorial of a beloved and only daughter. It has recently been slated and renovated by the generous founders, and the rectory put in perfect order for the rector. He entered upon his duties on October 1. The new St. Paul's, Evansville, one of the finest stone churches in the diocese, is steadily approaching completion. It is expected that it will be ready for occupancy by Christmas.

Harvest Home festivals have been held in a number of parishes—at St. Stephen's, Terre Haute, Grace, Indianapolis, St. Paul's, Evansville, St. Luke's, Frankfort, St. Mary's, Delphi, and Trinity, Loganport. The churches were beautifully decorated with grain, flowers, fruits, and vegetables. The special service set forth by the bishop was used, and appropriate discourses preached. In a great agricultural State like Indiana such a service is especially appropriate at the close of the harvest.

The clergy of Indiana are working as they have never worked before, reaching to towns and villages adjacent to them, holding services in school-houses, borrowed places of worship, and wherever there is an open door. The missionary at Frankfort has recently opened three new stations; the missionary at Crawfordville, in the heat of summer, held missions of nearly a week each, in two towns, Tipin and Kokomo, never before occupied by the Church. He has regular services in two other towns, Lebanon and Thorntown. In this way the Gospel and the Church is being presented in Indiana as never before. The people flock in crowds to the services, and express themselves delighted with the beautiful worship of the Church. In many towns they are moving in the matter of securing lots and building churches.

On Sunday, October 4, the bishop consecrated the pretty Gothic church erected during the summer at Newcastle. This is the county seat of Henry county, a rich and populous county, and contains a population of 4,000. The services of the Church were first conducted here by the bishop in 1884, and through that year they had occasional week-day services from the missionary at Muncie. In January last Sunday services on alternate Sundays were given by the present missionary, the Rev. W. D. Engle. The Diocesan Church Building Fund made a grant of $500 toward the church building, the result is a neat church and lot, with bell, organ, font, communion service, a choir of men and boys, two classes confirmed, a Sunday-school of fifty children, a congregation that fills the church; and not only this, but reaching out from this as a centre, services have been established in two other adjacent towns, lots secured and building funds begun to erect two new churches in the same county during the coming year. This is but a specimen of what may be done in many other counties in Indiana. The bishop needs help in founding these new churches. The whole diocese is missionary ground, fifty counties like Henry to be occupied, churches to be built, and congregations gathered.

St. Stephen's Hospital, Richmond, has completed its first year. It has cared for a goodly number of patients, and met all its expenses of furnishing, rent, and maintenance, and closes the year without debt. The beginning of the endowment of a child's cot has been made, and the children of the diocese are at work for it. They are also much interested in accumulating the means to found a diocesan orphanage. The bishop asks from each child in the Sunday-schools of the diocese an offering of one cent a month or twelve cents a year. Already nearly $100 has been contributed, and each month adds to the sum. At no distant date the orphanage will be begun.

The Howe Grammar School, the diocesan school for boys, begun a year ago at Lima, has entered upon its second year with more than double the number of pupils of the first year. This is matter of great encouragement to the rector, the Rev. C. N. Spalding, and to the bishop, who is deeply interested in its success.

The Rev. P. B. Morgan, recently restored to the work of the ministry, is laboring earnestly at Connersville. The Rev. J. G. Miller of North Dakota has been appointed missionary at Bristol and Mishawaka.

CHICAGO.

CHICAGO—Western Theological Seminary.—This institution was formally opened on the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels'. At noon there was a celebration of the Holy Communion in the seminary chapel, the bishop of the diocese being celebrant, assisted by the Bishops of Springfield and Indiana. The Ven. Archdeacon Wesley of Ely, England, and the Rev. Professor W. J. Gold of the seminary were also in the chancel. The bishop preached from Exodus xxiii. 16.

The opening and dedicating of this institution marks a most important period of the history of the Church in the Northwest. As is generally known, the erection and endowment of this great school for the ministry of the Church is due to the munificent generosity of Dr. Tolman Wheeler of Chicago. Two years ago he placed at the disposal of the bishop sufficient means to carry out to completion the seminary just opened, and it will not only long be a monument to the Christian character of the donor, but it is already an adornment to the city, with which his name is connected as one of the pioneers.

The new Divinity School is situated on the north side of Washington Boulevard, near California Avenue, with a frontage on the boulevard of two hundred and one feet, and a depth of one hundred and ninety-four feet, running through to Park Avenue. The buildings are two in number, of beautiful and imposing appearance from the boulevard. They consist of the theological halls proper and a dormitory for the students. The theological hall, which will be known as Wheeler Hall, measures ninety-six feet in front by fifty-seven feet six inches in depth. It is in the late Gothic English ecclesiastic style of architecture, and of red pressed brick, with brown-stone and terra-cotta trimmings. In the centre front is the main entrance, through a Gothic portico six feet wide and nine feet high, across which are handsomely-designed and substantial oak doors. These open into a spacious hall, to the right of which is the dean's office, and on the opposite side a commodious reception-room. At the east end of the building, in front, is the seminary chapel, a richly-finished apartment, the woodwork being all solid oak. The room has a vaulted ceiling and a striking appearance, the east end projects sixteen feet beyond the main front line of the building in the form of a five-bayed apsis, twenty-four feet wide. Each bay has a chancel window, in the middle one of which is a figure of our Lord, and in the others are figures of the four evangelists. On the east side is the recess, in which is a handsome organ. The chamber is lighted by another stained-glass window, with the words "Te Deum Laudamus," and beneath them figures of cherubim and seraphim offering praise. Opposite the apsis is a rose stained glass window, having a cross in the centre. At the extreme west end of the building is the library, a spacious apartment, two stories high, and having space for twenty thousand volumes. It is lighted in front by a quadruple stained-glass window, twelve feet wide and nineteen feet high. In the upper part of this window are portraits of Bishops Seabury and White. On the top floor of this building is a large hall for elocutionary purposes and general meetings. On the main floor again is a commodious apartment devoted to the Wheeler School for Boys, under the Rev. T. D. Phillips, which opened with an attendance of fifteen. Conveniently situated to it is the refectory. All remaining space of the four floors of the main building is devoted to professors' rooms, robing-room, and lecture-rooms.

Twenty-five feet distant from Wheeler Hall and Chapel is another large four-story building, the exterior of which corresponds with the larger building by its side. This is the dormitory building, and it is admirably fitted and arranged to accommodate the students. In this building excellent hospital quarters and a gymnasium are provided.

Of the clergy present and participating in the opening were the Rev. Drs. Clinton Locke, W. H. Yibbert, A. Loderbach, T. N. Morrison, A. Z. Gray and C. W. Leffingwell, and the Rev. Messrs. L. S. Osborne, T. N. Morrison, Jr., E. A. Larrabee, Luther Pardee, G. T. Griffith, G. C. Street, J. H. Knowles, Antoine Lechner, L. D. Mansfield, J. E. Thompson, H. G. Perry, C. H. Bixby, Morton Stone, F. M. Gregg, Joseph Rushon, J. H. Edwards, C. A. Holbrook, M. V. Averill, G. W. Whitney, Henderson Judd, A. P. Greenleaf, W. E. Toll, G. S. Todd, Isaac Foote, A. V. Garrel, and F. J. Hall.

After the service the clergy and other visitors were entertained in the refectory by the ladies of the cathedral, after which congratulatory speeches upon the present success achieved in this important undertaking were made by the Bishops of Springfield and Indiana, the Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke, Professors Gold and Morrison, and others.

WISCONSIN.

NASHOTAH—Opening of Nashotah House.—The opening of Nashotah House for the Advent term took place on the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 7 A.M., all the students receiving. Morning Prayer was said at 9 A.M., and at 10:30 a procession of clergy and students moved from the old chapel to the Preaching Cross on the chapel lawn, where the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Walter Delafeld. At the conclusion of the sermon, the procession reformed, and led by the cross-bearer, entered the chapel, when the bishop celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Dr. A. D. Cole, president of the Home. The music was very spirited and rich, rendered by a choir composed exclusively of students.

The number of students admitted this year, is larger than for many former years. They give promise of great usefulness in their ministry.

The chapel has during the winter been entirely refitted in hard wood. The stalls of the seminarians have been placed within the rails of the chancel, and the chancel itself has been extended outward as far as the pews. The walls have been retinted, and the wood work has been repainted in warm, but quiet colors.

The visiting clergy at the opening included the Dean of the Cathedral (the Rev. C. L. Mallory), the Rev. Dr. Walter Delafield and the Rev. Messrs. T. W. Barry, J. Francis, F. Osborne, C. S. Starkweather, R. F. Sweet and D. L. Sanford. Many visitors were present from Milwaukee, most of whom dined with the president at Shelton Hall, after the ceremonies.

At 4 P. M. there was choral Evensong, and at 9 P. M. Compline Office in the Oratory of the House.

IOWA.

FORT DODGE—St. Mark's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. R. J. Walker, rector,) on Sunday, September 27. Although the morning was very rainy a large congregation was present, and in the evening, when the weather had cleared, the church was filled, and many had to go away for lack of room. In the morning the bishop preached and celebrated the Holy Communion. In the evening he preached and confirmed eight persons.

OREGON.

PORTLAND—Church Schools.—The Daily Oregonian of September 30 has the following notice of the Church schools in Portland:

"In spite of the 'hard times' St. Helen's Hall and the Bishop Scott Grammar School—two prominent educational institutions of Portland—open this term with flattering prospects. St. Helen's Hall has a list of one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and thirty pupils, and the grammar school a considerably larger number than last year. The faculty of the former institution numbers thirteen, eleven of them educated and trained in the best Eastern schools, and two of them in St. Helen's Hall. The grammar school has a faculty of seven, three of them, including the head master, are graduates of Yale College, and is well 'manned' both for instruction and discipline. These are educational institutions of a high order, and of great advantage to the citizens of Portland and other parts of the State. . . . We are glad to record the continued success and prosperity of these Portland institutions, which in the past fifteen or sixteen years have done so much to elevate the standard of education in our State."

CONNECTICUT.

NEW HAVEN—Church Congress.—The Churchmen of New Haven have been busily preparing for the meetings of the Church Congress next week. Large numbers are expected from various parts of the country and many families will entertain guests. The Consolidated Railroad and other roads centering in New Haven give free return tickets, and round trip tickets at reduced rates can be obtained on most of the railroads in New York and New England.

Carl's Opera House, where the sessions of the congress will be held, is centrally located, and easy of access by horse cars from all parts of the city. It is the largest opera house in New Haven, and while it will be probably well filled, it is hoped that all who wish to hear the speakers will find good accommodation.

The sessions of the congress, as already noticed in THE CHURCHMAN, will begin on Monday and end on Friday. The last session on Friday will be held at 2:30 P. M., to enable those desiring to leave the city by the evening trains to do so.

The list of writers and speakers includes men of marked ability and reputation from this country and England, and it seems probable that the tenth session of the Church Congress will by no means fall below the average of those that have preceded it.

A MR. WIGHAM in England has invented a new method of illuminating lighthouses. He substitutes gas for oil. The light is powerful and easily controlled. The gas flames and can be raised and lowered automatically. It is especially fitted for a thick atmosphere.

MR. J. HULL holds that gas pipes should be laid as deep as possible under the surface to prevent disturbance to the joints by the upheaving and settling of the earth from frost, or pressure from traffic. Lead pipes are preferable to iron from absence of rust.

THE increase per cent. in the population of this country for nine decades has varied from 22.65 during the war decade, to 35.83 in the period from 1840 to 1850. In the ten years from 1870 to 1880 the increase per cent. was 30.08. The influence of the war was still felt.

If a few drops of sulphuric acid be combined with pure butter, the butter will assume an opaque, whitish color, and after some ten minutes will change to brick red. Oleomargarine, with the same test, changes first to a clear amber, and after twenty minutes to a deep crimson.

EDWARD I. died in 1307, and 463 years after his body was not decayed. Canute's body was found fresh in 1786, and he died in 1017. In 1569 three Roman soldiers were dug out of a peatmos, and were found fresh after about 1,500 years. Many other instances like these are related.

THE elaborate icing that imitates frost on Christmas and other cards is produced by sintering fine particles of ground glass upon the gummed cards. It is dangerous to the girls who do the work, the atoms penetrating their lungs and either causing early death or chronic inflammation.

THE condor on the west slope of the Andes has become a scarce, and the government of Chili has offered $5 each for their destruction. It would seem almost a hopeless task, for they fly at vast elevations—sometimes 20,000 feet above the level of the sea—and build in inaccessible places.

By a recent law France has appropriated $90,000 to be expended on the maintenance and education of every seventh child in families in needy circumstances. They are becoming anxious lest the family as an institution should die out for the want of children as a constituent part of it.

DR. E. DE LA GRANJA, of Boston, upon his return from Spain, where he has been investigating the cholera, declares that the microbe is an effect and not a cause of cholera, and that Dr. Ferran's inoculating liquid, containing only sterile bacilli, is powerless as a preventive of the disease.

PROCTOR the astronomer said his first real astonishment in this country was in receiving circulars from eminent distillers, offering essences, a pound of which could convert fifty gallons of alcohol into fine old brandy or good whiskey. He did not invest, for he knew the nature of the poison.

A LENS, three feet in diameter and seven inches thick at the centre, the largest burning glass on record, was presented by the English government to the Empress of China. In its focus even the diamond is reduced to vapor. The Emperor suspected magic, and the lens is kept buried in the ground.

It is now confidently predicted that the Atlantic will ere long be crossed in four days. The increase of speed has been accomplished by the power of the engines, and not by the finer lines and proportions of ships. The three-cylinder engine has done much to increase the speed and lessen the cost of fuel.

It seems probable that Papine will become an important addition to the materia medica. Tried in facial neuralgia it was more satisfactory in its results than opium, morphine or chloral hydrate. In a case of hepatic calculus it acted like a charm, but large doses were required and the influence had to be kept up.

Mr. BAKWELL, an English geologist, estimated that the apex of the horseshoe fall at Niagara receded about three feet a year, and Sir Charles Lyell conceived that it was about six feet a year. Recent surveys confirm Mr. Bakewell's view, which would tone down the age of the falls from 35,000 years to 7,000 years.

If two or three tablespoonfuls of Epsom salts are dissolved in a quantity of lager beer, and the mixture is applied to glass, it will give it the appearance of ground glass. It will be found useful upon transoms and other windows where a screen is desired. When the windows are washed it will have to be re-applied.

DRAGON-BLOOD pottery, rare now even in China, has been successfully made in Chelsea, Mass., and is remarkable for its depth, lichen and true blood color. It is quite a surprise to those who are interested in ceramics. The same potter, Mr. H. C. Robertson, has produced the most admirable specimens of iridescent pottery.

At Dumfermline, Scotland, tumuli of large dimensions have been found. Upon opening four of the cists, implements of the stone age have been found in large quantity, and not less than 2,000 years old. Among the treasures were urns, quite large flint flakes, arrow heads, pestles, etc. The excavations are still going on.

THREE-FOURTHS of the nutrient matters eaten by the middle-class in England are from the animal kingdom, and one-fourth from the vegetable. If the proportions were reversed, the eminent physician, Sir Henry Thompson, says there would be cleaner palates, more active brains and a better state of health for those not engaged in laborious employments.

A MINISTER (not on the frontier, but in Illinois), recently said in his sermon that he would rather be born when he was than to have been one of the children who were taken into the arms of the Saviour and been blessed by Him. People knew a great deal more now than they did ages ago—knew all about railroads, telegraphs and everything—more even than St. Augustus Ceres did. When the blind lead the blind, is it not a wonder they do not escape the ditch?
